WE can with Truth affirm, that the Acts and Monuments of the Glorious PROTESTANT MARTYRS is a Work worthy of a Place in the Hearts as well as Libraries of All serious CHRISTIANS. FOX's COMPLETE BOOK of MARTYRS has been long Recommended by Protestant Divines of every Denomination; and among the public Testimonies which have appeared from Time to Time, in favour of this valuable Work, are the names of a Toplady, a Whitfield, a Wisley, a Madan, a Hill, a Ryland, and many other Ministers of the Gospel, extracts from whose Letters are printed on the other side.

The Lives and Sufferings of the Holy Martyrs may be considered, by every candid Person, as a strong presumptive Evidence for the Truth of the Christian Religion; for it is impossible that so many thousands, of both sexes, of all ranks and professions, rich and poor, learned and simple, should at such distant times and places have conspired, as it were, against their own lives, to establish a faith, of whose truth they were not full convinced. The greatest enemies to Christianity cannot deny but that there have been thousands, among the sufferers for the truth of Christ's Doctrine, who were very competent judges of the degree of evidence offered in support of it, and sufficiently independent to be influenced either by rewards or threats. Many of them were also sufficiently learned to inquire into the stability of the Scripture proofs brought to prove Jesus Christ to be actually the expected saviour of mankind, which entirely sets aside the adversary's plea against some few, who they say were ignorant weak people, who took their faith upon the credit of others. We know, on the contrary, from the following history, that men of the strongest sense, and brightest parts, were converts to christianity; and having once believed from conviction, arising from a fair examination of its internal and external evidence, were too honest and impartial to deny what they had openly professed to believe.

There is a wide difference between an intemperate, misguided zeal, which rushes into perils without sufficient reason, and that calm and steady courage which meets danger with temper, when unavoidable. Our Saviour himself gave an example of this prudential conduct, by oftentimes retiring from imminent danger: and he gave it as a charge to his first followers, "When they persecute you in one city, flee to another." So that the Holy Martyrs, those brave men who unavoidably sealed the testimony of the Gospel with their blood, following their blessed master's advice, cannot be ranked with rash and hot-headed zealots.

The progress of Popery has so greatly increased of late, that there is now an absolute necessity for using every effort to suppress such dangerous and contagious principles, and to exert ourselves, and carry into execution every means that can be concerted for promoting the cause of Protestantism; and surely nothing can be a better means to stem the torrent of Popery, than a publication of the following work.

From the tenets of the Holy Martyrs we may acquire the principles of the christian religion, from their morals we may learn how to live, from their fortitude how to suffer, and from their deaths how to die.

Let us therefore, take example, in various stations of life, from the integrity and resolution of these departed brethren in Christ; and as a noble conduct is praise-worthy, let us be ready, in whatever sense our Lord requires a sacrifice, to go and do likewise.

We think it needless here to give a tedious detail of all the particulars, which will be contained in this important undertaking; but it may be necessary to observe to our Readers, that this work will not (like several imperfect publications on the subject) be a trifling summary of mere names—not an inaccurate index or lifeless abridgement—not a crude indigested compendium—but a full and complete edition of FOX's ORIGINAL BOOK of MARTYRS, including the CHRISTIAN MARTYROLOGY, from the most early age of persecution to the present time; and containing a display, and fuller account than has hitherto been published in any book of the kind, of the Lives, Religious Principles, Cruel Persecutions, Sufferings, Tortures, and Triumphant Deaths, of all those faithful Christians and godly Martyrs, whose constancy was tried for the truth of the Gospel, and who have sealed their faith in our most holy religion with their Blood.

This work is well calculated to serve the Protestant Cause. It will teach us how to conquer sin, our grand persecutor; to make our appetites and passions Martyrs to our Duty, and hence we may learn, that there is not any thing so difficult, but we may overcome through divine help. We have the same cause, the same Lord and Master on our side, the same recompence of reward to encourage us; and having so great a cloud of witnesses, let us press forward, and the same heaven will be our portion for ever.

PROTESTANT FAMILIES! read, value, and recommend this Book of Martyrs to your friends and connections; which, next to the Bible, will be the most valuable legacy you can leave to your children; for herein you will find exhibited not only the characters of the best men, but those noble principles which enabled them to brave the severest tortures which Popish Cruelty and Pagan Barbarity could invent. We here see those mournful tragedies that have been acted in our own country, upon our own countrymen; and here, as in a glass, we see, refined from all corruptions of popery, &c. that pure religion of Jesus Christ, which we are in duty bound to propagate, and leave uncorrupted to our dearest posterity.

In these MONUMENTS of our illustrious Martyrs, we behold displayed, as they are in the Articles, Homilies, and Liturgy of the established Church, those essential, fundamental principles, to which the Church was reformed, and for which her glorious Martyrs were burned. We here meet with a most valuable general history of the Church; and will hence be convinced, how much it is our duty to check, by such a publication, the infidelity and the immoralities of the present age.

MINISTERS of GOD's HOLY WORD! wish this publication success in the name of the Lord. What doctrine has Popery not corrupted? What branch of worship has Popery not perverted and defiled? What law of God has Popery not trampled on and despised? Call to mind the horrid scenes exhibited by her bloody perpetrators of cruelty. In this New and Complete BOOK of MARTYRS, you will find them faithfully related. Assist then, we entreat you, it's diffusion; that so, by our united efforts, it may prove mighty, through God, to strengthen the Protestant faith; and to prevent the least encroachments of those erroneous sentiments, and those human inventions, that were artfully framed only to enslave us in time, and deceive us for eternity.

PAUL WRIGHT, Editor.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THIS WORK.

TO THE PRINTER AND PUBLISHER.

SIR,

IT was a saying of the famous Dr. South, that "Popery is not only the worst religion, but the greatest evil that can possibly come into any country." The contents of the following sheets furnish us with ample proof of this. THE ACTS AND MONUMENTS OF THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS, written by JOHN FOX, a man of rare and excellent endowments, both natural and acquired, I most heartily recommend to persons of both sexes, and of every condition in life. As the author lived at the time when the bloody scenes herein related were exhibited, and his integrity, learning and piety, are equalled by few, (by none exceeded) the credibility of his testimony can be called in question only by those, whose interest or principles lead them to espouse and promote the cause of Popery.

MARTIN MADAN.

SIR,

IT gives me unspeakable pleasure, to find, that you design to republish Fox's Martyrology, which I consider as a faithful and judicious compendium of the most valuable and ecclesiastical history extant in our language, and a work eminently calculated to display, and to guard us against the principles and the spirit of Popery;—to perpetuate the holy lives, and faithful testimonies and the triumphant deaths of those evangelical worthies, who resisted error, even unto blood;—to exalt the standard of CHRIST;—to exhibit the loving-kindness of the HOLY GHOST, who gave such grace and power unto men; and to stand as the best commentary on those inestimable truths, which (through the good hand of God upon us) still continue to shine in the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies, of our ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

I wish this performance much success, in the name of the Lord. May its diffusion be very extensive, and its usefulness very great. May it prove mighty, through God, to make the Protestant Churches in general, and our own National Church in particular, remember FROM WHENCE they are fallen: stir them up to doctrinal and practical repentance, and bring them back to their first principles, and to their first works!—With this Prayer, breathed from the inmost of my heart, I remain, Sir,

Your affectionate well-wisher.

AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE TOPLADY.

SIR,

I AM glad to hear you propose re-printing FOX'S BOOK of MARTYRS: it will, no doubt, be received with great acceptance, and very cheerfully encouraged by all who have any sense of the excellency and glory of that religion, for which the noble worthies of which it speaks, suffered and died. It has ever been esteemed one of the most invaluable treasures of human production: it is its own best recommendation; and it need only be known in order to be admired by all who are happily possessed of the power and spirit of the religion of the blessed Jesus. I pray God it may be the means of increasing the highly-favoured number; and am,

Your humble Servant,

CHARLES DE COETLOGON.

South-Street, Grosvenor-Square.

SIR,

AS I think the BOOK of MARTYRS should be in every body's hands, it gives me pleasure to hear of its being re-publishing. I trust it will be the means of reviving that spirit of genuine Christianity which inspired the noble Martyrs in these lands, and of uniting the hearts of God's children in these decisive times, to the support of their one common cause, and in love to one another.

If you think my name can in the least promote the reading of that valuable work, you are welcome to make use of it; and I am, Sir, Your very humble Servant,

Swallow-Street.

JOHN TROTTER.

SIR,

THE BOOK of MARTYRS was well calculated to serve the Protestant cause, against the SUPERSTITION and CRUELTY of the Church of Rome. The Editor deserves the thanks of all serious Protestants, for his labour in making so valuable a book easily attainable.

Your humble Servant,

JAMES WEBB.

SIR,

I Heartily join in recommending FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS to the perusal of every Protestant family and all English readers.

Eagle-Street, Red-Lion-Square.

ANDREW GIFFORD.

SIR,

THE exceeding great value I entertain for the doctrines of the Reformation makes me esteem the present general departure from them, a circumstance not a little to be lamented: I therefore most heartily concur with the other respectable Gentlemen, whose names you have sent me, in Recommending the BOOK of MARTYRS; in which not only the characters of the best of men are most excellently set forth, but also those noble principles which enabled them with such uncommon patience to bear the utmost barbarity which tyranny and Popery could invent.

I am, Sir, your friend and servant,

ROWLAND HILL.

SIR,

NO book in the world is so well adapted to display the cruel and blood-thirsty spirit of Popery in the most striking light as the BOOK of MARTYRS: and this part especially is suited to an English reader: he is not here led up to the times of Nero, of Dioclesian, or to the martyrdom of Polycarp, Ignatius, Cyprian, but he is shewn the bloody tragedies acted in his own country, and upon his own countrymen: here you see that great and amiable servant of God, lord Cobham, hung up by the waist, over a dreadful fire, and roasted alive! Here you see an Hooper burned at Gloucester, in so cruel a manner, that his ribs fly open, and you behold his heart beating with life, in the midst of the flames.—Here you see that neither the accurate learning of a Ridley, the godly simplicity of a Latimer, nor the distinguished benevolence of a Cranmer, can be any protection from the outrageous fury of Popery.

I am, Sir, your sincere friend and servant,

JOHN RYLAND.

Northampton.

SIR,

HISTORY being calculated to catch the attention of persons of all ranks, many, who cannot without some reluctance sit down to read other serious publications, will, we trust, easily be prevailed upon to read that useful and interesting HISTORY contained in FOX'S BOOK of MARTYRS; and as the attentive perusal of it cannot fail being followed with good effect, I therefore feel a peculiar pleasure in recommending the same to sober, sensible and religious persons of every description.

I N T R O D U C T I O N:

Being a Preliminary Discourse, giving an Account of the principal Errors, Rites, Ceremonies, and Superstitious Practices, of the ROMISH CHURCH.

BEFORE we enter upon those bloody tragedies that were acted in England during the tyrannical reign of queen Mary, we think it necessary, especially for the information of the younger part of our readers, to give an account of the main errors, superstitious ceremonies, and human inventions, of the Romish church; in abhorrence of which, the first Reformers and blessed Martyrs, who made the sacred scriptures their sole guide, separated from that church, and resisting popish idolatry, even unto death, sealed the sacred truths of the everlasting gospel with their precious blood. To attempt a formal refutation of the various absurdities belonging to the Roman Catholic religion, would be foreign to the design of this work, and afford little entertainment; we shall however select those that are more material, and prove that they are mere effects of human invention, by contrasting them with passages taken from the word of God, the only true rule by which we can possibly judge in all matters of revealed religion. The Romish church affirms, that out of her communion there is no salvation; yet they receive, profess, and teach, as the true catholic faith, the following strange, unscriptural, and inhuman maxims, tenets, and carnal observances.

TRADITIONS.] The church of Rome having deprived the laity of the Bible, substitutes in its stead apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions; and obliges her disciples to admit for truth whatever she teaches them: but what do the holy scriptures say? "Why do ye transgress the commandment of God by your traditions?" Matt. xv. 3. 9. &c. They also command us "to call no man master (in spiritual concerns):

to try the spirits; and to beware of false teachers."

PRAYERS and DIVINE SERVICE in LATIN.] The Roman Catholics will not interpret the scriptures, otherwise than according to the sense of holy Mother Church, and the pretended unanimous consent of the fathers: they assert also, that the scriptures ought not to be read publicly, nor indifferently by all; and that the common people may be enslaved by gross ignorance, they perform public worship in an unknown tongue, contrary to the rule laid down by the apostle, "That all things should be done to edification." St. Paul says, "If I pray in an unknown tongue, my spirit prayeth, but my understanding is unfruitful." And, writing to Timothy, he reminds him, that "from a child hast thou known the scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Christ Jesus."

SEVEN SACRAMENTS.] Two only were instituted by Christ, to which the Romish church has added five more, making in all seven, necessary to salvation, namely, the Eucharist, Baptism, Confirmation, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony. To those two which Christ instituted, she has added a mixture of her own inventions; for in the sacrament of baptism, she uses salt, oil, or spittle; and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the laity have only the bread administered to them; and even not that, after the manner ordained by Christ, who broke the bread and gave it to his disciples; instead of which, the church of Rome administers to her members not bread, but a wafer, and that not broke, but put whole by the priest into the mouths of the communicants. These wafers are smaller than those made for the priests, who, with them, drink the sacramental wine alone, to which the rest of the congregation congregation have as good a right, from the institution of our blessed Lord, who said, "Drink ye all of this," &c. Matt. xxvi. 27.

THE MASS.] Roman Catholics believe it to be a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice, and therefore calls it the Sacrament of the Altar; whereas the death of Christ was a full and complete sacrifice, "in which he hath, by one offering, perfected for ever them that are sanctified. He himself is a priest for ever; who, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; and who through the eternal Spirit, offered himself without spot to God." See St. Paul's epistle to the Hebrews, Chap. ix. and x. It was on account of this gross absurdity, and the irreligious application of it, that our first reformers suffered, and so many were put to death in the reign of queen Mary.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.] Roman Catholics profess, that in the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, there is really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of Christ; and that the whole substance of the bread is turned into his body, and the whole substance of the wine into his blood; which conversion, so contradictory to our senses, they call Transubstantiation, but at the same time they affirm, that under either kind or species only, one whole, entire Christ, and the true sacrament is received. But why are those words, "This is my body," to be taken in a literal sense, any more than those concerning the cup? Our Saviour says, "I am the true vine; I am the door." St. Paul says, "Our fathers drank of the rock that followed them, and that rock was Christ;" and, writing to the Corinthians, he affirms, that "he had fed them with milk." Can these passages be taken literally? Why then must we be forced to interpret our Saviour's words in a literal sense, when the meaning is both clearer and more natural, when taken in a figurative one? "Take, eat; thus, in like manner, shall my body be broken for you, for the remission of sins. This cup represents the signing of the New Testament with my blood; and as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew forth the Lord's death till he come," 1 Cor. xi. 23, &c.

PURGATORY.] This, they say, is a certain place, in which, as in a prison, after death, those souls, by the prayers of the faithful, are purged, which in this life could not be fully cleansed; no, not by the blood of Christ: and notwithstanding it is asserted in the scriptures, that "if we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," 1 John i. 9. This place of purgatory is in the power of the pope, who dispenses the indulgence, and directs the treasury of his merits, by which the pains are mitigated, and the deliverance hastened. For the tormented sufferers, in this ideal inquisition, his monks and friars say masses, all of whom must be paid for their trouble; because, No penny, no pater-noster; by which bubble the church of Rome amasses great wealth.

IDOLATROUS and CREATURE-WORSHIP.] In all the Romish worship, the blessed virgin is a principal object of adoration. She is stiled queen of Heaven, lady of the world, the only hope of sinners, queen of angels, patroness of men; advocate for sinners, mother of mercies; under which titles they desire her, by the power of a mother, to command her Son. In some prayers, they invoke God to bring them to heaven by the merits and mediation of the virgin Mary and all her saints, and that they may enjoy perpetual soundness both of body and mind, by her glorious intercession. Hence it might be imagined by a papist, that the sacred writings were full of encomiums on this pretended mother of God; whereas, on the contrary, we do not find Christ in any part of scripture called the Son of Mary, nor that he at any time calls her mother; and when the woman cried, "Blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the paps that thou hast sucked;" "Yea, (returns our Lord) rather blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it." Nor does our Saviour own any relation but that of a disciple; for when his mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him, Jesus answered, "Who are my mother and my brethren?" And looking round upon his disciples, he saith, "Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, the same is my brother, sister, and mother." Of the like strain are also their prayers to other saints and angels; by which they derogate from the honour of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, and transfer his offices to others; though the Scriptures expressly assert, there is but one mediator between God and man, who is sufficiently able to deliver and save, to the uttermost, all who by faith come unto him. Nor must we omit under this head the idolatry of the mass, in the elevation of the host, to which the poor deluded people kneel down, and which they, whatever their artful priests pretend to the contrary, solemnly adore and worship, agreeable to an express article of their creed, and the command of one of their popes, who enjoins that the host is to be worshipped in Latera, whereby the second commandment is infringed, which the Romish church have endeavoured as much as possible to suppress, and in many of their little manuals they leave it quite out.

PAPAL SOVEREIGNTY.] This is politically supported by a pretended Infallibility; Auricular Confession, founded upon the priest's power to forgive sins; Indulgences; Pretended Relics; Penance; Pardons; Strings of Beads, for Ave-Marys, and Paternosters; Celibacy; Merits and Works of Supererogation; Restrictions; Monkish Austerities; Religious Vows and Orders; Palms; Candles; decorated Images; Incense; Holy Water, or (as Mr. Fox in the preface to his third volume, more properly calls it) Conjuring Water; Christening of Bells; hallowed Flowers and Branches; Agnus Dei; Oblations; Consecrations; with a variety of other devices, tricks, and impositions; to which may be added certain

LUDICROUS FORMS and CEREMONIES.] At the feast of Christmas, in commemoration of the nativity of our blessed Lord, Roman Catholics have exhibited in their churches a cradle, with an image of an infant in it, which is rocked with great seeming devotion; and on Good-Friday they have the figure of our Saviour on the cross, and then they perform the service which they call the Tenebress; having abundance of lighted candles, all of which they extinguish one by one, hereby celebrating the darkness at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion: after which the body is taken down from the cross and put into a sepulchre, and men stand to watch it; with more of the same childish mummary that might be related, as if the Son of God came down from heaven to furnish men with a subject for dramatic representation.

STRANGE and CRUEL MAXIMS.] Papists hold, that heretics (for so they call the protestants) may not be termed children, or kindred.

By the heresy of the father, the child is freed from all obligations of natural obedience.

When a christian king becomes an heretic, his subjects are forthwith freed from their allegiance.

It is not lawful for christians to tolerate any king, who draweth his subjects into heresy.

They ought to endeavour to depose him, and set up another in his place.

They ought to expel him the kingdom as the enemy of Christ. This is the undoubted judgment of the most learned, and agreeable to apostolic truth.

Faith is not to be kept with heretics, and papists may have a dispensation, for the breach of oaths, or any secret practices against them, for the good of the Romish church; and it is lawful to torture, burn their bodies, or otherways kill them, for the good of their souls.

Now the above scheme of popery, if duly attended to, will convince every unprejudiced mind, that a mixture of paganism and judaism; absurdity and idolatry, run throughout the whole, and that it is a crafty design to establish a dominion over the consciences, persons, and properties, of it's deluded professors; yet all these false doctrines, and irreligious practices, the wretched slaves of papal tyranny are obliged to swallow down; and to doubt of one single iota is, according to the priest, damnable; for, says a Roman Catholic, at the close of his creed,

I acknowledge the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman church to be the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the pope of Rome who is Christ's vicar, and successor to St. Peter, the prince of the apostles.

I also, without doubt, receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and councils, especially by the holy synod of Trent; and all things contrary to them, with all heresies, condemned, rejected, and cursed by the church, I likewise reject, condemn, and curse.

Lastly. This true Catholic Faith, without which no man can be saved, which at present I freely hold and profess, I will (by God's help) constantly retain and confess, entire and inviolable, to my latest breath, and take care, to the utmost of my power, that the same shall be taught, held, and professed by all under me, and whose care shall belong to me in my office; so help me God, and the holy Evangelists.

Having thus given an account of the notorious corruptions and abuses which the Romish church has introduced into her complex system of absurdities and idolatries, we proceed to give a full and faithful display of the intolerant, cruel, and dreadful bloody spirit of popery, as exemplified in the persecutions, sufferings, and martyrdoms, of the persevering, holy, constant, and now blessed martyrs. Our general design is, to open the eyes of the lukewarm, to confirm weak and unlearned christians in their most holy faith, and to guard all who profess the faith of Christ, from the stratagems of those, who seek to draw them from the simplicity and truth of the everlasting gospel; and we submit the whole to the judgment of the candid reader, imploring that divine blessing, which is necessary to crown our labours, and every spiritual attempt, with such success, as may redound to the glory of God, and the eternal welfare of all our fellow Christians.

C H A P. I.

The ACCESSION of QUEEN MARY, and the various ALTERATIONS in RELIGION, TROUBLES in the STATE, and PERSECUTIONS in the CHURCH, that happened in ENGLAND, after her CORONATION, and in the First Year of her REIGN.

THE Roman Catholics assert, (and what will they not say to colour over their inhuman practices, and bloody deeds?) "That all those who suffered death, during the reign of Queen Mary, had been adjudged guilty of high treason, in consequence of their having stood up in defence of lady Jane Grey's title to the crown." To disprove this is no difficult matter, seeing every one, conversant in history, must know, that those who are tried on the statute of the 25th of Edward I. Chap. 26, are to be hanged and quartered; but with what assurance can even a Papist affirm, that ever a man in England was burned for high treason? We admit, that some few suffered death in the ordinary way of process at common law, for their adherence to lady Jane; but none of those were burned. Why, if they were traitors, take them before the bishops, who have no power to judge in criminal cases? Nay, allowing the bishops to have had power to judge, yet their own bloody statute did not give them power to execute; otherwise, why were they obliged to certify to the chancellor, that the accused person was a heretic, before they could obtain a warrant for his execution? The proceedings against the martyrs are still extant, and they were carried on directly according to the forms prescribed by their own statute. We thought it necessary to premise thus much, that our British youth may not be led away by popish insinuations; for if you will but consider, they will be convinced, that the popish assertion is false. There was not one of those who were burned in England, ever accused of high treason, much less were they tried at common law. And this should teach young persons to value a history of transactions in their own country, particularly of their Blessed Martyrs, in order that they may be able to detect the falsehoods advanced by Romish priests, and their numerous emissaries. Having said thus much, by way of caution, we shall, without farther preface, enter upon the narrative, which, as we have promised, shall be a NEW and COMPLETE HISTORY of the Acts and Monuments of our glorious Martyrs.

During the time that king Edward VI. was afflicted by a long illness, a marriage was provided, concluded, and solemnized in the month of May, between the lord Guildford, son to the duke of Northumberland, and the lady Jane, daughter of the duke of Suffolk; whose mother, being then alive, was daughter to Mary, king Henry's second sister, who was first married to the French king, and afterwards to Charles, duke of Suffolk. The marriage being consummated, and the king growing every day worse, he was prevailed upon to set aside, by his last will and testament, his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to leave his crown to lady Jane, the duke of Suffolk's daughter.

To this order subscribed all the king's council, and the chief of the nobility, the lord mayor and city of London, and almost all the judges and principal lawyers of the realm, except justice Hales of Kent, a true protestant, and upright judge, who, having given his consent to the lady Mary's being queen, would upon no account therefore subscribe to the lady Jane. How he was rewarded for his integrity by Mary, will be seen in the sequel. But the objections made by others in the realm against lady Mary's reigning were, because they feared she would marry with a foreigner, and by that means entangle the crown; and it was generally believed, that she would bring in the pope, and quite alter the religion, used both in the days of her father king Henry, and in those of her brother Edward VI. which afterwards came to pass.

What gave rise to this conjecture, was the great stubbornness she shewed and declared in her brother's days, as evidently appears from those letters that passed between her, king Edward, and the council. Not long after this, through the violence of his illness, that most hopeful prince, Edward VI. departed this life; immediately after whose death, lady Jane Gray was, by the consent of the nobles, proclaimed queen, in London and other popular cities, and was there so acknowledged and called.

There was little difference in age between this young lady, and king Edward; but as to learning and knowledge of the languages, she was not only equal, but superior to him, having had the advantage of a man of most excellent learning for her tutor; and had her fortune been equal to her fine wit and education, no doubt she would have been comparable, not only to the most eminent among women, but even to men of the University, who had taken several degrees there in the schools.

In the mean time, while those things were upon the anvil, and working in London, lady Mary, having received advice of her brother's death, wrote to the lords of the council in the stile and manner following.

The Lady Mary's Letter to the Lords of the Council, claiming the Crown upon her Brother's Decease.

My Lords,

WE greet you well, and have received sure advertisement, that our dearest brother the king, our late sovereign lord, is departed to God's mercy, which news how woeful they be unto our heart, he only knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must and do humbly submit us and our wills. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his majesty's departure and death, concerning the crown and governance of this realm of England, with the title of France, and all things thereto belonging, what hath been provided by act of parliament, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances advancing our right, you you know, the realm, and the whole world knoweth, the rolls and records appear by the authority of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subjects of this realm; so that we verily trust, that there is no good true subject that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we have of ourselves caused, and, as God shall aid and strengthen us, shall cause our right and title in this behalf to be published and proclaimed accordingly. And albeit this so weighty a matter seemeth strange, that our said brother dying upon Thursday at night last past, we hitherto had no knowledge from you thereof, yet we consider your wisdoms and prudence to be such, that having estfoons [quickly] amongst you debated, pondered, and well weighed this present case with our estate, with your own estate, the commonwealth and all our honours, we shall and may conceive great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loyalty and service, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst; and that ye will, like noblemen, work the best. Nevertheless, we are not ignorant of your consultations, to undo the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible, wherewith ye be assembled and prepared, by whom, and to what end, God and you know, and nature cannot but fear some evil. But be it that some consideration politic, or whatsoever thing else hath moved you thereto, yet doubt you not, my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right ready to remit and fully pardon the same, and that freely to eschew bloodshed and vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredly you will take and accept this grace and virtue in good part as appertaineth, and that we shall not be enforced to use the service of other our true subjects and friends, which, in this our just and right cause, God, in whom our whole assiance is, shall send us. Wherefore, my lords, we require you, and charge you, and every of you, that of your allegiance which you owe to God and us, and to none other, for our honour and the surety of our person only employ yourselves, and forthwith, upon receipt hereof, cause our right and title to the crown and government of this realm to be proclaimed in our city of London and other places, as to your wisdom shall seem good, and as to this case appertaineth, not failing hereof, as our very trust is in you. And this our letter, signed with our hand, shall be your sufficient warrant on this behalf. Given under our signet, at our manor of Kening-hall, the 9th of July, 1553."

To this Letter of the Lady Mary, the Lords of the Council returned the following Answer.

MADAM, we have received your letters, the 9th of this instant, declaring your supposed titles which you judge yourself to have to the imperial crown of this realm, and all the dominions thereunto belonging. For answer whereof, this is to advertise you, that forasmuch as our sovereign lady queen Jane is, after the death of our sovereign lord king Edward VI. a prince of most noble memory, invested and possessed with the just and right title to the imperial crown of this realm, not only by good order of ancient laws of this realm, but also by our late sovereign lord's letters patent, signed with his own hand, and sealed with the great seal of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, judges, with divers other grave and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound duty and allegiance, assent unto her said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithful subjects cannot) fall into grievous and unspeakable enormities. Wherefore we can no less do, but, for the quiet both of the realm and you also, to advertise you, that forasmuch as the divorce made between the king of famous memory, king Henry VIII. and the lady Katherine your mother, was necessary to be had both by the everlasting laws of God, and also by the ecclesiastical laws, and by the most part of the noble and learned universities of Christendom, and confirmed also by the fundry acts of parliament remaining yet in their force, and thereby you justly made illegitimate, and unhereditary to the crown imperial of this realm, and the rules, and dominions, and possessions of the same, you will upon just confideration hereof, and of divers other causes lawful to be alleged for the same, and for the just inheritance of the right line and goodly order taken by the late king our sovereign lord king Edward VI. and agreed upon by the nobles and great personages aforesaid, surcease by any pretence to vex and molest any of our sovereign lady queen Jane her subjects, from their true faith and allegiance due unto her grace: assuring you, that if you will for respect shew yourself quiet and obedient (as you ought), you shall find us all and several ready to do you any service that we with duty may, and glad with your quietness to preserve the common state of this realm, wherein you may be otherwise grievous unto us, to yourself, and to them. And thus we bid you most heartily well to fare.

From the Tower of London, in this 9th of July, 1553.

"Your ladyship's friends, shewing yourself an obedient subject,

Thomas Canterbury	Henry Arundel	R. Cotton
The Marquis of	Shrewsbury	John Gates
Winchester	Pembroke	W. Peter
John Bedford	Cobham	W. Cecil
Wm. Northampton	R. Rich	John Cheek
Tho. Ely Chancellor	Huntington	John Mason
Northumberland	Darcy	Edward North
Henry Suffolk	Cheyney	R. Bowes."

All these persons, except the duke of Northumberland, and Sir John Gates, were afterwards by a special or general pardon discharged.

Lady Mary, after having received the above answer, and perceiving thereby the lords' minds, made haste privately out of London, relying chiefly upon the good will of the commons, and not destitute altogether of secret advertisements from some of the nobles. When the council heard of her sudden departure, and resolute conduct, and perceiving that things went not according to their late expectations, they gathered speedily a body of troops together, and fixed upon the duke of Suffolk, for their general; but afterwards changing their minds, they thought it best to let the duke of Suffolk keep the Tower where lord Guildford and lady Jane then lodged, and to send the duke of Northumberland, with several other lords and gentlemen. In which expedition, notwithstanding the guards were very unwilling to march at first, yet, through the persuasion and importunity of the lord treasurer Cholmei, and others, they were at last induced to assist the duke, and to set forward with him.

These things thus agreed upon, the duke marched from London after the best manner, having both his times and journey prescribed him by the council, that he might not do any thing but upon warrant. In the mean time lady Mary, fatigued with travelling up and down, and considering where to fix most for her advantage, withdrew at length into the quarters of Norfolk and Suffolk, where, on account of his having subdued the rebels in her brother's reign, she understood the name of Northumberland was very much hated; and procuring to herself aid and assistance, on every side, as she could, she kept herself close for a time within Framingham castle.

At this place first resorted to her the men of Suffolk, who being among the number of the most zealous reformers, promised her their support, but with this stipulation, that Mary should not attempt to alter that religion which, by laws and orders publicly enacted, was established in her brother king Edward's days, and which had been generally received by the consent of the whole realm. With this condition she readily complied, and knowing that faith is not to be kept with heretics, she scrupled not to promise them faithfully, upon the word of a queen, that no innovation should be made in religion; which promise had she as religiously kept, as they did willingly engage to protect and preserve her, at the expence of their lives, she had acted worthy of her high descent, and made her reign more stable through future tranquillity; for let a king or queen, or any private person, be ever so powerful, yet breach of promise is an ill supporter of peace and quietness, fear worse, cruelty worst of all.

However, lady Mary, thus powerfully guarded and faithfully assisted, for the present, vanquished the duke, and and all lady Jane's adherents. In consideration whereof, when the Suffolk protestants afterwards reminded their most gracious queen Mary of her promise, she made them the following severe and ungrateful reply: "Forasmuch (said she) as you, being but the members, desire to rule your head, you shall one day well perceive, that members must obey their head, and not look to bear rule over the same." And with a view of striking greater terror into others, a certain gentleman, near Windham side, named Dobbe, for advertising her by a humble petition of her promise, was punished with standing three times in the pillory. Many others were likewise imprisoned, for having delivered her books and supplications, collected out of the scriptures, thereby exhorting her to continue in the true reformed religion then established.

But to return to the duke of Northumberland, who, having his warrant under the broad seal, proceeded on his march; but his short journeys, assigned him by commission, and the tedious delays in his rout, added an increasing strength to lady Mary's cause, especially as, at this time, the hearts of the people began to be much inclined to her; which, when the council at London perceived, and understood how the common people began to withdraw from them to her, as did also several of the nobility, they forthwith changed their measures, and proclaimed for queen lady Mary, eldest daughter to Henry VIII. appointed by parliament to succeed, king Edward dying without issue. As to the duke of Northumberland, he was left destitute and forsaken at Cambridge. Upon this he proclaimed Mary queen; yet this piece of policy did him no service; for he was arrested, as were likewise some of his sons, and the earl of Huntington, with a few others; who were all sent to the Tower, as traitors to the crown.

Thus was lady Mary seated on the throne of England, who, to a disagreeable person and weak mind, had united bigotry, superstition, and cruelty. She seems to have inherited more of her mother's, than her father's qualities. Henry was fiery, rough, and ungovernable; but Catherine, with a severe and implacable rancour against protestants, assumed the character of a saint. It was the same with her daughter Mary, as appears from a letter in her own hand writing, now in the British Museum. In this letter, which is addressed to bishop Gardiner, she declares her fixed intention of burning every protestant; and it contains an insinuation, that, as soon as circumstances would permit, she would restore back to the church the lands that had been taken from the convents. This was the strongest instance of her weakness that she could shew; for the convents had been demolished, except a few of their churches; and the rents were in the hands of the first nobility, who, rather than part with them, would have overturned the government, both in church and state. But reason and bigotry cannot accord. That narrowness of spirit, which always distinguishes a weak mind from one that has been enlarged by education, pervaded all the actions of this princess. Unacquainted with the constitution of the country, and a slave to superstition, Mary thought to domineer over the rights of private judgment, and to trample on the privileges of mankind.

No sooner had this queen, by the Suffolk protestants, the sword of authority put into her hand, than she began to employ it against those who had supported the title of lady Jane Gray. This devoted victim remained with her husband, lord Guildford, almost five months in the Tower, waiting her pleasure. But the duke of Northumberland, within a month after his confinement there, was condemned, brought to the scaffold, and beheaded, notwithstanding a promise made him of his life, if he would but renounce his religion and hear mass; which he not only did, but also exhorted the people to return to the catholic faith. The Papists immediately published and spread abroad his recantation: but the duke, in consequence of his crimes arising from a fordid ambition, died unpitied; nay, he was insulted on the scaffold by those who remembered in what manner he had acted to their beloved Somerset. It may be proper to observe, this duke of Northumberland was not of the great Percy family, which at that time was under a cloud; but he was the grandson of that Dudley, who was executed in the year 1509, for having acted inconsistent with the common law.

The execution of this nobleman was followed with that of sir Thomas Palmer, and sir John Gates; the former of whom confessed his faith in the reformed religion, and lamented that he had not lived more conformably thereto. Queen Mary having begun her reign with the blood of these men, and with hearing mass in the Tower, and having also released from thence Stephen Gardiner; were sufficient indications to the protestant part of the nation, that she would not perform what she had promised the Suffolk men; and besides these ill omens, there were other things, which every day more and more discomfited the people, and which plainly declared the queen to bear no good will to the reformation. Gardiner was not only released, but made lord chancellor, and bishop of Winchester, by turning out Dr. Poynt; Bonner was made bishop of London, by displacing good Dr. Ridley; Dr. Day was promoted to the bishopric of Durham, by putting out Scory; Dr. Tonstal to the bishopric of Chichester; Dr. Heath to that of Worcester; Hooper was committed to the fleet; and Dr. Vesie was made bishop of Exeter, by displacing Miles Coverdale: all which changes, and transactions, being particularly noted, occasioned great heaviness to all good men, and, on the other hand, great rejoicing to the wicked. In which discord of minds, and diversity of affections, there was now to be seen a miserable prospect of things throughout the whole nation; for they who could dissemble, cared not how matters went; but such as were conscientious, and had any regard to the truth, perceived fires to be already kindled, and which would be the destruction of many a sincere christian; which indeed afterwards came to pass. Mary having thus laid the foundation of her bloody reign, removed to Hampton-court from the Tower, and caused a parliament to be summoned, against the 10th of October next ensuing, of which more hereafter.

Amongst the bishops who were removed, we noticed Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, a learned and pious prelate, who in the time of queen Jane, by order of the council, preached a sermon at Paul's Cross, declaring therein his opinion concerning the lady Mary, and dissuading them by alledging the inconveniences that might arise by admitting her to the crown, prophesying, as it were, before that, which afterwards came to pass, namely that she would bring in a foreign power to reign over them, and subvert the christian religion then happily established; shewing moreover, that, the lady Mary being in his diocese, he, according to his duty, as being then her ordinary, had done his endeavours to reform her to this religion, and notwithstanding in all other points of civility she shewed herself gentle and tractable, yet in matters that concerned true faith and doctrine, she appeared perverse and obstinate; that he could perceive no other hopes of her, but that she would disturb and overturn all that had been planted and confirmed with so much industry in the reign of her brother king Edward. Soon after this sermon was preached, the lady Mary was proclaimed queen, whereupon Dr. Ridley forthwith repaired to salute her at Fremingham Castle, where he met with cold entertainment, and being deprived of all his dignity, was sent back upon a lame halting horse to the Tower.

The Sunday following Mr. Rogers preached, discouraging very learnedly on the gospel for the day: whereupon queen Mary, perceiving things not to go forward according to her mind, forthwith devised and consulted with her council how to bring about by other means, what by open law she could not well accomplish; and accordingly directed forth a prohibition by proclamation that no man should preach or read openly the word of God in churches, with several other things contained in the proclamation.

Near this period, or not long before, Mr. Bourn, a canon of St. Paul's, and who was afterwards made bishop of of Bath, being appointed by Bonner, then bishop of London, to preach at Paul's Crofs, he took occasion, from the gospel of the day, to speak largely in justification of Bonner, who was then present, by saying, that Bonner, four years ago, had preached from the same text, and in the same place, for which he was most cruelly and unjustly cast into that most vile dungeon the Marshalsea, where he was confined, during king Edward's reign. His words had such an ill effect upon the hearers, as to cause them to murmur and stir in such a sort, that the mayor and aldermen then present feared much an uproar; indeed, so great was the popular resentment, that one hurled a dagger at Mr. Bourn, but who the person was could not be then ascertained, though he was afterwards discovered. In short, the tumult became so violent, that the preacher was silenced, broke off his discourse, and durst no more appear in that place; for the matter of his discourse tended much to the dispraise of king Edward, which the people could in no wise endure. Then Mr. Bradford, being in the pulpit, stood forth, at the request of Mr. Bourn's brother, and spoke so mildly and effectually to the people, that with a few words he pacified them. This done, he and Mr. Rogers conducted Mr. Bourn betwixt them to the Grammar-school door, where they left him safe; for which prudent and humane conduct, they were both, shortly after, rewarded with long imprisonment, and at last with fire in Smithfield.

While the parliament was employed in paving the way for the introduction of popish superstition, the clergy also had, after their usual manner, a convocation at St. Paul's church, London, where the queen appointed a disputation to be held, on the 18th of October. In this convocation, Mr. John Harpsfield, bachelor of divinity, preached a sermon to the clergy; after which, for the sake of order, they proceeded to the choice of a prolocutor or speaker. To this office, Dr. Weston, dean of Westminster, was appointed by unanimous consent, and presented to the bishops, Mr. Pie, dean of Winchester, and Mr. Wimbisley, archdeacon of London, delivering at the same time an oration. Dr. Weston then made his gratulatory speech to the house, and was answered with another by bishop Bonner. They next entered upon the disputation, concerning the matter of the sacrament instituted by Christ, at his last supper with his disciples, which disputation continued six days successively, wherein Dr. Weston was chief on the side of popery, who behaved himself outrageously in taunting and checking; in so much, that they who disputed on the other side, in defence of the doctrines of the reformation, were compelled, some to fly, some to deny, some to die; but in the judgment of most men who heard the debate, they had the better in point of argument, as may appear by the report of the said disputation, a true copy, and faithful account whereof, will be the subject of our next chapter.

C H A P. II.

Account of a PUBLIC THEOLOGICAL DISPUTATION, maintained in the CONVOCATION-HOUSE, at St. PAUL'S, LONDON, and appointed by the Queen's Special Command, October 18th, 1553.

THE Report. Whereas divers and uncertain rumours be spread abroad of the disputation had in the convocation house; to the intent that all men may know the things therein done and said, he that was present hath, at request, thoroughly described what was said therein on both parties of the matters argued and had in question.

The First, Second, and Third Days Act.

The subject for debate first stated by the Prolocutor, in his address to the Convocation.

On Wednesday, October 18, the prolocutor, Dr. Weston, certified the house, it was the queen's pleasure, that the learned men there assembled should debate matters of religion, and for that end constitute laws, which her grace and the parliament would ratify. And because (said he) there was a book lately published, called the Catechism (which he produced) bearing the name of this synod, and yet put forth without your consents, as I have learned; being a book very pestiferous, and full of heresies, and likewise an abominable book of Common Prayer; I thought it best, therefore, first to begin with the articles of the Catechism, concerning the sacrament of the altar, for confirming the natural presence of Christ in the same, and also transubstantiation: wherefore, it shall be lawful, on Friday next ensuing, for all men freely to speak their consciences in these matters, that all doubts may be removed, and they fully justified therein.

On the 20th of October, when it was expected they should have entered into disputation of the questions proposed, the prolocutor exhibiting two bills to the house, the one for the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, and the other concerning the catechism, that it was not published by the consent of that house. Whereunto the whole house accordingly assented, except six, viz. the dean of Rochester, the dean of Exeter, the archdeacon of Winchester, archdeacon of Hereford, archdeacon of Stow, and one more. Mr. Philpot spoke concerning the articles of the Catechism, but when he saw his allegations were to no purpose, he made it his request to the prolocutor, that there might be an equality of persons concerned in this disputation, he desired that the prolocutor would intercede with the lords, that some of those men that were learned, and occasioned the publishing of the catechism aforesaid, might be admitted into the house to shew their learning that moved them to set forth the same, and that Dr. Ridley and Mr. Rogers, with two or three more, might have the liberty of being present at this disputation, and associating with them.

This request was thought reasonable, and was proposed to the bishops, who returned this answer; That it was out of their power to call such persons to the house, since some of them were prisoners; but they said, they would petition the council in this behalf, and in case any of them were absent that ought to be of the house, they were for their being admitted. After this, it was signified unto the prolocutor, that the lord great master and the earl of Devonshire would be present at the disputations, and therefore he deferred the same till Monday, at one o'clock in the afternoon.

At the time appointed the prolocutor made a protestation, that the members of that house had appointed this public disputation, not to call the truth in question, to which they had subscribed; except five or six, but gain-sayers and heretics might be resolved respecting their doubts.

The prolocutor demanded of Mr. Haddon whether he would reason against the questions that had been proposed; and Mr. Haddon replied, he would not. To which Mr. Elmar added, that they had done too much prejudice already to the truth, by their subscribing before the subjects were discussed. Mr. Weston turning to Mr. Cheyney, desired to know, whether he would propose his doubts concerning transubstantiation. Mr. Cheyney answered, "I should be glad my doubts were resolved."

"The first of these arose from what St. Paul writes to the Corinthians, who, speaking of the body and blood of Christ, calls it bread after consecration.

"The second from a passage out of Origen, who speaking of this sacrament, saith, that the material part thereof goeth down to the excrements.

"The third is out of Theodoret, who, speaking of the sacramental elements, after consecration, affirmeth, that they go not out of their former substance, form, and shape. These, among several others, are the doubts I require to be resolved."

Then the prolocutor having appointed Dr. Moreman to answer, he began with observing, that the sacrament ment is called by St. Paul bread indeed, by which he meant the form of bread; but Mr. Cheyney alledged, that Hesychius called the sacrament both bread and flesh.

Yes, replied Moreman, Hesychius called it bread, because it was bread, not because it is so. Then, passing over Origen, he said, that men mistook the authority of Theodoret, by interpreting a general into a special, as Peter Martyr had done, taking the Greek word, that signifies substance in its special signification, whereas, in the general, it may be applied to accidents, as well as substance; and therefore (said he) I answer Theodoret thus, that sacramental bread and wine do not go out of their former substance, form, and shape, (that is) not out of their accidental substance and shape.

After this, Mr. Cheyney sat down, and Mr. Elmar, who could not endure to hear so weak and childish an answer to so grave an authority, arose, declaring, that Moreman's answer to Theodoret was only an illusion, or mere subtle evasion, contrary to Theodoret's meaning; for if the Greek word, that signifies substance, should, in the passage quoted, be taken for accident, then it was a superfluous word, especially, where there are two other Greek words, which sufficiently expound the accidents of the bread: and he proved out of the same author, by divers allegations, that the Greek word that signified substance in Theodoret, could not be so generally taken in that place; but Moreman still affirmed, that the Greek word that signified substance, must needs signify accidental substance properly. To whose obstinacy, since he could obtain no better proof, Elmar gave place.

Upon which, Mr. John Philpot stood up, and said, he could make it appear, from the whole subject matter, in the place alledged, and from the similitude Theodoret uses, for proving his purpose, that Moreman's explanation of the Greek word for substance, could by no means be taken in the sense he would interpret it: for, he observed, Theodoret was in that place arguing against the heretic Eutiches, who denied two natures of substance to remain in Christ as one person, and that his humanity, after the accomplishment of the mystery of our salvation, ascending into heaven, and being joined to the divinity, was absorbed thereby; so that, according to his opinion, Christ was no more but of one divine substance only; against which opinion Theodoret writeth, and by the similitude of the sacrament proveth the contrary against that heretic; for like as in the sacrament of the body of Christ, after the consecration, there is the substance of Christ's humanity, with the substance of the bread remaining as before, not being absorbed by the humanity of Christ, but by divine operation joined thereunto, even so, in the person of Christ, being now in heaven, of whom this sacrament is a representation, there being two several substances, his humanity and divinity, united in one hypostacy or person, which is Christ; the humanity not being absorbed by the conjunction of the divinity, but remaining in it's former substance: and Theodoret's similitude, continued Mr. Philpot, would prove nothing, if the substance of the sacramental bread remained not as it did before. The heretic therefore, according to Dr. Moreman's interpretation, would have a strong argument to support his error, and to prove himself an orthodox christian, might say to Theodoret thus; Like as thou Theodoret, if thou wert of Dr. Moreman's mind, dost say that, after the consecration in the sacrament, the substance of the bread is changed into the human body of Christ, coming thereunto, so that in the sacrament there is but one substance of the humanity alone, and not the substance of bread as it was before; even so, likewise, may I affirm and conclude from thine own similitude, that the humanity ascending up by the power of God into heaven, and adjoined to deity, was absorbed, and turned into one substance with the deity; so that there remaineth but one divine substance in Christ, no more than in the sacramental signs of the Lord's supper, after the consecration, doth remain any more than one substance, according to your belief and construction. In attempting to answer this, Dr. More-man was so closely pressed, that he began to stagger; which Philpot perceiving spake in this manner, "Well master Moreman, if you have no answer ready at present, consider of one, if you can conveniently, against our next meeting."

At these words the prolocutor was exceedingly offended and troubled, telling him, that he should not brag there, but be fully answered. To which Philpot returned, "It is the only thing I desire, to be answered directly on this point of dispute; and I request of you, and of all the house here present, that I may be sufficiently answered, which I am sure you cannot do, taking Theodoret's authority, and similitude, as they ought to be taken." Whereupon, without any further reply, or answer to his reasoning, Philpot was commanded to be silent.

After he had sat down, the dean of Rochester arose, offering to dispute against the natural presence, wishing that the scriptures, and the ancient doctors, might be weighed, believed, and followed, in this point. And he thought a sufficient argument against it, was that saying of Christ, in St. Matthew, where he says, that the poor we should have always with us, but him we should not have always, which the dean said, was spoken concerning the natural presence of Christ's body, and therefore Christ cannot be naturally present on earth in the sacrament of the altar. To this the prolocutor answered, that we should not have Christ present always to exercise alms deeds, but upon the poor.

The dean then prosecuted his argument, and quoted St. Austin to prove, that the same interpretation of the scripture alledged by Mr. Weston was no sufficient answer; for St. Austin, in the 50th treatise on St. John, speaketh thus on the same sentence; "When Christ said, Me ye shall not have always with you, he spake of the presence of his body. For by his majesty, by his providence, by his unspeakable and invisible grace, that is fulfilled which is said of him, Behold I am with you until the consummation of the world. But in the flesh which the word took upon him, in that which was born of the virgin, in that which was apprehended by the Jews, which was crucified on the cross, which was let down from the cross, which was wrapped in cloths, which was hid in the sepulchre, which was manifested in the resurrection, you shall not have me always with you. And why? For after a bodily presence he was conversant with his disciples forty days, and they accompanying him, seeing and not following him, he ascended and is not here; for there he sitteth at the right hand of the Father; and yet here he is, because he is not departed in the presence of his majesty. After another manner we have Christ always by the presence of his majesty; but after the presence of his flesh it is rightly said, you shall not verily have me always with you. For the church had him in the presence of his flesh a few days, and now by faith it apprehendeth him, and seeth him not with eyes."

To this authority Dr. Watson answered, and said, he would answer St. Augustine by St. Augustine, and having a certain book in his hand of notes, he alledged out of the 70th treatise of St. John, that after that mortal condition and manner we have not now Christ on earth, as he was heretofore before his passion.

Mr. Philpot replied, saying, that Mr. Watson had not fully answered St. Augustine by St. Augustine, for that in the place mentioned by the dean of Rochester, he doth not only treat of the mortal state of Christ's body before his passion, but also the immortal condition of the same after his resurrection: in which mortal body St. Augustine seemeth plainly to affirm, that Christ is not present upon the earth, neither in form visibly, neither in corporal substance invisibly, as in a few lines after the place above alledged, St. Augustine doth more plainly declare by these words, "Now these two manners of Christ's presence declared, which is by his majesty, providence, and grace, now present in the world, which before his ascension was present in the flesh; and which being now placed at the right hand of the Father, is absent from the world, I think there remains no further dispute about the matter."

Therefore if St. Augustine allowed no other presence of Christ here on earth, but only his divine presence, and that his humanity was in heaven, we ought to confess and believe the same. But if we put a third presence of Christ, that is, corporally to be present always in the sacrament of the altar, invisibly, according to your suppositions, whereof St. Augustine maketh no mention in all his works, you seem to judge that which St. Augustine did never comprehend.

Why, said Watson, does not St. Augustine, in the place I alledged, make mention how St. Stephen, being in this world, saw Christ after his ascension?

It is true, said Philpot, but he saw Christ, as the scripture saith, in the heavens, being open, standing at the right hand of God the Father: at which Watson was silent.

The dean proceeded to support his argument, and, to this end, read out of a book of annotations sundry authorities, to which Moreman, who was appointed to answer him, made no direct answer, but desired him to frame an argument, saying, the dean had recited many doctors' words, but had not made one argument. Thus challenged, the dean made the following argument from the institution of the sacrament; "Do this in remembrance of me; and thus ye shall shew forth the Lord's death till he come."

The sacrament is the remembrance of Christ: therefore, the sacrament is not very Christ; for as yet he is not come, for these words, "until he come," do plainly signify the absence of Christ's body. Then the prolocutor went about to shew, that these words, "until he come," did not import any absence of Christ on the earth, by other places of scripture, where the word, "until," was made use of: but directly to the purpose he answered nothing. In fine, the dean questioned Moreman, whether Christ did eat the paschal lamb with his disciples, or not? He answered, Yes. He further demanded, whether upon instituting the sacrament, he did likewise eat the sacrament with them? Moreman answered, Yes. Then he asked what he did eat, and whether he did eat his own natural body, as they imagined it to be, or not? Which when Moreman had affirmed, then, said the dean, it is a great absurdity by you granted; and so he sat down.

Afterwards the prolocutor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would argue against the natural presence, or not? He answered, Yes, if he would hear his argument without interruption, and assign one to answer him, and not many, which occasioned confusion, and especially to him who had but a bad memory. By this time the night approached: on which account the prolocutor put an end to the disputation, and appointed Mr. Philpot to begin the same the next day, concerning the presence of Christ in the sacrament.

The FOURTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Wednesday, October 25th, Mr. John Philpot was prepared to enter upon the disputation, intending first, to have made an oration in Latin; which being known by the prolocutor, he commanded him to make no declaration or oration in Latin, but to deliver his arguments in English. This is contrary, said Philpot, to your order at the beginning of this disputation: for then you appointed that all the arguments should be made in Latin, and thereupon I have drawn and devised all mine arguments in Latin; and because you Mr. Prolocutor, have said heretofore, openly in this house, that I had no learning, I intended to shew such learning as I have, in a brief oration, and short declaration of the questions now in controversy, thinking it so most convenient also, that in case I should speak otherwise in my declaration than should stand with learning, or than I were able to warrant and justify by God's word, it might the better be reformed by such as were learned of the house, so that the unlearned being present, might take the less offence thereat. But this prevailed nothing with the prolocutor, who still insisted upon his forming an argument in English, or else to hold his peace.

Then, said Philpot, you have much disappointed me, thus suddenly, to go from your former order: but I will accomplish your commandments, leaving mine oration apart, and I will come to my arguments, which, as well as so sudden a warning will serve, I will make in English. But before I bring forth any argument, I will in one word declare what manner of presence I disallow in the sacrament, to the intent the hearers may the better understand to what end and effect mine arguments shall tend; not to deny utterly the presence of Christ in his sacrament, truly ministered according to his institution, but only to deny that gross and carnal presence, which you of this house have already subscribed unto, to be in the sacrament of the altar, contrary to the true and manifest meaning of the scriptures: that by transubstantiation of the sacramental bread and wine, Christ's natural body should, by virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, be contained and included under the forms or accidents of bread and wine. This kind of presence imagined by men, I do deny, and against this I will reason. But before he could make an end of what he was about, he was interrupted by the prolocutor, and commanded to descend to his argument; at whose unjust importunity Philpot being offended, and hoping to find remedy, fell down upon his knees before the earls and lords which were there present, being a great number, wherof some were of the queen's council, beseeching them that he might have liberty to prosecute his arguments without interruption, which was readily granted by the lords. But the prolocutor making use of a point of the practice of prelates, would not condescend to it, but still cried, "Hold your peace, or else make a short argument." "I intend it," said Philpot, "if you will let me alone: but first I must ask a question of my respondent, Dr. Chedsey, concerning a word or two of your supposition, that is, of the sacrament of the altar, what he meaneth thereby." Dr. Chedsey answered, that, in their supposition, they took the sacrament of the altar, and the sacrament of the mass, to be all one. Then, said Mr. Philpot, by Mr. Prolocutor's leave, I will speak plain English, and to be short, I say, that the sacrament of the altar, which ye reckon to be all one with the mass, once justly abolished, but now put in full force again, is no sacrament, neither is Christ in any manner present in it, and this he offered to prove before the queen, the council, or before six of the most learned men of that house, of a contrary opinion, and refused none: If, (said he) I shall not be able, by God's words, to maintain what I have asserted, and confound those six who shall withstand me in this point, let me be burdened with as many faggots as can be found in London, before the court-gate. This he spake with the utmost zeal and courage.

At this the prolocutor, with many others, were very much offended, demanding of him, whether he knew what he said. Yes, replied Mr. Philot, I know very well what I say, and I desire that no man may be offended at it, for I speak no more than by the word of God I am able to prove; and praised be God, that the queen's grace hath granted us of this house (as our prolocutor hath informed us) the free liberty of declaring our opinions, agreeable to our consciences in these matters of controversy in religion; and therefore I will here freely speak the dictates of my conscience, grounded upon God's holy word for the truth, although some of you here present do not like it.

Then Mr. Weston, with others, taunted and reproved him, for speaking so indecently against the sacrament of the mass. The prolocutor also told him he was mad, and threatened to send him to prison.

Mr. Philpot hearing himself abused, and not permitted the free liberty to speak his mind, thus exclaimed, casting his eyes towards heaven, O Lord! what a world is this, that the truth of thy holy word cannot be spoken and endured! And while he said these words, being full of sorrow, the tears were seen to trickle from his eyes.

The prolocutor, being moved by some that were about him, consented that he should make an argument provided that he would be brief. I will be as short (said Philpot) as I can conveniently, in uttering all I have to say. And, first, I will lay the foundation of my arguments upon the authority of scripture, whereon all the buildings of our faith ought to be grounded; after which, I intend to confirm the same by the ancient fathers of the church. My first argument is drawn from the 28th chapter of St. Matthew, in which the angel says to Mary, who sought for Christ at the sepulchre, "He is risen, he is not here;" and again, St. Luke, chapter 23d, the angel asketh them, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" In which places the scripture testifieth, that Christ was risen, ascended into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of the Father: all which is spoken of his natural body; therefore it cannot be on earth included in the sacrament. I will confirm this yet more effectually, from the 16th of St. John, where Christ saith, "I came from my Father into the world, and now I leave the world and go to my Father." Which coming and going he meant of his natural body; therefore we may consequently affirm, that it is not found in the world, nor can be in the sacrament.

But I expect here to be answered with a blind distinction; that he is visibly departed in his humanity, but remaineth invisibly in the sacrament; but that no such idle distinction can take away the force of my argument, will appear from the answer which Christ's disciples returned, saying, "Now thou speakest plainly, and utterest no proverb;" which words St. Cyril interpreting saith, that our Saviour spake without any ambiguity, or figure of speech, and therefore I do from thence conclude, that if Christ spake plainly, and without parable, then that obscure, dark, and imperceptible presence of Christ's natural body remaining in the sacrament invisibly upon earth, contrary to the plain words of Christ, ought not to be allowed; for nothing can be more uncertain, parabolical, and absurd, than so to say. I will now give attention to your answer, and then descend to confirm what I have said by ancient writers.

Then Dr. Chedsey, reciting his argument as it was made, took upon him to answer every part thereof severally. First, to the saying of the angel, That Christ is not here: and, Why seek ye the living among the dead? He answered, that these sayings pertained nothing to the presence of Christ's natural body in the sacrament, but that they were spoke of Christ's body being in the sepulchre, when the three Marys thought him to have been in the grave still. And therefore the angel said, Why do you seek him that liveth, among the dead? And to the authority of St. John, where Christ saith, Now I leave the world and go to my Father; he meant that of his ascension. And so likewise did Cyril, interpreting the saying of the disciples, that knew plainly that Christ would visibly ascend into heaven; but that doth not exclude the invisible presence of his natural body in the sacrament. For St. Chrysostom, writing to the people of Antioch, doth affirm the same, comparing Elias and Christ together, and Elias's cloak, and Christ's flesh. "When Elias (saith he) was taken up in the fiery chariot, he left his cloak behind him unto his disciple Elisæus. But Christ ascending into heaven, took his flesh with him, and left also his flesh behind him." From whence we may justly conclude, that Christ's flesh is visibly ascended into heaven, and abideth still invisibly in the sacrament of the altar.

To this Philpot replied, and said, You have not directly answered to the saying of the angel. Christ is risen, and is not here, because you have omitted that which was the chief point of all. For, said he, I proceed further, as thus, He is risen, ascended, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father, therefore, he is not remaining on earth. Neither is your answer to Cyril, by me alledged, sufficient. But I will presently return to your interpretation of Cyril and plainly declare it after I have refuted the authority of Chrysostom, which is one of the chief principles that you alledged to make for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament; which being well weighed and understood, pertaineth nothing thereunto.

At this the prolocutor startled, that one of the chief pillars in this point should be overthrown; and therefore he recited the said authority, first in Latin, and afterwards he turned it into English, and desired all that were present to remark that saying of Chrysostom, which he thought invincible on their own side. But I will make it appear (saith Philpot) by and by, that it doth make little for your purpose. And as he was declaring his mind in this particular, the prolocutor interrupted him, as he frequently did. With which Philpot being displeased, said, Mr. Prolocutor thinketh that he is in a sophistry-school, where he well knoweth the manner is, that when the respondent perceiveth, that he is like to be enforced with an argument which he is not able to answer, he doth what he can, by cavilling, and interruption, to drive him from the same. This saying of Philpot was ill taken by the prolocutor and his adherents; and the prolocutor said, that Philpot could bring nothing to avoid that authority, but his own vain imagination. Hear, said Philpot, and afterwards judge; for I will do in this, as in all other authorities, wherewith you shall take upon you to refute any of my arguments that I have to prosecute, answering the same either by sufficient authorities of scripture, or else by some other testimony of like authority with your's, and not of my own imagination; which if I do, I desire it to be of no credit.

As to your authority from St. Chrysostom, I have two objections against that to propose; one drawn from scripture, the other from the very place of Chrysostom himself here by you alledged.

First, where he seemeth to say, that Christ ascending took his flesh with him, and left his flesh also behind him; it is true; for the flesh Christ took with him was that which he received from the virgin Mary, and the flesh he left behind was not his natural body, but the members of his visible church; as St. Paul doth aptly testify, when he says, Eph. v. "We are flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones." And if any one will reply, that he there treateth of the sacrament, and that this interpretation cannot so properly be applied to him in that place, then I will explain St. Chrysostom another way by himself; for a few lines before those now quoted, are these words; "That Christ, after he ascended into heaven, left to us, indued with his sacraments, his flesh in mysteries, that is, sacramentally; and that mystical flesh Christ leaveth as well to his church in the sacrament of baptism, as in the sacramental bread and wine." "As many (saith St. Paul) as are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ." Hence you may perceive, that St. Chrysostom makes nothing for your gross carnal presence in the sacrament, as you wrongly interpret him.

Now in the mean time, while Mr. Philpot was speaking, Mr. Pie, whispering the prolocutor in the ear, urged him to silence Philpot, fearing, if he held on longer, he would wholly overthrow their opinion of the carnal presence, seeing he had already given one of it's main supporters such a blow. The prolocutor, therefore, said to Mr. Philpot, that he had reasoned long enough, and that some other should supply his room, at which Mr. Philpot, being much displeased, said, Why, sir, I have a dozen arguments to propose concerning this matter, and I have as yet scarce gone over the first; for being hitherto hindered, through your frequent interruptions, I have not, for confirmation, quoted any ancient writers, though I could a great many. Well, returned the prolocutor, you shall speak no more now, and I command you to be silent. You perceive, said Mr. Philpot, that I am able to controvert your false supposition, and therefore you command me to be silent. If you will not give place, said Mr. Weston, I will send you to prison. This is not, replied Philpot, according to your promise made in this house, nor yet to your brags made at Paul's Cross, that men should be answered in this disputation to whatever they can say, since of a dozen arguments you will not suffer me to prosecute one. Here Mr. Pie took upon him to promise, that he should be answered another day. But Mr. Philpot, seeing he could not proceed as he designed, was justly offended thereat, and concluded with the following words:—"A sort of you here, who hitherto have lurked in corners, and dissembled with God and the world, are now gathered together to suppress the sincere truth of God's holy word, and to set forth every false device, which by the Catholic doctrine of the scripture ye are not able to maintain."

Then

Then stood up Mr. Elmar, chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, whom Mr. Moreman took upon him to answer; but Mr. Elmar's allegations so incumbered his respondent, that he desired a day to overlook them, for at that instant he was without a proper answer.

The prolocutor now called upon Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, and chaplain to the duke of Suffolk, who prosecuted Mr. Elmar's argument. Dr. Watson, who attempted to answer him, was so confounded, that he was not able to explain sufficiently the word Mysterium (Mystery). But as he seemed to doubt therein, Mr. Haddon took out of his bosom a Latin author, to confirm what he had advanced, and, shewing the same to Dr. Watson, asked him, whether he thought that translation to be a just one, or that the printer were in fault; to which Watson replied, there may be a fault in the printer, for I am not remembered of this word. Then Mr. Haddon took out of his bosom a Greek book, wherein he pointed to the same word, which Mr. Watson could not deny. The further arguments that were made use of, we shall omit declaring, because they were mostly in Greek, as were those also of Mr. Elmar's.

Then Mr. Perne stood up, and argued against transubstantiation, confirmed the authorities alledged by the two former speakers. When the prolocutor, interrupting, said, "I wonder, Mr. Perne, at your speaking thus, for no longer than last Friday you subscribed to the contrary." For which censure Mr. Elmar blamed the prolocutor, telling him, that he ought not to reprehend any man, because, said he, this house is a house of free liberty for every man to speak according to his conscience, and because but yesterday he promised this liberty to any man, notwithstanding he had subscribed.

Night now approaching, and the time being expired, the prolocutor, though he praised them for their learning, concluded with observing, that, all reasoning set apart, the order of Holy Church must be received, and all things ordered thereby.

The FIFTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Friday, October 27th, the prolocutor opened the debate with observing, that the convocation had spent two days in disputing about one father, which was Theodoret, and about one Greek word (ἔσθια) and now they were assembled to answer all things that could be objected, therefore he desired they would shortly profound their arguments. Upon this, Mr. Haddon, dean of Exeter, requested leave to oppose Mr. Watson, who, with Morgan and Harpsfield, were appointed to answer him. Mr. Haddon then demanded, if any substance of bread and wine remained after consecration? To which Watson replied, by asking another question, namely, whether he thought there was a real presence of Christ's body, or not? Mr. Haddon said, it was not agreeable to order, that one, who was appointed to be respondent should be opponent; nor should he, whose business was to object, answer. Mr. Haddon then proceeded to shew, from the words of Theodoret, that the substance of bread and wine remained: for his words are, "The same they were before the sanctification, which they are after." Mr. Watson said, that Theodoret meant not the same substance, but the same essence. Whereupon they were driven again to a discussion of the Greek word above mentioned; and Mr. Haddon proved it to mean a substance, both by it's etymology, and by the words of Theodoret; for, said he, ἔσθια cometh from the participle ἔσθιον, which descendeth to the verb ἐσθίω, and so cometh the noun ἔσθια, which signifieth substance. Mr. Watson said, it had not that signification only: but, in that place, Mr. Haddon proved, it could not signify otherwise. He then asked Watson, when the bread and wine became symbols? Watson answered, After consecration, and not before. Then Mr. Haddon raised out of his author the following syllogism (being an argument of three propositions).

(1) Theodoret saith, that the same thing the bread and wine were, before they were symbols, the same they remain still, in nature and substance, after they are symbols.

(2) Bread and wine they were before.

(3) Therefore, bread and wine they are after.

Mr. Watson, when he could not answer, had recourse to the shameful subterfuge of discrediting the authority of Theodoret, by saying, he was a Nestorian; at the same time, turning to Mr. Cheyney, who stood by, he desired to answer him, intimating, that he was more fit, than Mr. Haddon, to dispute upon this point, because he had granted and subscribed to the real presence. Being thus addressed with an insinuation that required an immediate reply, Mr. Cheyney applied to the house, and requested the patience of those honourable men to hear him, hoping so to open the matter, that the truth should appear; protesting, that he was no obstinate nor stubborn man, but would be conformable to all reason; and if they, by their learning, which he acknowledged to be much more than his, could answer his reasons, then he would be ruled by them, and say as they said; for he would be no author of schism, nor hold any thing contrary to the holy mother, the church, which is the spouse of Christ. Dr. Weston liking this very well commended him highly, telling him, that he was a very learned and sober man, and well experienced in all good learning, and in the doctors; and finally, a man, for his knowledge, fit to dispute in that place; I pray you hear him, quoth he. Then Mr. Cheyney desired those that were present to pray to God with him in two words, and to say, Vincat veritas, "Let truth take place, and have the victory;" and all that were present cried with a loud voice, Vincat veritas, Vincat veritas.

Dr. Weston told them it was hypocritical, and that they had better say, Vicit Veritas, "Truth hath gotten the victory." Mr. Cheyney said again, If you will give me leave, I will come to the point, that you may truly say so. Then addressing himself particularly to Mr. Watson, he began after this manner.

You said that Mr. Haddon was not fit to dispute, because he had not granted the natural and real presence; but I say you are much less fit to answer, because you take away the substance of the sacrament. Watson said, that he had subscribed to the real presence, and should not go away from that: so said the prolocutor and the other priests; so that for a long time he could not have leave to proceed, till the lords desired that he should be heard. He now explained what he meant by subscribing to the real presence, far otherwise than they supposed. He then prosecuted Haddon's argument, proving that the Greek word before discussed was a substance, using the same reason that Haddon did; and when he had received the same answer that was made to Haddon, he told them it was but a poor refuge, when they could not answer to deny the author, and proved the author to be a catholic doctor; that being proved, he further confirmed what was said of the nature and substance. The similitude of Theodoret is this, said he, as the tokens of Christ's body and blood, after the invocation of the priest, do change their names, and yet continue the same substance; so the body of Christ after his ascension, changed his name, and was called immortal, yet it had his former fashion, figure, and circumscription, and, to speak in one word, the same substance of his body. Therefore, if in the former part of the similitude you deny the same substance to continue, then in the latter part of the similitude, which agreeth with it, I will deny the body of Christ, after his ascension, to have the former nature and substance. But that were a great heresy; therefore it is also a great heresy to take away the substance of bread and wine after consecration. In answer to this, Watson was obliged to say, that the substance of the body, in the former part of the similitude brought in by him, did signify quantity, and other accidents of the sacramental tokens which are seen, and not the very substance of the same; and therefore Theodoret says, Those things which are seen. For according to philosophy, the accidents of things are seen, and not the substances.

Cheyney then appealed to the nobility, and desired that they would give no credit to them in so saying: for if they think as they teach, after your lordships have ridden forty miles on horseback (as your business sometimes may require) you shall not be able to say at night, that that saw your horses all the day, but only the colour of them: and by this reason Christ must go to school, and learn of Aristotle how to speak. For when he saw Nathaniel under the fig-tree, if Aristotle had stood by, he would have said, No, Christ, thou didst not see him, but the colour of him. Then said Watson, suppose it were granted that Theodoret was on the other side, where there were one of that opinion, there were an hundred on the other.

The prolocutor here perceiving that Mr. Watson was closely attacked, called upon Mr. Morgan to help him out, who said, that Theodoret did no more than what he might lawfully do; for, first, he granted the truth, and then, for fear of such as were not fully instructed in the faith, he spake mystically: he granted the truth, by calling the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ; after which he seems to give somewhat to the senses and to reason: but that Theodoret was of the same opinion with them, will appear from his words that follow, which are the cause of what went before; therefore he says, The immortality, &c. whereby it seemeth, that he meant the divine nature, and not the human. Morgan was then detected in misapplying the text; for the book had not this word [for], and the Greek word did rather signify [truly], from whence it plainly appeared, that it was the beginning of a new matter, and not a sentence rendering a cause of that he had said before.

Watson now repeated what he had before said: "Suppose Theodoret be on your side, of whom we never heard in print, before two or three years ago; yet he is but one; and what is one against the consent of the whole church?" Cheyney affirmed, that not only Theodoret was of his opinion, that the substance of bread and wine do remain, but many others also, particularly Irenæus, who, making mention of this sacrament, says thus: "When the cup which is mingled with wine, and the bread that is broken, do receive the word of God, it is made the Eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, by which the substance of our flesh is nourished, and doth consist." From whence I infer, that if the thanksgiving do nourish our body, then there is some substance besides Christ's body. To this both Watson and Morgan replied, observing, that [by which], in that sentence of Irenæus, was to be referred to the next antecedent, that is, to the body and blood of Christ; and not to the wine which is in the cup, and the bread which is broken. Mr. Cheyney said, that it was not the body of Christ which nourished our bodies; and granting that the flesh of Christ nourisheth to immortality, yet it doth not make for their argument, although it might be true; no more than that answer which was made to my allegation out of St. Paul, The bread which we break, &c. with many others; whereunto you answered, that bread was not to be taken there in its proper signification, that is, not for that it was bread, but for that it had been so; any more than the rod of Aaron was taken for a serpent, because it had been a serpent. After this, Mr. Cheyney quoted Hesychius, and used the same reason that he did concerning the burning of symbols; and asked them, what was burnt? Mr. Watson said, we must not enquire nor ask, but if there was any fault, impute it to Christ. Then said Mr. Cheyney, whence came those ashes, if not from substance? or can any substance arise from accidents?

Here Mr. Harpsfield was called in to the assistance of Watson, and to hear what he could say to this matter; who began with a fair preamble about the omnipotency of God, and the weakness of human reason as to the comprehension and attainment of religious matters; and said, that whatsoever we saw, felt, or tasted, it was not convenient to trust our senses.—(The very pith and marrow of popery this.) He also related a curious legend out of St. Cyprian, how a woman saw the sacrament burning in her coffer; and that which burned thus, said Harpsfield, burneth here, and becometh ashes; but what that was which burnt, he could not tell. Mr. Cheyney continued still to force them with this question—What was it that was burnt?—it was either, said he, the substance of bread, or else the substance of the body of Christ, which was too great an absurdity to grant. At length they answered, it was a miracle; at which Mr. Cheyney smiling, said, that he would then say no more.

Then Dr. Weston, the prolocutor, asked the company, whether those men had been sufficiently answered, or not? To which certain priests said, Yes; but as to the great multitude of people, these exclaimed—No, no; they were not heard; and the clamour was so great, that it was heard almost to the end of St. Paul's: whereat Dr. Weston, being much incensed, answered sharply, that he asked not the judgment of the rude multitude, and unlearned people, but such as were members of that house. Having said this with much acrimony, he asked Mr. Haddon and his fellow-disputants, whether they would answer them other three days? Mr. Haddon, Cheyney, and Elmar answered, No. Upon which the archdeacon of Winchester, Mr. Philpot, stood up, and said, they should be answered; and though all others refused to answer, yet he would not; but offered to answer them all in turns: with whose offer the prolocutor being dissatisfied, railed at him, saying that he should go to Bedlam; to whom the archdeacon returned gravely this answer, that he deserved much more to be sent thither, who behaved himself so furiously in the disputation, without any indifferent equality.

To this Dr. Weston made no reply, but rising up addressed the house, saying, All the company here have subscribed, these men whom you see only excepted. What their reasons are you have heard. We have answered them three days, upon promise, (which was a false assertion, for no such promise was made) that they should answer us again, as long as the order of disputation continued, and, if they be able to defend their doctrine, let them do so.

Then stood up Mr. Elmar, and shewed how vain a man Mr. Weston was; for he affirmed they never promised to dispute, but only to declare and testify to the world their consciences. For when they were required to subscribe, they refused, alledging, that they would shew good reasons which moved them, that they could not, agreeable to their consciences, subscribe; as they had partly done already, and were able to do more effectually. Therefore, continued he, it hath been ill called a disputation, and they are much to blame who called it so. We meant not to dispute, nor now intend to answer; before our arguments, which we have to propound, be solved, according as it was appointed: for, by answering, we should but incumber ourselves and profit nothing, since the matter is already decreed on, and determined, whatsoever we may prove by dispute to the contrary.

The SIXTH DAY'S DEBATE.

On Monday following, October the 30th, the prolocutor demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether, in the questions, before propounded, he would answer their objections or not? To whom he made this answer; that he would willingly do so; if, according to their former determination and promise, they would first answer fully some of his arguments, of which he had a dozen, not half of the first being decided; and if they would answer but one of his arguments sufficiently, he would reply to all the objections they could bring. The prolocutor bid him state his argument, and it should be resolutely controverted by some of them; whereunto Morgan was appointed. Mr. Philpot then proceeded. On Wednesday last, said he, I was forced to silence before I had prosecuted half my argument, the sum of which was, that the human body of Christ was ascended into heaven, and placed at the right hand of God the Father; wherefore, after the imagination of man, it could not be situated upon earth invisibly in the sacrament of the altar. The argument was denied by Morgan; but for proof hereof, Philpot said, that this was what he had to confirm his first argument with, if they would have suffered him the other day, as he hoped they would now. He thus proceeded with his argument.

(1) One self-same nature receiveth not in itself any thing that is contrary to itself.

E

(2) But

(2) But the body of Christ is an human nature, distinct from the deity, and is a proper nature of itself.

(3) Therefore it cannot receive any thing that is contrary to that nature, and that varieth from itself.

But bodily to be present, and to be absent bodily, to be on earth, and to be in heaven, and all at one present time, are things contrary to the nature of an human body. Therefore, it cannot be said of the human body of Christ, that the self-same body is both in heaven, and also on the earth at one instant, either visibly or invisibly. Morgan denied the first part of the argument, which Philpot supported out of Vigilius, an ancient writer; yet still Morgan cavilled thereat, and said it was no scripture, and desired him to prove the same from scripture. Philpot deduced the same from St. Paul, who says, that "Christ is like unto us in all points, except sin;" therefore, like as one of our bodies cannot receive in itself any thing contrary to the nature of a body, as to be in St. Paul's church and at Westminster in one instant, or to be at London visibly, and at Lincoln invisibly at one time; so, in like manner, the body of Christ cannot be in more places than one, which is in heaven, and consequently is not included or contained in the sacrament of the altar. But, said the prolocutor, it is not true, that Christ was like unto us in all points, since he was not conceived by the seed of man as we are. Philpot replied, that Christ's conception was prophesied before by the angel to be supernatural, but after he had received our nature by the operation of the Holy Ghost in the virgin's womb, he became in all points like unto us, except sin.

Then Morgan affirmed, that these words of St. Paul did not plainly prove his purpose. Well, said Philpot, I perceive you answer only by cavilling, yet I am not destitute of other scriptures, though you refuse the testimony of so ancient and catholic a doctor as Vigilius is. St. Peter, making mention of Christ in the 3d chapter of the Acts, says, "Whom heaven must receive, until the consummation of all things," &c. which words are spoken of his humanity; and if heaven must hold Christ, then can he not be here on earth, in the sacrament, as is pretended. Morgan laughing at this, and giving no direct answer, Harpsfield, one of the bishop of London's chaplains, stood up, and demanded of Mr. Philpot, whether he would of necessity force Christ to any place, or not? Philpot returned, that he would no otherwise force Christ of necessity to any place, than what the words of the Holy Ghost teach, namely, that Christ's human body must abide in heaven until the day of judgment. To which Harpsfield replied, Do you not know that God is a God omnipotent? Yes, said Philpot, I know that right well; but as to Christ's omnipotency, what he can do, is not our question, but rather, what he actually doth: he may make more worlds; but doth he therefore so? It were no good consequent to conclude, because he may or can do this or that, therefore he doth it.

SYLLOGISTIC ARGUMENT.

Only so much is to be believed of God's omnipotency, as is in the word expressed.

That Christ's body is both in heaven, and here also really in the sacrament, is not expressed in the word.

Therefore it is not to be believed, that the body of Christ, being in heaven, is here in the sacrament.

Why, returned the prolocutor, then you will put Christ in prison in heaven. To which Philpot answered, Do you reckon heaven to be in prison? God grant us all to come to that prison!

After this, Harpsfield affirmed, that the Latin word, oportet, in St. Peter, (in English, must) did not import, as Philpot would infer, a necessity, which might be made appear from other places of scripture, as in the first of Timothy, where St. Paul saith, A bishop must be the husband of one wife. Here the word oportet doth not mean necessity, but a possibility, that he, who never was married, may be a bishop. To which Philpot replied, that the two passages he compared were not alike; and that in comparing the scriptures we must not consider the bare words, but rather their import: and in one place, quoted by him, St. Paul declares of what quality a bishop ought to be; but in the other St. Peter refers to the place where Christ must necessarily be until the end of the world; which we ought to believe to be true. And this comparison of the Latin word, oportet, is no more an answer to my argument, than if I was to say of you, now being here, you must needs be here, which importeth such a necessity for the time, that you can no otherwise but be here; yet you would endeavour, in words, to avoid this necessity with another oportet in another sense, as for instance, you must be a good man, where must doth not indeed imply any such necessity, but that you may be an evil man. Thus your reasoning is not conclusive, and by no means an answer to my argument.

The prolocutor, to help the matter out, if possible, brought up another oportet, saying, Oportet hereses esse; must heresies needs be therefore, because of this word oportet? Certainly, returned Philpot, it cannot otherwise be, if you will add what immediately followeth, ut qui electi sunt manifestentur, meaning, "that such as be the elect of God may be manifest and known." But, said the prolocutor, the time hath been that no such heresies were. I know not of any such time, said Philpot; for since the time of Abel and Cain heresies have been and then began. Then said the prolocutor, Will you not now answer Morgan an argument or two? I will, said Philpot, if I may have my arguments first answered fairly, according to truth and learning. What! said the prolocutor, will you never be answered? How I am answered, returned Philpot, let all here present judge, especially men of learning, and with what cavilling you have trifled with me. First, to the ancient authority of Vigilius, you have answered nothing, except denying what he saith to be scripture. Secondly, to the words of St. Peter, in the Acts, you have answered, by demanding, whether I would keep Christ in prison, or not? Let men now judge if this be a sufficient answer, or not. Upon this, Morgan stood up again, and asked Philpot, whether he would be ruled by the universal church or not? Yes, said Philpot, if it be the true catholic church; and since you speak so much of the church, I would have you declare what the church is. The church, said Morgan, is diffused and dispersed throughout the whole world. That is a diffuse definition, said Philpot, for I am yet as uncertain as I was before, what you mean by the church; but is it not what was grounded and founded on the word of God, as St. Paul saith upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets? What? quoth Moreman, was the scripture before the church? Yes, answered Philpot. But I will prove the contrary, returned Moreman; and I will begin at the time of Christ. The church of Christ was before any scripture written: for Matthew was the first who wrote a gospel, about a dozen years after Christ: therefore, the church was before the scripture. Philpot denied his argument; and shewed it to be a fallacy; for he took the scripture to be only that which was written by men in letters; whereas in truth, all prophecy uttered by the Spirit of God, was counted to be scripture, before it was written in paper and ink, for it was written in the hearts, and graven in the minds, yea, and inspired in the mouths of good men, and of the apostles, by the Spirit of Christ. The salutation of the angel was the scripture of Christ, or the word of God, before it was written. Moreman cried, Fie! fie! wondering that the scripture of God should be counted scripture before it was written, and affirmed, he had no knowledge who said so. To whom Philpot replied, that as to knowledge in this matter, for the trial of the truth, about the questions in controversy, he would wish himself no worse matched than with Moreman.

At this the prolocutor was highly offended, saying to Philpot, it was speaking arrogantly, to compare himself with such a worshipful learned man as Mr. Moreman was, being himself a man unlearned, yea, a madman, fitter to be sent to Bedlam, than to be among such learned and grave men as were there, and a man who never would be answered, and one who troubled the whole house; and therefore he commanded him to come no more into that house, of whom he demanding, whether they would agree thereunto, or not, a great company answered, Yes. Philpot returned, he might think himself happy, who was out of their company.

Then Morgan rose up, and whispered the prolocutor in the ear; and the prolocutor spoke to Philpot again, and said, lest thou shouldst slander the house, and say, that we will not suffer you to declare your mind, we are content you shall come into the house as you have done before, so as you be apparelled with a long gown and a tipper, as we be, and that you shall not speak but when I command you. Then, said Philpot, I had rather be absent altogether.

Thus they reasoned pro and con, till at length, about the 13th of December, queen Mary took up the matter, and sending to Bonner, bishop of London, commanded him to dissolve and break up the convocation.

The following is a Translation of the QUEEN'S PRECEPT, to BONNER, Bishop of LONDON, for dissolving the CONVOCATION.

"MARY, &c. To the Rev. Father in God, Edmund, Lord Bishop of London, sendeth greeting. Whereas there is now held at Paul's, London, the convocation of the clergy belonging to the province of Canterbury: we, by and with the advice and consent of our council, and for divers other causes and considerations particularly moving us thereunto, have hereby thought fit the said convocation should be dissolved. And therefore we strictly charge and command you, forthwith to dissolve or cause to be dissolved the said convocation, as shall seem to you most fit and convenient: signifying withal on our part to all and several the bishops, archdeacons, deans and all other spiritual persons, that they and every of them do obey and comply with this our command, as becometh them so to do.

"Witness ourself at Westminster, the 13th day of December, in the first year of our reign."

TRANSACTIONS of the PRIVY COUNCIL, and PARLIAMENT, during the Time of the above DISPUTATION.

November, 1553. On the 20th of this month, the mayor of Coventry sent up unto the lords of the council, Baldwin Clarke, J. Careless, Thomas Wilcocks, and Richard Estelin, for their behaviour upon Allhallow's-day before; whereupon Careless and Wilcocks were committed to the Gate-house, and the other two to the Marshalsea.

The same day, sir Christopher Heydon, and sir William Farmer, were ordered, by a letter from the council, to apprehend the Rev. John Huntington, for making a rhyme against Dr. Stokes, and the sacrament, who appearing before the council, on the 3d of December following, was, upon his humble submission, and promise of amendment in doctrine and living, again suffered to depart.

In the days of Henry VIII. and Edward his successor, several noblemen and others were committed to the Tower; some charged with treason, as lord Courtney, and the Duke of Norfolk; some for the pope's supremacy, and suspicious letters tending to sedition, as Tonsal, bishop of Durham, and others, who were all continued prisoners there, till queen Mary granted them a pardon, and restored them to their former dignities. Among these was Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, whom she not only set at liberty, but also advanced him to be high chancellor of England. Lord Courtney she created Earl of Devonshire, and shewed him so much favour, that it was suspected by some she would marry him. At the same time she also released that bloody prosecutor, Bonner, from the Marshalsea, and restored him to the bishopric of London, displacing Dr. Ridley, with divers other good bishops as Cranmer from Canterbury, also the archbishop of York, with a great number of archdeacons, deans, &c. in short, all those of the clergy who were either married, or would constantly adhere to the reformed religion, were removed from their livings; and others, advocates for popery, put in the same, as cardinal Pool, (who was invited to England) Gardiner, White, Day, Troublefield, &c.

And whereas a rumour was spread abroad, that Cranmer had recanted, and caused mass to be said at Canterbury, in order therefore to clear himself, he published a declaration of his truth and constancy in those particulars, protesting that he neither had done so, nor intended it, adding, that, if the queen pleased, he, with Peter Martyr, and certain others whom he would chuse, would, in public disputation, vindicate the doctrines of the reformation, against all persons whomsoever. But while he expected to obtain leave for such a disputation, he, with other bishops, were laid fast in the Tower. But Peter Martyr was permitted to depart the realm, and he went to Argentine. At length, in this month of November, Dr. Cranmer, notwithstanding he had earnestly refused to subscribe to the king's will in disinheriting his sister Mary, was arraigned in the Guild-hall of London, and attainted of treason, with the lady Jane Grey, and three of the duke of Northumberland's sons, who were remanded back to the Tower, at the intreaty of certain persons, and there kept for a time.

December 1553. About the beginning of this month, the parliament broke up, having first repealed all such statutes as were either made of premunire, or concerned any alteration of religion, and administration of the sacraments, in the reign of Edward VI.

WYAT'S REBELLION—QUEEN MARY'S ORATION—LADY JANE'S Behaviour, and her Execution—BONNER'S Instructions to the Clergy of his Diocese—A CONVOCATION summoned.

ON the 13th of January, 1554, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet, for preaching without licence, on Christmas-day; and on the 21st, Thomas Wooton, Esq. was committed close prisoner to the Fleet, for matters of religion.

Early in this month the marriage of the queen was made public; but the news of this event was ill received both by the common people, and several of the nobility: and on this account, as also for religion, conspiring among themselves, raised a rebellion, whereof sir Thomas Wyatt was one of the chief promoters, who said in Kent, (what others plainly perceived) that the queen and council would, by her marriage with a foreigner, bring upon this realm most miserable servitude, and establish the popish religion.

January 25th. Intelligence was received at London, of the insurrection in Kent; and of the duke of Suffolk having fled into Warwickshire and Leicestershire, with a view of raising forces in those counties. The queen, therefore, caused them both, with the Carews of Devonshire, to be proclaimed traitors; and at the same time sent Thomas, duke of Norfolk, into Kent, who being near Rochester bridge, forsaken of those who went with him, returned to London, no blood having been shed on either side.

The duke of Suffolk having fled into Warwickshire, the earl of Huntington was sent against him, who entering the city of Coventry, before the duke, disappointed him of his purpose. In his distress, the duke confided in a servant of his, in Asfley park; but the traitor having betrayed him, he was apprehended, sent up to London, and committed to the Tower. In the mean time, sir Peter hearing of this, fled into France, but the other conspirators were taken; and Wyat advanced towards London in the beginning of February. The queen, having heard of his coming, repaired to Guild-hall, in the city, where she made a vehement oration against Wyat; the substance and effect whereof here followeth, as near as out of her own mouth could be penned.

An ORATION delivered by QUEEN MARY in GUILD-HALL, LONDON.

I AM come unto you in mine own person, to tell you that which already you see and know, that is, how traitorously and rebelliously a number of Kentishmen have assembled themselves against both us and you. Their pretence (as they said at the first) was for a marriage determined for us: to the which, and to all the articles thereof, ye have been made privy. But since we have caused certain of our privy council to go again unto them, and to demand the cause of this their rebellion, and it appeared then unto our said council, that the matter of the marriage seemed to be but a Spanish cloak to cover their pretended purpose against our religion, for that they arrogantly and traitorously demanded to have the governance of our person, the keeping of the Tower, and the placing of our counsellors.

Now, loving subjects, what I am, ye right well know; I am your queen, to whom at my coronation, when I was wedded to the realm, and laws of the same (the spousal ring whereof I have on my finger, which never hitherto was, nor hereafter shall be left off) you promised your allegiance and obedience unto me. And that I am the right and true inheritor of the crown of this realm of England, I take all christendom to witness. My father, as ye all know, possessed the same regal state, which now rightly is descended unto me: and to him always ye shewed yourselves most faithful and loving subjects, and therefore I doubt not, but ye will shew yourselves likewise to me, and that ye will not suffer a vile traitor to have the order and governance of our person, and to occupy our estate, especially being so vile a traitor as Wyat is: who certainly, as he hath abused mine ignorant subjects which be on his side, so doth he intend and purpose the destruction of you, and spoil of your goods. And I say to you in the word of a queen, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loveth the child, for I was never the mother of any; but certainly, if a princess and governess may as naturally and earnestly love her subjects, as the mother doth love the child, then assure yourselves, that I, being your lady and mistress, do as earnestly and tenderly love and favour you. And I thus loving you, cannot but think that you as heartily and faithfully love me, and then I doubt not, but we shall give these rebels a short and speedy overthrow.

As concerning the marriage, ye shall understand, that I enterprized not the doing thereof without advice, and that by the advice of all our privy council, who so considered and weighed the great commodities that might ensue thereof, that they not only thought it very honourable, but also expedient, for the wealth of the realm, and of your own subjects. And as touching myself, I assure you, I am not so bent to my will, neither so precise nor affectionate, that either for mine own pleasure I would chuse where I lust, or that I am so desirous, as needs I would have one. For God, I thank him, to whom be the praise therefore, I have hitherto lived a virgin, and doubt nothing, but with God's grace, I am able so to live still. But if, as my progenitors have done before, it may please God that I might leave some fruit of my body behind me, to be your governor, I trust, you would not only rejoice thereat, but also, I know, it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I either did think or know, that this marriage were to the hurt of any of you my commons, or to the impeachment of any part or parcel of the royal state of this realm of England, I would never consent thereunto, neither would I ever marry while I lived. And in the word of a queen, I promise you, that if it shall not probably appear to all the nobility and commons in the high court of Parliament, that this marriage shall be for the high benefit and commodity of the whole realm, then will I abstain from marriage while I live.

And now, good subjects, pluck up your hearts, and like true men, stand fast against these rebels, both our enemies and your's, and fear them not; for I assure you, I fear them nothing at all. And I will leave with you my lord Howard, and my lord treasurer, who shall be assistants with the mayor for your defence.

It is to be observed, that it having been reported the queen was coming into the city with armed men, this rumour so terrified the Londoners, lest they should be there entrapped, and put to death, that great numbers of them made out at the gate before she entered in. It is also to be noted, that when the queen had ended her oration (which she seemed to have learnt perfectly without book) at the conclusion thereof, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, who stood by her, cried to the people, with great admiration, "O how happy are we, to whom God hath given such a wise and learned queen!"

Two days after this, on the 3d of February, lord Cobham was committed to the Tower, and sir Thomas Wyat entered Southwark; when, finding no access that way into the city, he marched with his army by Kingston, and came through the Strand to Ludgate. Returning from thence, he was opposed at Temple-bar, and there surrendered himself to sir Clement Larson, who brought him to court; and, with him, the remains of his army (for sir George Harper, and almost half of his men, had deserted him at Kingston-bridge) were also taken, and about one hundred killed. A great number of the captives were hanged; and Wyat was executed on Tower-hill, and then quartered. His head being set up upon Hay-hill, was taken away from thence, and great search made for the same.

On the 12th of February, the unfortunate Lady Jane Gray was beheaded. Two days before her death, Mr. Feckman, otherwise Howman, was sent to her from the queen, to converse with her, and endeavour to turn her from the doctrine of Christ and the reformation to Mary's popish religion. The substance of their conversation is thus related.

A CONVERSATION between Mr. FECKNAM and LADY JANE GRAY, a short time before she was beheaded.

Feckman. Madam, I lament your heavy case, and yet I doubt not, but that you bear out this sorrow of your's with a constant and patient mind.

Jane. You are welcome unto me, sir, if your coming be to give christian exhortation. And as for my heavy case, (I thank God) I do so little lament it, that rather I account the same for a more manifest declaration of God's favour towards me, than ever he shewed me at any time before. And therefore there is no cause why either you, or others which bear me good will, should lament or be grieved with this my case, being a thing so profitable for my soul's health.

Feck. I am here come to you at this present time sent from the queen and her council, to instruct you in the true doctrine of the right faith: although I have so great confidence in you, that I shall have, I trust, little need to travel with you much therein.

Jane. Forsooth I heartily thank the queen's highness, which is not unkindful of her humble subject: and I hope likewise, that you no less will do your duty therein both truly and faithfully, according to that you were sent for.

Feck. What is then required of a christian man?

Jane. That he should believe in God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, three persons and one God.

Feck. What, is there nothing else to be required or looked for in a christian, but to believe in him?

Jane. Yes, we must love him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our mind, and our neighbour as ourself.

Fecknam. Why, then, faith neither justifieth, nor saveth.

Jane. Yes verily, faith (as St. Paul saith) only justifieth.

Fecknam. Why, St. Paul saith, If I have all faith without love, it is nothing.

Jane. True it is; for how can I love him whom I trust not? Or how can I trust him whom I love not? Faith and love go both together, and yet love is comprehended in faith.

Fecknam. How many sacraments are there?

Jane. Two. The one the sacrament of baptism, and the other the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Fecknam. No, there are seven.

Jane. By what scripture find you that?

Fecknam. Well, we will talk of that hereafter. But what is signified by your two sacraments?

Jane. By the sacrament of baptism, I am washed with water and regenerated by the Spirit, and that washing is a token to me that I am a child of God. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper offered unto me, is a sure seal and testimony that I am, by the blood of Christ, which he shed for me on the cross, made partaker of the everlasting kingdom.

Fecknam. Why, what do you receive in that sacrament? Do you not receive the very body and blood of Christ?

Jane. No surely, I do not so believe. I think that at the supper I neither receive flesh nor blood, but bread and wine; which bread when it was broken, and the wine when it was drank, putteth me in remembrance how that for my sins the body of Christ was broken, and his blood shed on the cross, and with that bread and wine, I receive the benefits that come by the breaking of his body, and shedding of his blood.

Fecknam. Why, doth not Christ speak these words, Take, eat, this is my body? Require you any plainer words? Doth he not say it is his body?

Jane. I grant he saith so; and so he saith, I am the vine, I am the door; but he is never the more the door nor the vine. Doth not St. Paul say, He calleth things that are not as though they were? God forbid that I should say, that I eat the very natural body and blood of Christ: for then either I should pluck away my redemption, or else there were two bodies, or two Christs. One body was tormented on the cross, and if they did eat another body, then had he two bodies; or if his body were eaten, then was it not broken upon the cross; or if it were broken upon the cross, it was not eaten of his disciples.

With these and such like persuasions he endeavoured, but to no purpose, to turn her to the popish religion. They reasoned about many other things, but these were the chief.

LETTER

From LADY JANE to Mr. HARDING, (late CHAPLAIN to her Father the DUKE of SUFFOLK,) then fallen from the truth of GOD'S HOLY WORD.

SO oft as I call to mind the dreadful and fearful saying of God, "That he which layeth hold upon the plough and looketh back, is not meet for the kingdom of heaven;" and, on the other side, the comfortable words of our Saviour Christ to all those that, forsaking themselves, do follow him: I cannot but marvel at thee, and lament thy case, which seemed sometime to be the lively member of Christ, but now the deformed imp of the devil; sometime the beautiful temple of God, but now the stinking and filthy kennel of Satan; sometime the unspotted spouse of Christ, but now the unshamed paramour of Antichrist; sometime my faithful brother, but now a stranger and apostate; sometime a stout christian soldier, but now a cowardly run-away. Yea, when I consider these things, I cannot but speak to thee, and cry out upon thee, thou seed of Satan and not of Judah, whom the devil hath deceived, the world hath beguiled, and the desire of life subverted, and made thee of a christian an infidel. Wherefore hast thou taken the testament of the Lord in thy mouth? Wherefore hast thou preached the law and the will of God to others? Wherefore hast thou instructed others to be strong in Christ, when thou thyself doest so shamefully shrink, and so horribly abuse the testament and law of the Lord? When thou thyself preacheest not to steal, yet most abominably stealest, not from men, but from God, and committing most heinous sacrilege, robbest Christ thy Lord of his right members, thy body and soul, and chusest rather to live miserably with shame in the world, than to die, and gloriously, with honor, reign with Christ, in whom even death is life? Why dost thou now shew thyself most weak, when indeed thou oughtest to be most strong? The strength of a fort is unknown before the assault, but thou yieldest thy hold before any battery be made. O wretched and unhappy man, what art thou but dust and ashes? And wilt thou resist thy Maker that fashioned and framed thee? Wilt thou now forsake him that called thee from the custom-gathering among the Romish antichristians, to be an ambassador and messenger of his eternal word? He that first framed thee, and since thy first creation and birth preserved thee, nourished and kept thee, yea, and inspired thee with the spirit of knowledge (I cannot say of grace, all he not now possess thee? Darest thou deliver thyself to another, being not thine own, but his? How canst thou, having knowledge, or how darest thou neglect the law of the Lord, and follow the vain traditions of men; and whereas, thou hast been a public professor of his name, become now a defacer of his glory? Wilt thou refuse the true God, and worship the invention of man, the golden calf, the whore of Babylon, the Romish religion, the abominable idol, the most wicked mass? Wilt thou torment again, rent, and tear the most precious body of our Saviour Christ, with thy bodily and fleshly teeth? Wilt thou take upon thee to offer any sacrifice unto God for our sins, considering that Christ offered up himself (as St. Paul saith) upon the cross, a lively sacrifice once for all? Can neither the punishment of the Israelites (which, for their idolatry, they so oft received,) nor the terrible threatenings of the prophets, nor the curses of God's own mouth, fear thee to honour any other God than him? Dost thou so regard him that spared not his dear and only Son for thee, so diminishing, yea, utterly extinguishing his glory, that thou wilt attribute the praise and honor due unto him to the idols, which have mouths and speak not, eyes and see not, ears and hear not; which shall perish with them that made them?

What saith the prophet Baruch, where he recited the epistle of Jeremy, written to the captive Jews? Did he not forewarn them, that in Babylon they should see gods of gold, silver, wood, and stone, borne upon men's shoulders, to cast a fear before the heathen? "But be ye not afraid of them, (saith Jeremy) nor do as others do. But when you see others worship them, say you in your hearts, It is thou, O Lord, that oughtest only to be worshipped; for as of these gods, the carpenter framed them and polished them, yea, gilded be they, and laid over with silver and vain things, and cannot speak." He sheweth, moreover, the abuse of their dealings, how the priest took off their ornaments, and apparelled their women withal; how one holdeth a sceptre, another a sword in his hand, and yet can they judge in no matter, nor defend themselves; much less any other, from either battle or murder, nor yet from gnawing of worms, nor any other evil thing. These and such like words speaketh Jeremy unto them, whereby he proveth them to be but vain things, and no gods. And at last he concludeth thus, "Confounded be all they that worship them." They were warned by Jeremy, and thou as Jeremy hast warned others, and art warned thyself by many scriptures in many places. God saith, he is a jealous God, which will have all honour, glory, and worship, given to him only. And Christ saith in the fourth of Matthew, to Satan which tempted him, even to the same Beelzebub, the same devil which hath prevailed against thee: "It is written (saith he) thou shalt honour the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

These and such like do prohibit thee and all christians to worship any other God, than which was before all worlds, and laid the foundations both of heaven and earth: and wilt thou honour a detestable idol, invented by Romish popes, and the abominable college of crafty cardinals? Christ offered himself up once for all, and wilt thou offer him up again daily at thy pleasure? But thou wilt say, thou doest it for a good intent. O sink of sin! O child of perdition! Dost thou dream therein of a good intent, where thy conscience beareth thee witness of God's threatened wrath against thee? How did Saul? who, for that he disobeyed the word of the Lord for a good intent, was thrown from his worldly and temporal kingdom. Shalt thou then, that dost deface God's honour, and rob him of his right, inherit the eternal and heavenly kingdom? Wilt thou for a good intent dishonour God, offend thy brother, and danger thy soul, for which Christ hath shed his most precious blood? Wilt thou for a good intent pluck Christ out of heaven, and make his death void, and deface the triumph of his cross by offering up daily? Wilt thou, either for fear of death, or hope of life, deny and refuse thy God, who enriched thy poverty, healed thy infirmity, and yields to thee his victory, if thou couldst have kept it? Dost thou not consider, that the thread of thy life hangeth upon him that made thee, who can (as his will is) either twine it harder to last the longer, or untwine it again to break the sooner? Dost thou not then remember the saying of David, a notable king, to teach thee a miserable wretch, in his 40th Psalm, where he saith thus: "When thou takest away thy Spirit, O Lord, from men, they die and are turned again to their dust: but when thou lettest thy breath go forth, they shall be made, and thou shalt renew the face of the earth." Remember the saying of Christ in his gospel: "Whosoever seeketh to save his life, shall lose it: but whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it."

Last of all, let the lively remembrance of the last day be always before your eyes, remembering the terror that such shall be in at that time, with the runagates and fugitives from Christ, which setting more by the world than by heaven, more by their life than by him that gave them life, did shrink, yea, did clean fall away upon him that forsook not them: and contrariwise, the inestimable joys prepared for them, that fearing no peril, nor dreading death, have manfully fought, and victoriously triumphed over all the powers of darkness, over hell, death, and damnation, through their most redoubted captain Christ, who now stretcheth out his arms to receive you, ready to fall upon your neck and kiss you, and last of all to feast you with the dainties and delicacies of his own precious blood: which undoubtedly, if it might stand with his determinate purpose, he would not scruple to shed again, rather than you should be lost. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour, praise, and glory everlasting, Amen.

"Be constant, be constant, fear not for any pain:

LETTER

Which LADY JANE sent to her SISTER, the LADY KATHERINE, the Night before she suffered, written at the End of the New Testament in Greek.

Good Sister Katherine.

I Have here sent you a book, which although it be not outwardly trimmed with gold, yet inwardly is more worth than precious stones. It is the Book (dear sister) of the law of the Lord. It is his testament and last will, which he bequeathed unto us wretches; which shall lead you to the path of eternal joy: and, if you with a good mind read it, and with an earnest mind do purpose to follow it, it shall bring you to an immortal and everlasting life. It shall teach you to live, and learn you to die: it shall win you more than you should have gained by the possession of your woful father's lands. For as if God had prospered him, you should have inherited his lands; so if you apply diligently this book, seeking to direct your life after it, you shall be an inheritor of such riches, as neither the covetous shall withdraw from you, neither thief shall steal, neither yet the moths corrupt. Desire with David, good sister, to understand the law of the Lord God. Live still to die, that you by death may purchase eternal life. And trust not that the tenderness of your age shall lengthen your life; for as soon (if God call) goeth the young as the old: and labour always to learn to die. Defy the world, deny the devil; despise the flesh, and delight yourself only in the Lord. Be penitent for your sins, and yet despair not: be strong in faith, and yet presume not; and desire with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, with whom even in death there is life. Be like the good servant, and even at midnight be waking, lest when death cometh and stealeth upon you as a thief in the night, you be, with the evil servant found sleeping; and lest for lack of oil, you be found like the five foolish women, and like him that had not on the wedding garment, and then ye be cast out from the marriage. Rejoice in Christ, as I do. Follow the steps of your master Christ, and take up your cross; lay your sins on his back, and always embrace him. And as touching my death, rejoice as I do, (good sister) that I shall be delivered of this corruption, and put on incorruption. For I am assured, that I shall, for losing of a mortal life, win an immortal life, the which I pray God grant you, and send you of his grace to live in his fear, and to die in the true christian faith, from the which, (in God's name) I exhort you, that you never swerve, neither for hope of life, nor for fear of death. For if you will deny his truth, to lengthen your life, God will deny you, and shorten your days. And if you cleave unto him, he will prolong your days to your comfort and his glory: to which glory God bring me now, and you hereafter, when it pleaseth him to call you. Fare you well, good sister, and put your only trust in God, who only must help you.

The BEHAVIOUR and DYING WORDS of LADY JANE upon the SCAFFOLD.

When she mounted the scaffold, she spake to the spectators in this manner. "Good people. I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me; but touching the procurement and desire thereof by me or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good christian people, this day;" and therewith she wrung her hands wherein she had her book. "Then (said she) I pray you all good christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other means, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ: and I confess, that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, loved myself and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily happened unto me for my sins: and yet I thank God that of his goodness he hath thus given me a time and respite to repent: and now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers." And then kneeling down, she turned to Fecknam, saying, "Shall I say this psalm?" and he said, Yea. Then she said the psalm of Miserere mei Deus, in English, in a most devout manner throughout to the end; and then she stood up, and gave her maid, Mrs. Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Mr. Bruges: and then she untied her gown, and the executioner pressed upon her to help her off with it, but she desiring him to let her alone, turned towards her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frowes, paaft, and neckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to put about her eyes.

Then the executioner kneeled down and asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he desired her to stand upon the straw, which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, I pray you dispatch me quickly.

quickly. Then she kneeled down, saying, Will you take it off before I lay me down? and the executioner said, No, madam. Then she tied the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block, she said, What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it? One of the standers by guiding her thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretching forth her body, said, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit;" and so finished her life, in the year of our Lord 1554, the 12th day of February, about the 17th year of her age.

Thus died the lady Jane, and on the same day the lord Guildford her husband, one of the duke of Northumberland's sons, was likewise beheaded, two innocents in comparison of them that sat upon them. For they were both very young, and ignorantly accepted that which others had contrived, and by open proclamation consented to take from others, and give to them.

Touching the condemnation of this pious lady, it is to be noted, that judge Morgan, who gave sentence against her, soon after he had condemned her, fell mad and in his raving cried out continually to have the lady Jane taken away from him; and so he ended his life.

On the 21st day of the same month, Henry duke of Suffolk was beheaded on Tower-hill, the fourth day after his condemnation: about which time many gentlemen and yeomen were condemned, whereof some were executed at London, and some in the country. In the number of whom was the lord Thomas Gray, brother to the said duke, being apprehended not long after in North Wales, and executed for the same. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton very narrowly escaped.

On the 24th day of February, in the same year, Bonner, bishop of London, sent a commission, directed to all the pastors and curates of his diocese, for the taking of the names of all such as should refuse to come to auricular confession of the Lent following, and to the receiving at Easter. The copy of which here followeth.

EDMUND, by the permission of God, bishop of London, to all parsons, vicars, curates, and ministers of the church, within the city and diocese of London, sendeth grace, peace, and mercy in our Lord everlasting. Forasmuch as by the order of the ecclesiastical laws and constitutions of this realm, and the laudable usage and custom of the whole catholic church, by many hundred years ago, duly and devoutly observed and kept, all faithful people being of lawful age and discretion, are bound once in the year at least (except reasonable cause excuse them) to be confessed to their own proper curate, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, with due preparation and devotion: and forasmuch also as we be credibly informed, that sundry evil disposed and undevout persons, given to sensual pleasures, and carnal appetites, following the lusts of their body, and neglecting utterly the health of their souls, do forbear to come to confession according to the said usage, and to receive the sacrament of the altar accordingly, giving thereby pernicious and evil example to the younger sort, to neglect and contemn the same: We minding the reformation thereof for our own discharge, and desirous of good order to be kept, and good example to be given; do will and command you by virtue hereof, that immediately upon the receipt of this our commandment, ye and every each of you within your cure and charge, do use all your diligence and dexterity to declare the same, straitly charging and commanding all your parishioners, being of lawful age and discretion, to come before Easter next coming, to confession, according to the said ordinance and usage, with due preparation and devotion, to receive the said sacrament of the altar, and that ye do note the names of all such as be not confessed unto you, and do not receive of you the said sacrament, certifying us, or our chancellor or commissary thereof, before the sixth day of April next ensuing the date hereof; that so we knowing thereby who did not come to confession, and receiving the sacrament accordingly, may proceed against them, as being persons culpable, and transgressors of the said ecclesiastical law and usage. Further also certifying us, our said chancellor or commissary, before the day aforesaid, whether you have your altars set up, chalice-book, vestments, and all things necessary for mass, and the administration of sacraments and sacramentals, with procession, and all other divine service prepared and in readiness, according to the order of the catholic church, and the virtuous and godly example of the queen's majesty. And if ye so have not, ye then with the churchwardens cause the same to be provided for, signifying by whose fault and negligence the same want or fault hath proceeded, and generally of the not coming of your parishioners to church, undue walking, talking, or using of themselves there irreverently in the time of divine service, and of all other open faults and misdemeanors, not omitting thus to do, and certify as before, as you will answer upon your peril for the contrary.

Given at London the 23d of February, in the year of our Lord 1554.

On the fourth of March following the queen sent a letter to Bonner, bishop of London, with certain articles annexed thereunto, to be put in speedy execution, containing as follows:

QUEEN MARY'S LETTER to BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

RIGHT reverend father in God, right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. And whereas heretofore in the time of the late reign of our most dear brother king Edward the sixth, whose soul God pardon, divers notable crimes, excesses and faults, with sundry kinds of heresies, simony, adultery, and other enormities have been committed within this our realm, and other our dominions, the same continuing yet hitherto in like disorder since the beginning of our reign, without any correction or reformation at all, and the people both of the laity and also of the clergy, and chiefly of the clergy, have been given to much insolency and ungodly rule, greatly to the displeasure of Almighty God, and very much to our regret and evil acceptation, and to no little slander of other christian realms, and in a manner to the subversion and clean defacing of this our realm; and remembering our duty to Almighty God, to be to foresee (as much as in us may be) that all virtue and godly living shall be embraced, flourish and increase; and therewith also that all vice and ungodly behaviour should be banished and put away, or at the leastwise (so nigh as might be) so bridled and kept under, that godliness and honesty might have the upper hand; understanding by very credible report and public fame, to our no small heaviness and discomfort, that within your diocese, as well in not exempted as exempted places, the like disorder and evil behaviour hath been done and used, like also to continue and increase, unless due provision be had and made to reform the same; which earnestly in very deed we do mind and intend to the uttermost all the ways we can possible, trusting of God's furtherance and help in that behalf. For these causes and other most just considerations us moving, we send unto you certain articles of such special matters, as among other things be most necessary now to be put in execution by you and your officers, extending to the end by us desired, and the reformation aforesaid: wherein ye shall be charged with our special commandment, by these our letters, to the intent you and your officers may the more earnestly and boldly proceed thereunto, without fear of any presumption to be noted in your part, or danger to be incurred of any such our laws, as by our doing of that is in the said articles contained, might any wise grieve you, whatsoever be threatened in any such case. And therefore we straitly charge and command you, and your said officers, to proceed to the execution of the said articles, without all tract and delay, as ye will answer to the contrary.

Given under our signet, at our palace of Westminster, the third day of March, the first year of our reign.

ARTICLES sent from the QUEEN unto the ORDINARY, commanding both him and his Officers to see them put in Execution throughout the whole Diocese.

FIRST, That every bishop and his officers, with all others having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, shall with all speed and diligence, and all manner of ways to them possible, put in execution all such canons and ecclesiastical laws, heretofore in the time of king Henry the eighth used within this realm of England, and the dominions of the same, not being directly and expressly contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm.

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers, or other person aforesaid, hereafter in any ecclesiastical writing, in process or other extrajudicial acts, do use to put in this clause or sentence, [supported by royal authority.]

Item, That no bishop, or any of his officers or other person aforesaid, do hereafter exact or demand in the admission of any person to any ecclesiastical promotion, order, or office, any oath touching the primacy or succession, as of late in few years passed have been accustomed and used.

Item, That every bishop and his officers, with all other persons aforesaid, have a vigilant eye, and use special diligence and foresight, that no person be admitted or received to any ecclesiastical function, benefice, or office, being a sacramentary, infected or defamed with any notable kind of heresy, or other great crime; and that the said bishop do stay, and cause to be stayed, as much as lieth in him, that benefices and ecclesiastical promotions do not notably decay, or take hindrance, by passing or confirming of unreasonable leases.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do diligently travel for the repressing of heresies and notable crimes, especially in the clergy, duly correcting and punishing the same.

Item, That every bishop, and all the other persons aforesaid, do likewise travel for the condemning and repressing of corrupt and naughty opinions; unlawful books, ballads, and other pernicious and hurtful devices, engendering hatred amongst the people, and discord among the same. And that schoolmasters, preachers, and teachers, do exercise and use their offices and duties without teaching, preaching, or setting forth any evil and corrupt doctrine, and that doing the contrary, they may be by the bishop and his said officers punished and removed.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, proceeding summarily, and with all celerity and speed, may and shall deprive or declare deprived, and remove, according to their learning and discretion, all such persons from their benefices and ecclesiastical promotions, who contrary to the state of their order, and the laudable custom of the church, have married and used women as their wives, or otherwise notably and slanderously disordered or abused themselves: sequestering also, during the said process, the fruits and profits of the said benefices and ecclesiastical promotions.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do use more lenity and clemency with such as have married, whose wives be dead, than with other whose women do yet remain alive. And likewise such priests, as with the consent of their wives or women openly in the presence of the bishop do profess to abstain, to be used more favourably. In which case, after the penance effectually done, the bishop, according to his discretion and wisdom, may upon just consideration receive and admit them again to their former administration, so it be not in the same place, appointing them such a portion to live upon, to be paid out of their benefice whereof they be deprived by discretion of the said bishop or his officer, as he shall think may be spared of the said benefice.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do foresee that they suffer not any religious man, having solemnly professed chastity, to continue with his woman or wife, but that all such persons, after deprivation of their benefice or ecclesiastical promotion, be also divorced every one from his said woman, and due punishment otherwise taken for the offence therein.

Item, That every bishop, and all other persons aforesaid, do take order and direction with the parishioners of every benefice, where priests do want, to repair to the next parish for divine service, or to appoint for a convenient time, till other better provision may be made, one curate to serve in the room of another, in divers parishes, and to allot to the curate for his labour some portion of the benefice that he so serveth.

Item, That all and all manner of processions of the church be used and frequented, and continued after the old order of the church, in the Latin tongue.

Item, That all such holy days and fasting days be observed and kept, as were observed and kept in the latter time of king Henry the eighth.

Item, That the laudable and honest ceremonies which were wont to be used, frequented, and observed in the church, be also hereafter frequented, used, and observed.

Item, That children be christened by the priest, and confirmed by the bishop, as heretofore hath been accustomed and used.

Item, Touching such persons as were heretofore promoted to any orders, after the new sort and fashion of orders: considering they were not ordered in very deed, the bishop of the diocese, finding otherwise sufficiency and ability in those men, may supply that thing which wanted in them before, and then according to his discretion admit them to minister.

Item, That by the bishop of the diocese an uniform doctrine be set forth by Homilies, or otherwise, for the good instruction and teaching of all people: And that the said bishop and other persons aforesaid, do compel the parishioners to come to their several churches, and there devoutly to hear divine service, as of reason they ought.

Item, That they examine all schoolmasters and teachers of children, and finding them suspected in any wise, to remove them, and place catholic men in their rooms, with a special commandment to instruct their children, so as they may be able to answer the priest at the mass, as hath been accustomed.

Item, That the said bishop, and all other the persons aforesaid, have such regard, respect, and consideration of and for the setting forth of the premises, with all kind of virtue, godly living, and good example, with repressing also and keeping under of vice and unthriftiness, as they and every of them may be seen to favour the restitution of true religion; and also to make an honest account and reckoning of their office and cure, to the honour of God, our good content and profit of this our realm, and the dominions of the same.

A like charge also, with articles, was sent from queen Mary to the lord Mayor of London, the fourth day of March, in the same year, who, upon receiving the same, directed his commandment to the aldermen, every one severally in his ward, as followeth:

By the LORD MAYOR.

ON the queen our most gracious and most benign sovereign lady's behalf, we most straitly charge and command you, that ye the said aldermen fail not personally to call before your own person in such place within your said ward, as to you shall seem most convenient and meet, upon Wednesday next coming, which shall be the seventh day of this present month, at seven of the clock in the morning of the same day, all and every the householders both poor and rich of your said ward, and then and there openly and plainly for your own discharge, and for the eschewing the perils that to you might otherwise be justly imputed and laid, do not only straitly admonish, charge, and command, in the queen our said sovereign lady's name and behalf, all and every the said householders, that both in their own persons, and also their wives, children, and servants, being of the age of twelve years and upwards, and every of them, do at all and every time or times from henceforth, and namely, at the holy time of Easter now approaching, honestly, quietly, obediently, and catholicly, use and behave themselves like good and faithful christian people, in all and every thing and things touching and concerning cerning the true faith, profession, and religion of his catholic church, both according to the laws and precepts of Almighty God, and also their bounden duty of obedience towards our sovereign lady the queen, her laws and statutes, and her highness's most good example and gracious proceeding according to the same, and according also to the right, wholesome, charitable and godly admonition, charge and exhortation, late set forth and given, by the right reverend father in God, the bishop of London, our diocesan and ordinary, to all the parsons, vicars, and curates, within his diocese: but also, that they and every of them do truly, without delay, advertise you of the names and surnames of all and every person and persons, that they, or any of them, can or may at any time hereafter know, perceive or understand to transgress or offend, in any point or article concerning the premises, at their utmost perils. That ye, immediately after such notice thereof to you given, do forthwith advertise us thereof. Fail ye not thus to do with all circumspection and diligence, as ye will answer to our said most dread sovereign lady the queen for the contrary at your like peril. Given at the Guild-hall of the city of London, the 5th day of March, in the first year of the reign of our said sovereign lady and queen.

BLACKWELL.

And likewise do you give to every of the said householders straitly in commandment, that they or their wives depart not out of the said city, until this holy time of Easter be past.

About the same year and time that Bonner published his prescript or charge, there came from the queen another proclamation, commanding all foreigners and strangers to depart this realm. The copy of which proclamation, which related chiefly to religion and doctrine, is as followeth.

THE queen our sovereign lady, understanding that a multitude of evil disposed persons, being born out of her highness's dominions in other sundry nations, flying from the obedience of the princes and rulers under whom they be born, (some for heresy, some for murder, treason, robbery, and some for other horrible crimes,) be resorted into this her majesty's realm, and here have made their demurrer, and yet be commorant and lingering, to eschew such condign punishment as their said horrible crimes deserve, on purpose to infect her good subjects with the like, inasmuch as besides innumerable heresies, which divers of the same being heretics have preached and taught within her highness's said realm, it is assuredly known unto her majesty, that not only their secret practices have not failed to stir, comfort, and aid divers her highness's subjects to this most unnatural rebellion against God and her grace, but also some other of them desist not still to practice with her people forthwith to rebel: her majesty therefore, having (as afore-said) knowledge and intelligence hercof, hath for remedy herein determined and most straitly chargeth and commandeth, that all and every such person and persons born out of her highness's dominions, now commorant or resident within this realm, of whatsoever nation or country, being either preacher, printer, bookseller, or other artificer, or of whatsoever calling else, not being denizen or merchant known using the trade of merchandize, or servant to such ambassadors as be leigers here from the princes and states joined in league with her grace, shall within twenty-four days of this proclamation, avoid the realm upon pain of most grievous punishment by imprisonment, and forfeiture of all their goods and moveables, and also to be delivered unto their natural princes or rulers, against whose persons or laws they have offended. Giving to all mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, subjects, &c. straitly also in charge, if they know any such person, not born in the queen's highness's dominions (except before excepted) that shall, after the time and day limited in the proclamation, tarry within this realm, that they shall apprehend the same person or persons to the intent order may be forthwith given for their punishment accordingly."

Upon this proclamation, not only the strangers who were received into the realm, for the sake of religion, in king Edward's time, (among whom were Peter Martyr, and John Alasco, the king of Poland's uncle) but many Englishmen also fled, some to Friezland, some to Cleveland, some into high Germany; where they were diversly scattered into different companies and congregations, at Wesel, Frankfort, Basil, Zurich, Geneva, and other places; wherein, by the providence of God, near eight hundred persons were all sustained, and entertained, with much greater kindness, by strangers abroad, than they could be in their own country at home.

In the month of March, likewise, the lord Courtney, earl of Devonshire, and the queen's sister, by a political trick of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, were committed to the Tower, under a pretended suspicion of their having been consenting to Wyat's conspiracy. This Gardiner had always been a capital enemy to lady Elizabeth, and by means of Wyat's rebellion, the jesuitical bishop hoped to gather something, whereby he might accuse both that princess and lord Courtney; but the same day sir Thomas Wyat was executed, he desired the lieutenant of the Tower to conduct him to the presence of lord Courtney; where, before the lieutenant and the sheriffs, kneeling down, he besought lord Courtney's forgiveness, for that he had falsely accused both him and the lady Elizabeth; and when carried from thence to the scaffold, he there, publicly in the face of all the spectators, declared, that lady Elizabeth and lord Courtney were intirely innocent, and had not the least knowledge of, nor concern in the Kentish insurrection. At which confession, Dr. Weston standing by, had the assurance to address the people, saying, "Believe him not, good people, for he confessed otherwise to the council."

Not long after this, a certain apprentice, living in St. Lawrence-lane, named Cut, as he was drinking with Denham, a plasterer, happened to say, that sir Thomas Wyat had cleared lady Elizabeth, and lord Courtney, of consenting to his rising; which words being brought to Gardiner, (by what means was not known) sir Andrew Judd was immediately sent by the bishop to the lord mayor, commanding him to bring the said apprentice to the star-chamber, he being accused for saying that Wyat was constrained by the council to accuse lady Elizabeth and lord Courtney. When this man was brought to the star-chamber, Gardiner, setting aside all other matters in hand, began with declaring, how miraculously almighty God had brought the queen to the crown, the whole realm being in a manner against her; which event he had brought to pass, for the singular intent and purpose, that this realm being overspread with heresies, she might reduce the same again to the true catholic faith; and as to the lady Elizabeth, having taken her into favour, she had loved her tenderly, and also the lord Courtney; who had been long detained in prison, whom she had set at liberty, bestowing great benefits upon him; yet, notwithstanding all this, they had both most unnaturally and traitorously conspired against her majesty, with that heinous traitor Wyat, as (said he) by the confession of Wyat, and the letters sent to and fro, may plainly appear: but there were some in the city of London who reported, that Wyat was constrained by the council, to accuse lady Elizabeth, and lord Courtney; and you, (said he to the Mayor) my lord, have not seen the same punished. "The party is here, returned the lord mayor." Take him with you, (said Gardiner) and punish him according to his desert; and further, my lord, take heed to your charge; the city of London is a whirlpool and sink of all evil rumours, where they be bred, and from thence spread into all parts of the realm. When he had said this, lord Shandois, lieutenant of the Tower, who stood by at the same time, in order to flatter the bishop in his tale, thus spoke; "My lords, this is a truth that I shall tell you. Being lieutenant of the Tower, when Wyat suffered, he desired me to bring him to lord Courtney; which when I had done, he fell down upon his knees before him in my presence, and and desired him to confess the truth of himself, which he had done before, and submit himself unto the queen's majesty's mercy."

Thus much (says Mr. Fox) I thought fit to declare of this matter, to the intent, that the reader, perceiving the bishop's proceedings in the premises, and comparing the same with the testimony of the sheriffs, who were present the same time when sir Thomas Wyat asked the lord Courtney forgiveness, may better judge of the whole case and matter, for which the lady Elizabeth and the lord Courtney were so long in trouble.

Queen Mary after this, partly fearing the Londoners, by reason of Wyat's conspiracy, and partly perceiving most of the city, for the sake of religion, not to favour greatly her proceedings, in order to shew her displeasure, and to their hindrance, summoned a parliament to be held at Oxford, with a view also of gratifying this city, where both the university, town, and country, had shewed themselves very obedient and forward, especially in restoring the catholic religion. For this purpose, great provision was made, as well by the queen's officers, as by the townsmen of Oxford, and the country round about. But her majesty's mind soon changed, and in April following, the same parliament was held at Westminster; where the queen, among other matters, proposed her marriage with king Philip, which was agreed upon; and likewise the restoring of the pope's supremacy, which could not be obtained. At the same time when this parliament was summoned, the queen likewise summoned a convocation of the bishops and clergy, writing unto Bonner, (whom she had made vicegerent in the room of Cranmer, then in the Tower) in the following style, different from that of Henry VIII. and Edward VI.

"Mary, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, queen, defender of the faith; to the Rev. father in God, Edmund, lord bishop of London, sendeth greeting, &c."

Here the queen's title is altered, the latter part being omitted, namely, "Of the churches of England and Ireland, supreme," because in this session of parliament the supremacy was taken from the crown of England, and restored to the pope: and bishop Bonner giving his certificate upon the same, leaves out Autoritate, &c. "By the authority of our most illustrious queen empowered; which part of the bishop's title, in the same parliament, was likewise repealed and taken away. It is also to be observed that on opening the convocation, Bonner, bishop of London, made a certain exhortation, or oration, to the clergy then assembled, wherein he set forth the most incomparable and superangelical order of priesthood, as will appear from the following fragment, collected by some present, which is well worthy the reader's notice, both because the author of it should not be forgot, and because the estimation of the blessed order should lose nothing of its preeminence; an order, which, according to bishop Bonner, standeth above angels and kings.

BONNER'S ORATION, in Praise of PRIESTHOOD.

WHEREFORE it is to be known, that priests and elders be worthy of all men to be worshipped for the dignity sake which they have of God, as in Matthew xvi. "Whatsoever ye shall loose upon earth, &c. and whatsoever ye shall bind," &c. For a priest by some means is like Mary the Virgin, and is shewed by three points; as the blessed Virgin by five words did conceive Christ, as it is said, Luke i. Fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum: that is to say, "Be it unto me according to thy word:" so the priest by five words doth make the very body of Christ. Even as immediately after the consent of Mary, Christ was all whole in her womb: so immediately after the speaking of the words of consecration, the bread is substantiated into the very body of Christ. Secondly, As the Virgin carried Christ in her arms, and laid him in an ox-stall after his birth; even so the priest after the consecration, doth lift up the body of Christ, and placeth it, and carrieth it, and handleth it with his hands. Thirdly, As the blessed Virgin was sanctified before she had conceived; so the priest being ordained and appointed before he doth consecrate, because without orders he could consecrate nothing; therefore the layman cannot do that thing, although he be ever so holy, and do speak the self-same words of consecration. Therefore here is to be known, that the dignity of priests by some means passeth the dignity of angels, because there is no power given to any of the angels to make the body of Christ. Whereby the least priest may do on earth, that which the greatest and highest angel in heaven cannot do. Whereupon St. Ambrose upon St. Luke saith, "Doubt thou not the angels to be where Christ is present upon the altar." Wherefore priests are to be honoured before all kings of the earth, princes, and nobles. For a priest is higher than a king, happier than an angel, maker of his Creator. Wherefore, &c.

We have before observed, that Dr. Ridley was removed from Fremingham to the Tower; while there, being one day invited to the lord lieutenant's table, he had a conference, or conversation, with secretary Bourne, Mr. Fecknam, (the queen's commissioners,) and others, concerning the controversies in religion; the sum whereof, as penned by Dr. Ridley himself, is as follows.

A CONVERSATION that passed in the TOWER, at the LORD LIEUTENANT's TABLE between Dr. RIDLEY, SECRETARY BOURNE, and Mr. FECKNAM.

Mr. Thomas Bridges said, at his brother's the lord lieutenant's table, I pray you, doctors, for my information, tell me what an heretic is. Secretary Bourne said, I will tell you who is an heretic; who so stubbornly and stiffly maintaineth an untruth, he is an heretic. You mean sir, said I, an untruth in matters of religion, and concerning our faith. Yes, that is true, said he; and in this we are soon agreed. Then said Mr. Fecknam, whom they called master dean of Paul's, sitting at the upper end of the table, I will tell you by St. Augustine who is an heretic; "He that either for the sake of princes, or for the sake of filthy lucre, sets on foot or propagates wrong notions, he is an heretic." Sir, said I, I think St. Augustine addeth the third number, which is, "Or for the sake of vain glory." You say even true, master doctor, said he, and thus far we did agree all three.

Mr. Fecknam began again, saying, Who so doth not believe what the scripture affirmeth, but will obstinately maintain the contrary, he is an heretic; as in the sacrament of the altar, Matthew doth affirm there to be Christ's body, Mark doth affirm it, Luke affirmeth it, Paul affirmeth it, and none denieth it: therefore to hold the contrary, is heresy. It is the same body and flesh that was born of the virgin; and this is confirmed by unity, antiquity, and universality. For none before Berengarius did ever doubt of this, and he was an heretic, as master doctor there knoweth full well; I do take to witness his own conscience, said he.

In truth, said the secretary, Mr. Fecknam hath spoken well. These are great matters, unity, antiquity, and universality. Do not you think so, Dr. Ridley?

Here, while I seemed unwilling to talk, one of the commissioners said, Peradventure Dr. Ridley doth agree with Mr. Fecknam, and in that case there needs not much debating of the matter.

Sir, said I, in some things I do, and shall agree with him; and in some things which he has spoken to be plain, I do not agree with him at all. Masters, said I, ye are (as I understand) the queen's commissioners here, and if ye have commission to examine me in these matters, I shall declare unto you plainly my faith; if ye have not, then I shall pray you either to give me leave to speak my mind freely, or else to hold my peace.

There is none here, said the secretary, that doth not favour you: and then every man shewed what favour they bare towards me, and how glad they would be of an agreement.

Taking this shew of courtsey for a licence to speak my sentiments freely, I thus proceeded.

To Mr. Fecknam's arguments of the manifold affirmations where no denial was, I answered; Where is a multitude of affirmations in scripture, and where is one affirmation, all is one concerning the truth of the matter, for that which any one of the evangelists spake, inspired by the Holy Ghost, was as true as that which is spoken of

of them all. It is as true what John saith of Christ "I am the door of the sheep," as if all had said it. For it is not in scripture as in witnesses of men, where the number is credited more than one, because it is uncertain with what spirit he doth speak. And where Mr. Feckman spake of so many, affirming, without any negation, &c. Sir, said I, all they do affirm the thing which they meant. Now if ye take their words, to leave their meaning, then do they affirm what ye take, but not what they meant. If in talk with you, I should so utter my mind in words, that ye by the same do, and may plainly perceive my meaning, and could if you would be captious, cavil at my words, and writhe them to another sense, I would think ye were no gentle companions to talk with, except ye would take my words as ye perceived I did mean.

Mr. Feckman perceiving whereunto my discourse tended, said, What circumstances can you shew that shall move me to think of any other sense than as the words plainly say, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you?"

Sir, said I, even the next sentence that followeth, viz. "Do this in my remembrance." And also by what reason ye say the bread is turned into Christ's carnal body, by the same I may say, that it is turned into his mystical body. For as that saith of it, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you," so Paul, who spake by Christ's Spirit, saith, "We being many, are all but one bread and one body, inasmuch as we are partakers of one bread."

Here he called one bread, one loaf, said the secretary. Yes, said I, one loaf, one bread, all is one with me. But what say you of the universality, antiquity, and unity, that Mr. Fecknam spoke of?

I assure you, said I, I think them weighty matters, and to be considered well. As for unity, the truth is before God, I do believe it, and embrace it, so it be with verity, and joined to our head Christ, and such an one as St. Paul speaketh of, saying, "One faith, one God, one baptism." And for antiquity, I am also persuaded that to be true which Irenæus saith; That which is first is true. In our religion Christ's faith was first truly taught by Christ himself, by his apostles, and by many good men, that from the beginning did succeed next unto them; and for this controversy of the sacrament, I am persuaded that those old writers, which wrote before the controversy, and the usurping of the see of Rome, do all agree if they be well understood in this truth.

Now as for universality, it may have two meanings; one to understand that to be universal, which from the beginning in all ages hath been allowed; another to understand universality for the multitude of our age, or of any other singular age.

No, no, said Mr. Secretary, these three do always agree, and where there is one, there is all the rest; and here he and I changed many words. To be short in this matter, we did not agree.

C H A P. IV.

An AUTHENTIC ACCOUNT of a PUBLIC DISPUTATION appointed by the QUEEN's special Command in a CONVOCATION held at St. MARY's CHURCH, in OXFORD.

ABOUT the tenth of April, Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, Ridley bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, were conveyed as prisoners from the Tower to Windsor, and from thence to the university of Oxford, there to dispute with the divines and learned men of both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge, about the presence, substance, and sacrifice of the sacrament. The names of the university doctors, and graduates, appointed to dispute against them were these: of Oxford, Dr. Weston, prolocutor, Dr. Tresham, Dr. Cole, Dr. Oglethorpe, Dr. Pie, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Fecknam. Of Cambridge, Dr. Young, vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Watson, Dr. Sedgewick, Dr. Atkinson, &c. The articles or questions whereupon they should dispute were these:

1. Whether the natural body of Christ be really in the sacrament after the words spoken by the priest or not?
2. Whether in the sacrament, after the words of consecration, any other substance do remain, than the substance of the body and blood of Christ?
3. Whether in the mass there be a sacrifice propitiatory for the sins of the quick and the dead?

On Saturday the 7th day of April, the heads of the colleges in Cambridge being assembled together, letters coming down from Stephen Gardiner, lord chancellor, were read with articles therewith annexed, that should be disputed upon at Oxford. Whereupon in the said congregation of the aforesaid university of Cambridge, there was granted first a grace in this form, proposed by the senior proctor; "May it please you to have an instrument made, that the doctrine of these aforesaid articles is sound and catholick, and consonant with verity of the right meaning faith, and that the same may be approved by your consent and voices?" Secondly, in the said congregation, another grace was given and granted, that Dr. Young being vice-chancellor, Dr. Glin, Dr. Atkinson, Dr. Scot, and Mr. Sedgewick, should go to Oxford to defend the said articles against Canterbury, London, and Latimer: also to have letters to the Oxford-men, sealed with their common seal. Item, Another grace was granted to Mr. Sedgewick to be actual doctor, being thereupon immediately admitted. The aforesaid letters being then drawn out, the third day after, (which was the 11th day of April) were read in the aforesaid congregation house, and there sealed.

The day after, being the 12th of the same month, the doctors of that university set forward to Oxford, where they arrived on the 13th of April, and lodged, all at the Cross-inn, with one Wakecline, some time a servant to bishop Bonner.

Soon after their coming, Dr. Crooke presented them with wine for their welcome; and shortly after, two of their beadles came from the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and presented the vice-chancellor of Cambridge with a dish of apples and a gallon of wine: after whom Mr. Pie and Fecknam came next to welcome them. Then after consultation concerning the delivery of their letters, and instrument of grace (which was in Dr. Seaton and Dr. Watson's keeping) they all went to Lincoln college to Dr. Weston the prolocutor, and to Dr. Tresham, the vice-chancellor, to whom they delivered their letters, declaring what they had done touching the articles, letters, and graces. Half an hour after eight they returned to their inn again; but first concluded on a procession, sermon, and convocation, on the day following, and that the doctors of Cambridge should be incorporated with the university of Oxford, and that the doctors of Oxford should be incorporated with the university of Cambridge. The same day, the three prisoners were separated, Dr. Ridley to the house of Mr. Irish, Mr. Latimer to another, and Dr. Cranmer remained still in Bocardo, a prison in Oxford.

On Saturday, April 14, at eight o'clock, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, with the other doctors of the same university, repairing to Lincoln college again, found the prolocutor above in the chapel, with a company of the house singing mass for the dead, and tarried there until the end. Then having consulted together in the master's room, about nine they all came to the university church, called St. Mary's, where, after a short consultation in a chapel, the vice-chancellor, the prolocutor, &c. of Oxford, caused the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and the rest of the doctors of that university, to send for their scarlet robes brought from Cambridge, Cambridge, save that Dr. Seaton and Watson borrowed of the Oxford men. By this time the regents, in the congregation house, had granted all the Cambridge doctors their graces, to be incorporate there; and so they went up and were immediately admitted, Dr. Oglethorpe presenting them, and the proctor reading the statute, and giving them their oaths.

That done, they all came into the quire, and there held the convocation of the university: they had mass of the Holy Ghost solemnly sung before them by the quire-men of Christ's church; but first the cause of the convocation was opened in English, partly by the vice-chancellor, and partly by the prolocutor, declaring that they were sent by the queen, and wherefore they were sent, and caused Mr. Say the register openly to read the commission. That done, the vice-chancellor read the Cambridge letters openly, and then concluded, that three notaries, Mr. Say for the convocation, a beadle of Cambridge for that university, and one Mr. White for Oxford, should testify of their doing, and then ordered the said notaries to provide parchment, that the whole assembly might subscribe to the articles, except those that had subscribed before in the convocation house at London and Cambridge; and so the vice-chancellor began first, and the rest of the Oxford men after him, as many as could in the mass time.

Mass being done, they went in procession to Lincoln college, where they dined with the mayor of the town, one alderman, four beades, Mr. Say, and the Cambridge notary. After dinner they all went again to St. Mary's church; and there, after a short consultation in a chapel, all the commissioners came into the quire, and sat on seats before the altar, to the number of thirty-three persons: and first they sent to the mayor, that he should bring in Dr. Cranmer, who within a while was brought to them with a number of trusty bill-men.

The reverend archbishop, when he was brought before the commissioners, paid his respects to them with much humility, and stood with his staff in his hand, who, notwithstanding having a stool offered him, refused to sit.

The prolocutor caused the articles to be read to him, and a copy to be delivered him, assigning him to answer thereunto on Monday next, and so charged the mayor with him again, to be had to Boreado, where he was kept before; offering moreover unto him, to name what books he would occupy, and he should have them brought to him. The archbishop was greatly commended of every body for his modesty: insomuch that some masters of arts were seen to weep for him, which in judgment were contrary to him.

Then was Dr. Ridley brought in, who hearing the articles read to him, immediately replied, they were all false, and said further, that they sprang out of bitter and sour root.

Then he was asked whether he would dispute or no? He answered, "That as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth; but he required time and books." They said he could not, and that he should dispute on Thursday, and till that time he should have books. He said it was unreasonable that he might not have his own books and time also. Then they gave him the articles, and desired him to write his mind of them that night; after which, they commanded the mayor to have him from whence he came.

Last of all came in Mr. Latimer, with a handkerchief, and two or three caps on his head, his spectacles hanging by a string at his breast, and a staff in his hand, and was set in a chair; for so was he suffered by the prolocutor. After his denial of the articles, when he had appointed Wednesday for disputation, he alleged age, sickness, disuse and lack of books, saying, "That he was almost as meet to dispute, as to be a captain of Calais: but he would, he said, declare his mind either by writing or word, and would stand to all they could lay upon his back;" complaining moreover "That he was permitted to have neither pen nor ink, nor yet any book but only the New Testament there in his hand, which he said he had read over seven times deliberately, and yet could not find the mass in it, neither the marrow-bones nor sinews of the same. At which words the commissioners were not a little offended: and Dr. Weston said, "That he would make him grant, that it had both marrow-bones and sinews in the New Testament." To whom Mr. Latimer said again, "That you will never do, Mr. Doctor;" and so forth, with they put him to silence; so that when he was desirous to tell what he meant by those terms, he could not be suffered. There was so great a press and throng of people, that one of the beades swooned by reason thereof, and was carried into the vestry. After this, bringing home the prolocutor first, the Cambridge men, viz. Dr. Young, vice-chancellor, Seaton, Glin, Atkinson, Scot, Watson, and Sedgewick, went to the Cross-inn, to supper. And this was on the 14th day of April.

At nine o'clock, on Sunday morning, Mr. Harpsfield preached at St. Mary's, the university church, where divers of the doctors, in their robes, were placed in due order of precedency. After sermon, they all dined at Magdalen college, and supped at Lincoln college, with the prolocutor Dr. Weston; whither Dr. Cranmer sent his answer upon the articles, in writing.

The ARGUMENTS, REASONS, and ALLEGATIONS, used in this DISPUTATION.

ON Monday, Dr. Weston, with all the residue of the visitors, censors, and opponents, repairing to the divinity school, each one installed themselves in their places. Dr. Cranmer with a rout of rusty bills was brought thither, and set in the answerer's place, with the mayor and alderman sitting by him: where Dr. Weston, prolocutor, apparelled in a scarlet gown, after the custom of the university, began the disputation with this oration:

"You are assembled hither, brethren, this day to confound the detestable heresy of the verity of the body of Christ in the sacrament," &c. At which words thus pronounced unawares, by the prolocutor, several of the learned men there present, considering, and well weighing the words by him uttered, burst out into a great laughter, as though, even in the entrance of the disputation, he had betrayed himself and his religion, by terming the opinion of the verity of Christ's body in the sacrament a detestable heresy. The rest of his oration tended all to this effect, "That it was not lawful, by God's word, to call these questions into controversy: for such as doubted of the words of Christ, might well be thought to doubt both of the truth and power of God." Whereunto Dr. Cranmer, desiring leave, thus answered;

"We are assembled (said he) to discuss these doubtful controversies, and to lay them open before the eyes of the world: whereof ye think it unlawful to dispute. It is indeed no reason that we should dispute of that which is determined upon before the truth be tried. But if these questions be not called into controversy, surely my answer then is looked for in vain." This was the sum of his answer; and this done, he prepared himself for disputation.

Then Chedsey the first opponent began in this manner: Rev. Mr. Doctor, these three conclusions are put forth unto us at present to dispute upon:

1. In the sacrament of the altar, is the natural body of Christ, conceived of the virgin Mary, and also his blood, present really under the forms of bread and wine, by virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest.

2. There remaineth no substance of bread and wine after the consecration, nor any other substance, but the substance of God and man.

3. The lively sacrifice of the church is in the mass propitiatory, as well for the quick as the dead.

These are the arguments whereupon this our present controversy doth rest. Now to the end we might not doubt how you take the same, you have already given up unto us your opinion thereof. I term it your opinion, in that it disagreeeth from the catholic. Wherefore thus I argue.

Obed. Christ, when he instituted his last supper, spake to his disciples, "Take, eat, this is my body which shall be given for you."

But this true body was given for us:

Ergo, His true body is in the sacrament.

Cran. His true body is truly present to them that truly receive him; but spiritually. And so it is taken in a spiritual sense. For when he said, "This is my body," it is all one as if he had said, "This is the breaking of my body, this is the shedding of my blood." As often as you shall do this, it shall put you in remembrance of the breaking of my body, and the shedding of my blood; that as truly as you receive this sacrament, so truly shall you receive the benefit promised by receiving the same worthily.

Obed. Your opinion differeth from the church which saith that the true body is in the sacrament.

Ergo, Your opinion therein is false.

Cran. I say and agree with the church, that the body of Christ is in the sacrament effectually, because the passion of Christ is effectual.

Obed. Christ, when he spake these words, "This is my body," spake of the substance, but not of the effect.

Cran. I grant he spake of the substance, and not of the effect after a sort: and yet it is most true that the body of Christ is effectually in the sacrament. But I deny that he is there truly present in bread, or that under the bread is his original body. And because it would be too tedious (he said) to make discourse of the whole, he delivered up there his opinion thereof to Dr. Weston, written at large, with answers to every one of their three propositions; which he desired Dr. Weston, sitting there on high, to read openly to the people; this he promised to do; but it is not the first promise that such papists have broken. But though the copy of this writing was not read by the prolocutor, we have drawn out the contents thereof, which are as follows:

Dr. CRANMER'S EXPLICATION of the foregoing CONCLUSIONS, exhibited by him.

Cran. IN the assertions of the church and of religion, trifling and new-fangled novelties of words, so much as may be, are to be eschewed, whereof ariseth nothing but contention and brawling about words; and we must follow, so much as we may, the manner of speaking of the scripture.

In the first conclusion, if ye understand by this word [really] re ipsa, that is, in very deed and effectually; so Christ, by the grace and efficacy of his passion, is indeed and truly present to all true and holy members.

But if ye understand by this word [really] corporaliter, that is, corporally; so that by the body of Christ is understood a natural and organical substance, the first proposition doth vary, not only from the usual phrase of scripture, but also is clean contrary to the holy word of God, and christian profession: since both the scripture doth testify by these words, and also the catholic church hath professed from the beginning, that Christ has left the world, and sits at the right hand of the Father till he come to judgment.

And likewise I answer to the second question: that is, That it swerveth from the accustomed manner and speech of scripture.

The third conclusion, as it is intricate and wrapped in all doubtful and ambiguous words, and differing also much from the true speech of scripture, so as the words thereof seem to import no open sense, is most contumelious against our only Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, and a violating of his precious blood, which, upon the altar of the cross, is the only sacrifice and oblation for the sins of all mankind.

Obed. By this your interpretation which you have made upon the first conclusion, this I understand, the body of Christ to be in the sacrament only by the way of participation: inasmuch as we communicating thereof, do participate the grace of Christ; so that you mean hereby only the effect thereof. But our conclusion standeth upon the substance, and not the efficacy only, which shall appear by the testimony both of scripture and of all the fathers a thousand years after Christ.

And first to begin with the scripture, let us consider what is written in Matt. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii. and 1 Cor. xi. Matthew saith, as they sat at supper, Jesus took bread, &c. In Mark there is the same sense, although not the same words, who also for one part of the sacrament speaketh more plainly, Jesus taking bread, &c. After the same sense also writeth Luke: And when Jesus had taken bread, &c. In the mouth of two or three witnesses, saith the scripture, standeth all truth. Here we have three witnesses together, that Christ said, that to be his body which was given for many, and that to be his blood which should be shed for many; whereby is declared the substance, and not only the efficacy alone thereof. Ergo, It is not true that you say, there to be not the substance of his body, but the efficacy alone thereof.

Cran. Thus you gather upon mine answer, as though I did mean of the efficacy, and not of the substance of the body; but I mean of them both, as well of the efficacy as of the substance.

West. We will not consume and spend the time in waste, this your writing which you exhibit, hereafter shall be read in this place. In the mean season let us now fall to the arguments.

Obed. The scriptures in many places do affirm, that Christ gave his natural body, Matth. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii.

Ergo, I do conclude that the natural body is in the sacrament.

Cran. To your argument I answer: If you understand by the body natural [organicum], that is, having such proportion and members as he had living here, then I answer negatively.

Furthermore, concerning the evangelists, this I say and grant, that Christ took bread, and called it his body.

Obed. The text of the scripture maketh against you, for the circumstance thereto annexed doth teach us, not only there to be the body, but also teacheth us what manner of body it is, and saith, The same body which shall be given.

That thing is here contained, that is given for us.

But the substance of bread is not given for us.

Ergo, The substance of bread is not here contained.

Cran. I understand not yet what you mean by this word [contained]: If you mean really, then I deny your major.

Obed. The major is the text of scripture. He that denieth the major, denieth the scripture. For the scripture saith, This is my body which is given for you.

Cran. I grant he said it was his body which should be given, but he said it was not his body which is here contained; but the body (saith he) that shall be given for you. As though he should say, This bread is the breaking of my body, and this cup is the shedding of my blood. What will ye say then? Is the bread the breaking of his body, and the cup the shedding of his blood really? If you say so, I deny it.

Obed. If you ask what is the thing therein contained; because his apostles should not doubt what body it was that should be given, he saith, This is my body which shall be given for you, and my blood which shall be shed for many. Ergo, Here is the same substance of the body, which the day after was given, and the same blood which was shed. And here I urge the scripture, which teacheth that it was no phantastical, no feigned, no spiritual body, nor body in faith, but the substance of the body.

Cran. You must prove that it is contained, but Christ said not which is contained. He gave bread, and called that his body. I stick not in the words of the scripture, but in your word, which is feigned and imagined by yourself.

Ched. When Christ took bread and brake it, what gave he?

Cran. He gave bread; the bread sacramentally, and his body spiritually; and the bread there he called his body.

Ched. This answer is against the scripture, which saith, that he gave his body.

Cran. It did signify that which he did eat.

Ched. They did not eat the body as the Capernaïtes did understand it, but the self-same body which was given for the sins of the world. Ergo, It was his body which should be given, and his blood which should be shed.

In some other copies (says Mr. Fox) I find this argument to be made by Chedsey.

The same body is in the sacrament, which was given for us on the cross.

But bread was not given for us on the cross.

Ergo (therefore) bread is not given in the sacrament.

Cran. I deny the major, which is, that the same natural body is given in the sacrament, which was given on the cross, except you understand it spiritually. And after he denied also the argument as utterly void, as he might well do, the major in the second figure being not universal.

When Mr. Chedsey had put forth his argument, and prosecuted the same, and Dr. Cranmer answered as before is shewed, Dr. Oglethorpe, one of those doctors which the prolocutor called Censores (who sat as arbiters to order the disputation) said on this wise.

D. Ogle. You come in still with one evasion or starting hole to flee to. He urgeth the scriptures, saying, that Christ gave his very body. You say that he gave his body in bread. Quomodo prædicatur corpus? qualis est corpus? qualis est prædicatio? panis est corpus.

Cran. You should say, Quale corpus. I answer to the question: it is the same body which was born of the virgin, was crucified, ascended; but tropically, and by a figure. And so I say, Panis est corpus, is a figurative speech, speaking sacramentally, for it is a sacrament of his body.

Ogle. This word [body] being prædicatum, doth signify substance.

But substantia is not predicated denominatively.

Ergo, It is an essential predication, and so it is his true body, and not the figure of his body.

Cran. Substantia may be predicated denominatively in an allegory, or in a metaphor, or in a figurative locution.

Ogle. It is not a likely thing that Christ hath less care for his spouse the church, than a wife householder hath for his family in making his will or testament.

Cran. Your reason is drawn out of affairs of men, and not taken out of the holy scriptures.

Ogle. But no householder maketh his testament after that sort.

Cran. Yes, there are many that so do. For what matter is it so it be understood and perceived? I say, Christ did use figurative speech in no place more than in his sacraments, and especially in this of his supper.

Ogle. No man of purpose doth use tropes in his testament, for if he do, he deceiveth them that he comprehendeth in his testament: therefore Christ useth none here.

Cran. Yes, he may use them well enough. You know not what tropes are.

Ogle. The good man of the house hath respect that his heirs, after his departure, may live in quiet and without wrangling.

But they cannot be in quiet if he do use tropes.

Therefore (I say) he useth no tropes.

Cran. I deny your minor.

West. Augustine, in his book intituled, De Unitate Ecclesiæ, chap. x. hath these words following:

"What a thing is this, I pray you, when the last words of one lying upon his death-bed are heard which is ready to go to his grave, no man saith that he hath made a lye, and he is not accounted his heir which regardeth not those words. How shall we then escape God's wrath, if either not believing, or not regarding, we shall reject the last words both of the only Son of God, and also of our Lord and Saviour, both ascending into heaven, and beholding from thence, who despiseth, who observeth them not, and so shall come from thence to judge all men."

West. This saith Chrysostom, Homil. 61. ad pop. Antioch. "Needful it is, dear friends, to tell you what the miracle of the mysteries is, and wherefore it is given, and what profit there is of the thing. We are one body, and members of his flesh and of his bones. We that be in the mystery, let us follow the thing which was spoken. Wherefore that we may become this thing, not only by love, but also that we may become one with that flesh indeed, that is brought to pass by this food, which he gave unto us, minding to shew his great good will that he hath towards us: and therefore he mixed himself with us, and united his own body with us, that we should be made all as one thing together, as a body joined and annexed to the head, for this is a token of most ardent and perfect love. And the same thing Job also insinuating, said of his servants, of whom he was desired above measure, insomuch that they, shewing their great desire towards him, said, Who shall give unto us to be filled with his flesh. Therefore also Christ did the same, who, to induce us into a great love towards him, and to declare his desire towards us, did not only give himself to be seen of them, but also to be handled and eaten. Parents many times give their children to others to be fed; but I do not so, saith Christ, but feed you with my own flesh, and set myself before you. I am become your brother; I took flesh and blood for you. Again, my flesh and blood, by the which I am made your kinsman, I deliver unto you." I prove it out of Chrysostom, writing upon the 50th psalm.

"She that is a mother, shameth sometime to play the nurse. But Christ our nurse doth not so play with us. Therefore instead of meat he feedeth us with his own flesh, and instead of drink he feedeth us with his own blood." Likewise upon the xxvi. chap. of Matthew, the 83d Homily, he saith, "For it shall not be enough for him to become man, and in the mean time to be whipped; but he doth bring us into one mass or lump with himself (as I may so call it), and maketh us his body, not by faith alone, but in very deed."

Cran. I grant we make one nature with Christ. But that to be done with the mouth I deny.

West. Chrysostom, 2 Cor. chap. xiii. Hom. 29. hath these words, "No little honour is given to our mouth, receiving the body of the Lord."

Cran. And why should we doubt to call it the sacrament of the body of Christ, offered upon the cross, seeing both Christ and the ancient fathers do so call it?

Cole. How gather you that of Chrysostom?

Cran. Chrysostom declareth himself, "O miracle. O the good will of God towards us, which sitteth above at the right hand of the Father, and is holden in men's hands at the time of sacrifice, and is given to feed upon, to them that are desirous of him! And that is brought to pass by no subtilty or craft, but with the open and beholding eyes of all the standers-by."

Thus you hear Christ is seen here on earth every day, is touched, is torn with the teeth, that our tongue is red with his blood; which no man having any judgment will say or think to be spoken without trope or figure.

West. What miracle is it if it be not his body, and if he spake only of the sacrament, as though it were his body?

But

But hearken what Chrysostom saith, "I shew forth that thing on earth unto thee, which is worthy the greatest honour. For like as in the palace of kings, neither the walls, nor the sumptuous bed, but the body of kings sitting under the cloth of estate, and royal seat of majesty, is of all things else the most excellent: so is in like manner the King's body in heaven, which is now set before us on earth. I shew thee neither angels nor archangels, nor the heaven of heavens, but the very Lord and Master of all these things. Thou perceivest after what sort thou dost not only behold, but touchest, and not only touchest, but eatest that which on the earth is the greatest and chiefest thing of all other, and when thou hast received the same, thou goest home; wherefore cleanse thy soul from all uncleanness."

Upon this I conclude, that the body of Christ is shewed us upon the earth.

Cranmer. What? upon the earth? He is seen here with the eyes of our mind only, with faith and spirit.

Weston. What is it that seemeth worthy of the highest honour on earth? The sacrament or the body of Christ?

Cranmer. Chrysostom speaketh of the sacrament, and the body of Christ is shewed forth in the sacrament.

Weston. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. I deny your argument.

Weston. That thing is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, which is worthy highest honour.

But only the body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, the body of Christ is now on the earth.

Cranmer. I answer, the body of Christ is on the earth, in the sacrament, only so as the Holy Ghost is in the water of baptism.

Weston. Chrysostom saith, Ostendo, "I shew forth," which noteth a substance to be present.

Cranmer. That is to be understood sacramentally.

Weston. He saith, Ostendo in terra, "I shew forth on earth," declaring the place where.

Cranmer. That is to be understood figuratively.

Weston. He is shewed forth, and is now on the earth, &c. as before.

Cranmer. Your major and conclusion are one and the same.

Weston. But the major is true: Therefore the conclusion is also true.

That thing is on the earth, which is worthy of highest honour.

But no figure is worthy of highest honour.

Therefore, that which is on earth is no figure.

Here Weston called upon Dr. Cranmer, to answer one part, bidding him to repeat his words; which when he went about to do, such was the noise and uproar in the divinity school, that his mild voice could not be heard. For when he went about to declare to the people how the prolocutor did not well English the words of Chrysostom, using for ostenditur in terra, "he is shewed forth on the earth," est in terra, "he is on the earth," whereas Chrysostom hath not est, nor any such word of being on the earth, but only of shewing, as the grace of the Holy Ghost, in baptismo ostenditur, "is shewed forth in baptism;" and oftentimes he did inculcate this word ostenditur. Then the prolocutor stretching forth his hand, set on the rude people to cry out at him, filling all the school with hissing, clapping of hands, and noise, calling him unlearned, unskilful, and impudent. Which impudent and reproachful words this reverend man most patiently and meekly did abide, as one that had been inured with the suffering of such like reproaches. And when the prolocutor, not yet satisfied with rude and unseemly demeanour, did call upon him to answer the argument, then he desired the notary to repeat his words again.

Notary. That which is worthy most high honour, here I shew forth to thee on earth.

The body of Christ is worthy highest honour.

Therefore, he shewed forth the body of Christ here on earth.

Cranmer. That is shewed forth here on earth which may be seen; which may be touched, and which may be eaten; but these things be not true of the body.

Cole. Why should not these things be true of the body of Christ?

Cranmer. The major out of Chrysostom is true, meaning in the sacraments: for, in the sacrament, the true body of Christ, and not the figurative body, is set forth.

Weston. Shew me somewhat on earth worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. I cannot, but in the sacrament only.

Weston. Therefore, the sacrament is worthy greatest honour.

Cranmer. So it is.

Weston. Judges, let it be written.

Cranmer. I pray you, let my answer be written likewise: I affirm that the body of Christ is shewed forth unto us. It is our faith that seeth Christ.

Weston. Ostendo tibi, "I shew to thee," saith Chrysostom, not to thy faith.

Cranmer. He speaketh sacramentally.

Weston. Therefore Chrysostom lyeth; for he saith, "I Chrysostom do shew;" but he can shew nothing sacramentally.

Chedsey. By force of argument we are brought to this point, that the body of Christ is proved to be on earth, not only sacramentally, but in very deed also, by this reason, that it is worthy of highest honour. The reason is indissoluble.

Cranmer. I never heard a more vain argument, and it is most vain; also it hath my answer unto it.

Chedsey. Will you affirm, that it is absurd which Chrysostom saith, that the body of Christ is touched?

I touch the body of Christ in the sacrament, as Thomas touched Christ.

Thomas touched Christ, saying, "My Lord and my God."

Therefore, that which he touched was the Lord the God.

Cranmer. I deny your argument. He touched not God, but him who was God. Neither is it sound doctrine to affirm, that God is touched.

Chedsey. This is because of the union; so that God is said to be touched, when Christ, who is both God and Man, is touched.

Tertullian, speaking of the resurrection of the body, saith, "Let us consider as concerning the proper form of the christian man, what great prerogative this vain and foul substance of our's hath with God. Although it were sufficient to it, that no soul could ever get salvation, unless it believe while it is in the flesh; so much the flesh availeth to salvation; by the which flesh it cometh, that whereas the soul is so linked unto God, it is the said flesh that causeth the soul to be linked: yet the flesh moreover is washed, that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated; the flesh is signed, that the soul may be defended; the flesh is shadowed by the imposition of hands, that the soul may be illuminated with the Spirit; the flesh doth eat the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may be fed of God." Whereupon I gather this argument.

The flesh eateth the body of Christ.

Therefore, the body of Christ is eaten with the mouth.

Phoceus also, 1 Cor. chapter xi. upon these words, "Is guilty of the body and blood," declareth, "That like as Judas betrayed him, and the Jews were fierce and spiteful against him; so do they dishonour him, who receive his holy body with their impure hands, and as the Jews did hold him then, do now receive him with impure mouths. And whereas he maketh mention of the body and blood of the Lord, he declareth, that it is not simply man that is sacrificed, but the Lord himself.

Therefore, the body of Christ is touched with the hands.

Cranmer. You vouch two authors against me upon sundry things. First, I must answer Tertullian, and then the other.

Chedsey. They tend both to one meaning.

Cranmer. Unto Tertullian I answer, (because our disputation is wandering and uncertain) that he calleth that the flesh which is the sacrament. For although God works all things in us invisibly beyond men's reach, yet they are so manifest, that they may be seen and perceived of every sense. Therefore he setteth forth baptism, unction, and last of all the supper of the Lord unto us, which he gave to signify his operation in us. The flesh liveth by the bread, but the soul is inwardly fed by Christ.

Weston. Stick to those words of Tertullian, "The body eateth, that the soul may be fed."

Chedsey. The flesh eateth the body of Christ, that the soul may be fed therewith.

Weston. Here you see two kinds of food, of the soul and of the body.

Chedsey. He saith, that not only the soul, but the flesh also is fed.

Cranmer. The soul is fed with the body of Christ, the body with the sacrament.

Chedsey. Is the soul fed with the body of Christ, and not with the sacrament?

Cranmer. Read that which followeth, and you shall perceive, that by things external, an operation internal is understood. Inwardly we eat Christ's body, and outwardly we eat the sacrament. So one thing is done outwardly, another inwardly. Like as in baptism, the external element, whereby the body is washed, is one; the internal thing, whereby the soul is cleansed, is another.

Young. This disputation is taken in hand, that the truth might appear. I perceive that I must go another way to work than I had thought. It is a common saying, against those who deny principles, we must not dispute; therefore, that we may agree of the principles, I demand, whether there be any other body of Christ, than his instrumental body?

Cranmer. There is no natural body of Christ, but his organical body.

Young. Again I demand, whether sense and reason ought to give place to faith?

Cranmer. They ought.

Young. Thirdly, whether Christ be true in all his words?

Cranmer. Yes, he is truth itself.

Young. Fourthly, whether Christ at his supper, minded to do that which he spake, or no?

Cranmer. In saying he spake, but in saying he made not, but made the sacrament to his disciples.

Young. Answer according to the truth, whether did Christ that as God and Man which he spake, when he said, "This is my body?"

Cranmer. This is sophistical cavilling. There is some deceit in these questions.

Young. I demand, whether Christ by these words wrought any thing, or no?

Cranmer. He did institute the sacrament.

Young. But answer, whether he did work any thing?

Cranmer. He did work in instituting the sacrament.

Young. Now I have you; for before you said, it was a figurative speech.

But a figure worketh nothing.

Therefore, it is not a figurative speech. A liar ought to have a good memory.

Cranmer. I understood your sophistry before. You by working understand converting into the body of Christ: but Christ wrought the sacrament, not in converting, but in instituting.

Young. Woe be to them, who make Christ a deceiver. Did he work any other thing than he spake, or the self-same thing?

Cranmer. He wrought the sacrament, and by these words he signified the effect.

Young. A figurative speech is no working thing.

But the speech of Christ is working.

Therefore, it is not figurative.

Cranmer. It worketh by instituting, not by converting.

Young. The thing signified in the sacrament, is it not the sacrament?

Cranmer. It is. For the thing is ministered in a sign. He followeth the letter that taketh the thing for a sign. Augustine separateth the sacrament from the thing. The sacrament (saith he) is one, and the thing of the sacrament another.

Weston. Stick to this argument.

It is a figurative speech.

Therefore, it worketh nothing.

Young. But the speech of Christ is a working thing.

Therefore, it is not figurative.

Cranmer. Oh how many crafts are in this argument! they are mere fallacies. I said not, that the words of Christ do work, but Christ himself, and he worketh by a figurative speech.

Weston. If a figure work, it maketh of bread the body of Christ.

Cranmer. A figurative speech worketh not.

Weston. A figurative speech, by your own confession, worketh nothing.

But the speech of Christ in the supper (as you grant) wrought somewhat.

Therefore, the speech of Christ in the supper was not figurative.

Cranmer. I answer, these are mere sophisms. The speech doth not work, but Christ by the speech doth work the sacrament.

I look for scriptures at your hands, for they are the foundation of disputations.

This disorderly disputation, concluding with an universal cry of Vincit veritas, continued almost till two o'clock. Which being finished, and the arguments written, and delivered into the hands of Mr. Say; the prisoner, Dr. Cranmer, was had away by the mayor, and the doctors dined sumptuously together, at the university college.

A SECOND DISPUTATION at OXFORD, between Dr. RIDLEY, Dr. SMITH, &c.

THE next day being April 12th, Dr. Ridley was brought forth to dispute; against whom Dr. Smith was appointed principal opponent. It may be proper to observe of Dr. Smith, that he had often changed his sentiments; but not from a principle of conscience, or real conviction, as will appear from his articles by him recanted.

Besides Dr. Smith, there were other opponents; Dr. Weston, Dr. Tresham, Dr. Oglethorp, Dr. Glin, Dr. Seaton, Dr. Cole, Dr. Watson, Mr. Ward, Mr. Harpsfield, Mr. Pye, Mr. Harding, Mr. Curton, and Mr. Fecknam; all of whom Dr. Ridley answered very learnedly.

The SPEECH of Dr. WESTON, PROLOCUTOR, at the Commencement of the DISPUTATION.

Good Christian People and Brethren!

WE have begun this day our school, by God's good speed I trust, and are entering into a controversy, whereof no question ought to be moved concerning the verity of the body of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. Christ is true, which said the words. The words are true which he spake, yea, truth itself that cannot fail. Let us therefore pray unto God to send down unto us his Holy Spirit, which is the true interpreter of his word; which may purge away errors, and give light that verity may appear. Let us also ask leave and liberty of the church to permit the truth received to be called this day in question without any prejudice to the same. Your parts thereof shall be to implore the assistance of Almighty God, to pray for the prosperity of the queen's majesty, and to give us quiet and attentive ears. Now go to your question.

Dr. Smith. This day (right learned Mr. Doctor) three questions are propounded, whereof no controversy among christians ought to be moved, to wit:

1. Whether the natural body of Christ our Saviour, conceived of the virgin Mary, and offered for man's redemption upon the cross, is verily and really in the sacrament by virtue of God's word spoken by the priests, &c.

2. Whether in the sacrament, after the words of consecration, be any other substance, &c.

3. Whether

3. Whether in the mass be a sacrifice propitiatory; &c.

Touching which questions, although you have publicly declared your judgment on Saturday last: yet I will again demand your answer on the first question; upon which I stand here now to hear what may be answered.

Dr. RIDLEY'S INTRODUCTORY DECLARATION, or PROTESTATION.

I Received of you the other day, right worshipful Mr. Prolocutor, and you my reverend masters, commissioners from the queen's majesty and her honourable council, three propositions; whereunto ye commanded me to prepare against this day, what I thought good to answer concerning the same.

Now whilst I weighed with myself how great a charge of the Lord's flock was of late committed unto me, for which I am certain I must once render an account to my Lord God, (and how soon he only knoweth) and that moreover, by the commandment of the apostle Peter, I ought to be ready always to give a reason of the hope that is in me, with meekness and reverence, unto every one that shall demand the same: besides this, considering my duty to the church of Christ, and to your worships, being commissioners by public authority; I determined with myself to obey your commandment, and so openly to declare unto you my mind touching the aforesaid propositions. And albeit, plainly to confess unto you the truth in these things which ye now demand of me, I have thought otherwise in times past than now I do, yet (God I call to record upon my soul, I lye not) I have not altered my judgment, as now it is, either by constraint of any man or laws, either for the dread of any dangers of this world, either for any hope of commodity; but only for the love of the truth revealed unto me by the grace of God (as I am undoubtedly persuaded) in his holy word, and in the reading of the ancient fathers.

These things I do rather recite at this present, because it may happen to some of you hereafter, as in times past it hath done to me: I mean, if ye think otherwise of the matters propounded in these propositions than I now do, God may open them unto you in time to come.

But howsoever it shall be, I will in a few words do that which I think ye all look I should do; that is, as plainly as I can, I will declare my judgment herein. Howbeit, of this I would ye were not ignorant, that I will not indeed wittingly and willingly speak in any point against God's word, or dissent in any one jot from the same, or from the rules of faith, or christian religion: which rules that same most sacred word of God prescribeth to the church of Christ, whereunto I now and for ever submit myself and all my doings. And because the matter I have now taken in hand is weighty, and ye all well know how unready I am to handle it accordingly, as well for lack of time, as also lack of books; therefore here I protest, that I will publicly this day require of you, that it may be lawful for me concerning all mine answers, explications, and confirmations, to add or diminish whatsoever shall seem hereafter more convenient and meet for the purpose, through more sound judgment, better deliberation, and more exact trial of every particular thing. Having now, by the way of preface and protestation, spoken these few words, I will come to the answer of the propositions propounded unto me, and so to the most brief explication and confirmation of my answers.

The FIRST PROPOSITION.

In the sacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word spoken of the priest, the natural body of Christ born of the virgin Mary, and his natural blood, is really present under the forms of bread and wine.

BISHOP RIDLEY'S ANSWER.

In matters appertaining to God, we may not speak according to the sense of man, nor of the world: therefore this proposition or conclusion is framed after another manner of phrase, or kind of speech, than the scripture useth. Again, it is very obscure and dark, by means of sundry words of doubtful signification. And being taken in the sense which the schoolmen teach, and at this time the church of Rome doth defend, it is false and erroneous, and plainly contrary to the doctrine which is according to godliness:

The EXPLICATION.

How far the diversity and newness of the phrase in all this first proposition is from the phrase of the holy scripture, and that in every part almost, it is so plain and evident to any one who is but meanly exercised in holy writ, that I need not now (especially in this company of learned men) spend any time therein, except the same shall be required of me hereafter.

First, there is a double sense in these words, "By virtue of God's word," for it is doubtful what word of God this is, whether it be that which is read in the evangelists, or in Paul, or any other. And if it be that which is in the evangelists, or in St. Paul, what that is. If it be in none of them, then how it may be known to be God's word, and of such virtue that it should be able to work so great a matter.

Again, there is a doubt of these words, "of the priest," whether no man may be called a priest; but he which hath authority to make a propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead; and how it may be proved that this authority was committed of God to any man, but to Christ alone.

It is likewise doubted after what order the sacrificing priest shall be, whether after the order of Aaron, or else after the order of Melchisedek. For as far as I know, the holy scriptures doth allow no more.

Moreover, there is ambiguity in this word [really,] whether it be taken as the logicians term it "transcender," that is, most generally, and so it may signify any manner of thing which belongeth to the body of Christ, by any means: after which sort we also grant Christ's body to be really in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, (as in disputation, if occasion be given, shall be declared) or whether it be taken to signify the very same thing, having body, life, and soul, which was assumed and taken of the word of God, into the unity of person. In which sense, seeing the body of Christ is really in heaven, because of the true manner of his body, it may not be said to be here on the earth. There is yet a further doubtfulness in these words, [under the forms of bread and wine,] whether the forms be there taken to signify the only accidental and outward shews of bread and wine; or therewithal the substantial natures thereof, which are to be seen by their qualities, and perceived by the exterior senses.

Now the error and falseness of the proposition, after the sense of the Roman church and schoolmen, may hereby appear, in that they affirm the bread to be transubstantiated and changed to the flesh assumed of the word of God, and that (as they say) by virtue of the word, which they have devised by a certain number of words, and cannot be found in any of the evangelists, or in St. Paul, and so they gather that Christ's body is really contained in the sacrament of the altar. Which position is grounded upon the foundation of the transubstantiation; which foundation is monstrous, against reason, and destroyeth the analogy or proportion of the sacraments: and therefore this proposition also, which is built upon this rotten foundation, is false, erroneous, and to be counted as a detestable heresy of the sacramentaries.

The CONFIRMATION of the aforesaid ANSWER.

There ought no doctrine to be established in the church of God, which dissenteth from the word of God, from the rule of faith, and draweth with it many absurdities that cannot be avoided.

But this doctrine of the first proposition is such.

Therefore, it ought not to be established and maintained in the church of God.

The major, or first part of my argument is plain; and the minor, or second part, is proved thus:

The doctrine maintaineth a real, corporal, and carnal presence of Christ's flesh, assumed and taken of the word, in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that not by virtue and grace only, but also by the whole essence and substance of the body and flesh of Christ.

But such a presence disagreeeth from God's word, from the rule of faith, and cannot but draw with it many absurdities.

Therefore, the second part is true.

The first part of this argument is manifest, and the second may yet farther be confirmed thus.

The SECOND PROPOSITION.

After the consecration there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, neither any other substance, than the substance of God and man.

The ANSWER.

The second conclusion is manifestly false, directly against the word of God, the nature of the sacrament, and the most evident testimonies of the godly fathers; and it is the rotten foundation of the other two conclusions propounded by you, both of the first, and also of the third. I will not therefore now tarry upon any further explication of this answer, being contented with that which is already added before to the answer of the first proposition.

The CONFIRMATION of this ANSWER.

It is very plain by the word of God, that Christ did give bread unto his disciples, and called it his body.

But the substance of bread is no other manner of substance, than is the substance of Christ's body, God and man.

Therefore the conclusion is false.

That which Christ did take, on the which he gave thanks, and the which he break, he gave to his disciples, and called it his body.

But he took bread, gave thanks on bread, and brake bread.

Therefore, the first part is true. And it is confirmed with the authorities of the fathers, Irene, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Jerom, Augustin, Theodoret, Cyril, Rabanus, and Bede. Whose places I will take upon me to shew most manifest in this behalf, if I may be suffered to have my books, as my request is.

Bread is the body of Christ.

Therefore, it is bread.

As the bread of the Lord's table is Christ's natural body, so is his mystical body.

But it is not Christ's mystical body by transubstantiation.

Therefore, it is not his natural body by transubstantiation.

We may no more believe bread to be transubstantiated into the body of Christ, than the wine into his blood.

But the wine is not transubstantiated into his blood.

Therefore, neither is that bread therefore transubstantiated into his body.

The words of Christ spoken upon the cup, and upon the bread, have like effect and working.

But the words spoken upon the cup, have not virtue to transubstantiate.

Therefore, it followeth, that the words spoken upon the bread have no such virtue.

The circumstances of the scripture, the analogy and proportion of the sacraments, and the testimony of the faithful fathers, ought to rule us in taking the meaning of the holy scripture touching the sacrament.

But the words of the Lord's supper, the circumstances of the scripture, the analogy of the sacraments, and the sayings of the fathers, do most effectually and plainly prove a figurative speech in the words of the Lord's supper.

Therefore, a figurative sense and meaning is specially to be received in these words, "This is my body."

The circumstances of the scripture are, "Do this in remembrance of me. As oft as ye shall eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, ye shall shew forth the Lord's death. Let a man prove himself, and so eat of this bread, and drink of this cup. They came together to break bread; and they continued in breaking of bread. The bread which we break, &c. For we being many, are all one bread and one body," &c.

The THIRD PROPOSITION.

In the mass is the lively sacrifice of the church, propitiatory and available for the sins as well of the quick as of the dead.

The ANSWER to this PROPOSITION.

I answer to this third proposition as I did to the first. And moreover I say, that being taken in such sense as the words seem to import, it is not only erroneous, but withal so much to the derogation and defacing of the death and passion of Christ, that I judge it may and ought most worthily to be counted wicked and blasphemous against the most precious blood of our Saviour Christ.

The EXPLICATION.

Concerning the Romish mass which is used at this day, or the lively sacrifice thereof, propitiatory and available for the sins of the quick and the dead, the holy scripture has not so much as one syllable.

There is ambiguity also in the name of [mass,] what it signifieth, and whether at this day there be any such indeed as the ancient fathers used: seeing that now there be neither Catechists nor Penitentes to be sent away.

Again, touching these words, [the lively sacrifice of the church] there is doubt whether they are to be understood figuratively and sacramentally, for the sacrament of the lively sacrifice, (after which sort we deny it not to be in the Lord's supper) or properly and without any figure; of the which manner there was but one only sacrifice, and that once offered, namely upon the altar of the cross.

Moreover, in these words, [as well as,] it may be doubted whether they be spoken in mockage, as men are wont to say in sport, of a foolish and ignorant person, that he is apt, as well in conditions as in knowledge; being apt indeed in neither of them both.

There is also a doubt in the word [propitiatory,] whether it signify here that which taketh away sin, or that which may be made available for the taking away of sin, that is to say, whether it is to be taken in the active, or in the passive signification.

ARGUMENTS confirming his ANSWER.

(1) No sacrifice ought to be done, but where the priest is meet to offer the same.

(2) All other priests are unmeet to offer propitiatory sacrifices, save only Christ.

(3) Therefore, no other priests ought to sacrifice for sin, but Christ alone. See Heb. chap. v.

The second part of my argument is thus proved.

(1) No honour in God's church ought to be taken, where a man is not called, as Aaron was.

(2) It is a great honour in God's church to sacrifice for sin.

(3) Therefore no other priest but Christ ought to sacrifice for sin, who only was called to that honour.

FIRST ARGUMENT.

(1) That thing is in vain, and to no effect, where there is no necessity it should be done.

(2) To offer up any more sacrifice propitiatory for the quick and the dead, there is no necessity: for Christ our Saviour did that fully and perfectly once for all.

(3) Therefore, to do the same in the mass, is in vain.

SECOND ARGUMENT.

(1) After that eternal redemption is found and obtained, there needeth no more daily offering for the same.

(2) But Christ coming an high bishop, &c. found and obtained for us eternal redemption.

(3) Therefore, there needeth now no more daily oblation for the sins of the quick and the dead.

THIRD ARGUMENT.

(1) All remission of sins cometh only by shedding of blood.

(2) In the mass there is no shedding of blood.

(3) Therefore, in the mass there is no remission of sins: and so it followeth also that there is no propitiatory sacrifice.

FOURTH ARGUMENT.

In the mass, the passion of Christ is not in verity, but in a mystery representing the same: yea, even there where the Lord's supper is duly ministered.

But

But where Christ suffereth not, there is he not offered in verity: for the apostle saith, "Not that he might offer up himself often times (for then must we have suffered often times since the beginning of the world:)" now where Christ is not offered, there is no propitiatory sacrifice.

Ergo, In the mass there is no propitiatory sacrifice: "For Christ appeared once in the latter end of the world, to put sin to flight by the offering up of himself. And as it is appointed to all men that they shall once die, and then cometh the judgment; even so Christ was once offered, to take away the sins of many. And unto them that look for him shall he appear again without sin unto salvation." See Heb. chap. ix.

FIFTH ARGUMENT.

Where there is any sacrifice that can make the comers thereunto perfect, there ought men to cease from offering any more expiatory and propitiatory sacrifices.

But in the New Testament there is one only sacrifice now already long since offered, which is able to make the comers thereto perfect for ever.

Ergo, In the New Testament they ought to cease from offering any propitiatory sacrifices.

ARGUMENTS and ANSWERS between Dr. SMITH, and BISHOP RIDLEY.

Dr. Smith. You have occasioned me to go otherwise to work with you, than I had thought to have done. Methinks, in your supposition, you did abuse the testimonies of scripture concerning the ascension of Christ, to take away his presence in the sacrament, as though this were a strong argument in your favour.

Christ did ascend into heaven.

Ergo, He is not in the sacrament.

Now therefore I will go about to disprove this reason of your's.

Christ's ascension is no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Ergo, You are deceived, whereas you do ground yourself upon those places.

Rid. You import as though I had made a strong argument by Christ's going up into heaven. But howsoever mine argument is made, you collect it not rightly. For it doth not only stay upon his ascension, but upon his abiding there also.

Smith. Christ's going up to heaven, and his abiding there, hinder not his real presence in the sacrament.

Ergo, You are deceived.

Rid. Of Christ's real presence there may be a double understanding: if you take the real presence of Christ according to the real and corporeal substance which he took of the virgin, that presence being in heaven, cannot be on the earth also. But if you mean a real presence, according to some thing that appertaineth to Christ's body, certainly the ascension and abiding in heaven hinder not at all that presence. Wherefore Christ's body after that manner is here present to us in the lord's supper; by grace I say, as Epiphanius speaketh it.

Smith. Christ appeared corporally and really on the earth, for all his ascension and continual abode in heaven unto the day of doom.

Ergo, His ascension and abiding in heaven, are no bar to his real presence in the sacrament.

Rid. Mr. Doctor, this argument is nothing worth. I do not straightly tie Christ up in heaven, that he may not come into the earth at his pleasure. For when he will, he may come down from heaven, and be on the earth, as it liketh himself. Howbeit, I do affirm, That it is not possible for him to be both in heaven and earth at one time.

Smith. Mark, I pray you, my masters that be here, diligently, what he answereth. First he saith, That the sitting of Christ at the right hand of his Father, is a bar to the real presence of his body in the sacrament, and then afterwards he flieth from it again.

Rid. I would not have you think that I do imagine or dream upon any such manner of sitting, as these men here sit in the school.

Smith. Ergo, It is lawful for Christ then to be here present on the earth, when he will himself

Rid. Yea, when he will, it is lawful indeed.

Smith. Ergo, He ascending into heaven, doth not restrain his real presence in the sacrament.

Rid. I do not gainsay, but that it is lawful for him to appear on the earth when he will: but prove you that he will.

Smith. Then your answer dependeth upon the will of Christ, I perceive; therefore, I will join again with you in that short argument.

Christ, notwithstanding he doth always abide in heaven after his ascension, was seen really and corporally on earth.

Rid. If the notaries should so record your argument, as you have framed it, you peradventure would be ashamed of it hereafter.

Smith. Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally upon the earth.

Ergo, Notwithstanding his ascension and abiding with his Father, he may be corporally in the sacrament.

Rid. I grant the antecedent, but I deny the consequence.

Smith. Do you grant the antecedent?

Rid. Yes, I grant the antecedent. I am content to let you have so much. Because I know that there be certain ancient fathers of that opinion. I am well content to let you use that proposition as true. And I will frame the argument for you.

He was seen on earth after his ascension.—

Smith. Nay, nay, I will frame it myself.

Christ after his ascension was seen really and corporally on earth, albeit he do abide in heaven continually.

Ergo, Notwithstanding his ascension and continual abiding at the right hand of the Father, he may be really and corporally on the earth.

Rid. Let us first agree about the continual sitting at the right hand of the Father.

Smith. Doth he so sit at the right hand of his Father, that he doth never forsake the same?

Rid. Nay, I do not bind Christ in heaven so straightly. I see you go about to beguile me with your equivocations. Such equivocations are to be distinguished. If you mean by his sitting in heaven, to reign with his Father, he may be both in heaven and also on earth. But if you understand his sitting to be after a corporal manner of sitting, so is he always permanent in heaven. For Christ to be corporal here on earth, when corporally he is resident in heaven, is clean contrary to the holy scriptures, as Austine saith; "The body of Christ is in heaven, but his truth is dispersed in every place."

Smith. Acts iii. we read that Christ shall sit perpetually at the right hand of God, until the consummation of the world.

West. I perceive you are come here to this issue, whether the body of Christ may be together both on earth and in heaven. I will tell you, that Christ in very deed is both on earth and in heaven together, and at one time, both one and the same natural Christ, after the verity and substance of his very body: Ergo, &c.

Rid. I do not utterly deny Christ here to have been seen on earth. Of uncertain things I speak uncertainly.

Smith. He was seen of Paul, as being born before his time, after his ascending up to heaven, 1 Cor. xv. But his vision was a corporal vision.

Ergo, He was seen corporally upon the earth after his ascending into heaven.

Rid. He was seen really and corporally indeed: but whether being in heaven or earth, is a doubt.

Smith. I would know of you, whether this vision may inforce the resurrection of Christ?

Rid. I account this a sound and firm argument to prove the resurrection. But whether they saw him in heaven or on earth, I am in doubt: and to say the truth, it maketh no great matter. Both ways the argument is of like strength. For whether he were seen in heaven, or whether he were seen on earth, either of both maketh sufficiently for the matter. Certain it is, he rose again: for he could not have been seen, unless he had risen again.

Smith. Paul saw him as he was here conversant on earth, and not out of heaven, as you affirm.

Rid. You run to the beginning again: that you take for granted, which you should have proved.

Smith. You make delays for the purpose.

Rid. Say not so, I pray you. Those that hear us are learned: they can tell both what you oppose, and what I answer well enough, I warrant you.

Tresh. He was seen after such sort, as that he might be heard.

Ergo. He was corporally on the earth, or else how could he be heard?

Rid. He that found the means for Stephen to behold him in heaven, even he could bring to pass well enough, that Paul might hear him out of heaven.

Smith. As others saw him, so Paul saw him.

But he was seen of others being on earth, and appeared visibly to them on earth.

Ergo. He was seen of Paul on earth.

Rid. Your controversy is about [existens in terra,] that is, "being on earth:" if [existere,] "to be," be referred as unto the place, I deny that Christ after that sort was on earth. But if it be referred as to the verity of the body, then I grant it. Moreover, I say, that Christ was seen of men on earth after his ascension, is certain: for he was seen of Stephen; he was seen also of Paul. But whether he descended unto the earth, or whether he being in heaven did reveal or manifest himself to Paul, when Paul was wrapt into the third heaven, I know that some contend about it: and the Scripture, as far as I have read or heard, doth not determine it. Wherefore we cannot but judge uncertainly of those things which be uncertain.

Smith. We have Egesippus and Linus against you, which testify that Christ appeared corporally on the earth to Peter after his ascension. "Peter overcome with the requests and mournings of the people, which desired him to get him out of the city, because of Nero's lying in wait for him, began without company to convey himself away from thence: And when he was come to the gate, he seeth Christ come to meet him, and worshipping him, he said, Master, whither walk you? Christ answered, I am come again to be crucified." Linus, writing of the passion of Peter, hath the self same story. St. Ambrose hath the same likewise, and also Abdias, scholar to the apostles, which saw Christ before his ascending into heaven.

Rid. I said before that the doctors in that matter did vary.

Smith. Do you think this story is not certain, being approved by so ancient and probable authority?

Rid. I do so think, because I take and esteem not their words for the words of scripture. And though I did grant you that story to be certain, yet it maketh not against me.

Smith. Such things as are certain, and approved of them, you do reject as things uncertain.

Rid. The story of Linus is not of so great authority: although I am not ignorant that Eusebius so writeth also in the story of the church. And yet I account not these men's reports so sure as the canonical scriptures. But if at any time he had to any man appeared here on the earth after his ascension, that doth not disprove my saying. For I go not about to tie Christ up in fetters, (as some do untruly report of us) but that he may be seen upon the earth according to his divine pleasure, whensoever it pleaseth him. But we affirm, That it is contrary to the nature of his manhood, and the true manner of his body, that he should be together and at one instant both in heaven and earth, according to his corporal substance.

Smith. Chrysostom calleth it a miracle, that Christ sitteth at the right hand of God in heaven, and at the same time is held in the hands of men: not that he is handled with the hands of men: only in a mystery, and is with them through grace.

Harpf. The former part of Chrysostom is not to be let slip. Let me, before I begin, ask this one question of you. Is it not a great matter that Elias left his cloak or mantle, and the gift of his prophecy to his scholar?

Rid. Yes surely, it is a great matter.

Harpf. Did not Elias then leave great grace?

Rid. He did so.

Harpf. But Christ left a far greater grace than Elias: for he could not both leave his cloak and take it with him; Christ doth both in his flesh.

Rid. I am well content to grant, that Christ left much greater things to us than Elias to Eliseus, although he be said to have left his double spirit with him: for that the strength and grace of the body of Christ, which Christ ascending up here left us, is the only salvation and life of all men which shall be saved: which life Christ hath here left unto us, to be received by faith through the hearing of the word, and the right administration of the sacraments. This virtue and grace Chrysostom, after the phrase and manner of John the evangelist, calleth Christ's flesh.

Harpf. But Christ performed a great matter. He carried up, and left behind. You understand not the comparison. The comparison is in this, That Elias left his mantle, and carried it not with him; Christ left his flesh behind him, and carried it with him also.

Rid. True it is, and I myself did affirm no less before.

Harpf. If you will give me leave, I will ask you this question. If Chrysostom would have meant so, that Christ left his body in the eucharist, what plainer words think you, or more evident could he have used than these?

Rid. These things be not of so great force as they bear a great shew outwardly.

Harpf. The comparison lieth in this; That which was impossible to Elias, is possible with Christ.

I grant that was possible to Christ, which was to the other impossible. Elias left his cloak: Christ both left his flesh and took it with him.

West. You understand in the first place his flesh for very true flesh; and in the second place for grace, and communion of his flesh: and why do you not understand it in the second place also for his true flesh? I will make it evident how blockish and gross your answer is.

Rid. These be taunts and reproaches, not besecming, as I think, the modesty of this school.

West. Elias left his cloak to his disciples: but the Son of God going up to heaven, left his flesh.

He carried his flesh into heaven, and he left here the communion of his flesh behind. Affurdly the answer is too unlearned.

Rid. Surely, I wish that all the whole world might understand your reasons and my answers. He left his flesh. This you understand of his flesh, and I understand the same of grace. He carried his flesh into heaven, and left behind the communion of his flesh unto us.

West. Ye judges, what think you of this answer?

Judges. It is a ridiculous and very weak answer.

Rid. Well, I take your words patiently for Christ's cause.

West. Weston here citeth, "We are sprinkled with the blood of Christ."

Rid. Mr. Doctor, it is the same blood, but yet spiritually received. And whosoever they be that are not sprinkled with his blood, they cannot be partakers of the everlasting salvation.

West. Here (speaking again to the people) I bring Bernard unto you. "Even from the west unto the east, from from the north unto the south, there is one and the self same Christ in many and divers places."

Ridley. The answer is soon made, that one Christ is here and in divers places. For God, according to his majesty, and according to his providence, as St. Austin saith, is every-where with the godly, according to his indivisible and unspeakable grace. Or else, if ye would understand Bernard according to the corporal presence, how monstrous, or huge, and giant-like a body would you then make Christ's body to be, which would reach even from north to south, from west to east?

Weston. Nay, nay, you make a monstrous answer, and unlearned.

Ward. Before I come in with these reasons which I had purposed to bring against you, I am minded to come again to Mr. Doctor's argument, by which you being brought into the briars, seemed to doubt of Christ's presence on the earth. To the proof of which matter I will bring nothing else, than that which was agreed upon in the catechism of the synod of London, set out not long ago by you.

Ridley. Sir, I give you to understand, before you go any further, that I did set out no catechism.

Weston. Yes, you made one subscribe to it, when you were a bishop in your ruff.

Ridley. I compelled no man to subscribe.

Ward. Yes, truly, you are the very author of that heresy.

Ridley. I put forth no catechism.

Cole. Did you never consent to the setting out of those things which you allowed?

Ridley. I grant that I saw the book; but I deny that I wrote it. I perused it after it was made, and I noted many things for it. So I consented to the book: I was not the author of it.

Judges. The catechism is so set forth, as though the whole convocation house had agreed to it. Cranmer said yesterday, that you made it.

Ridley. I think surely, that he would not say so.

Ward. The catechism hath this clause; "If visibly on the earth."

Ridley. I answer, That those articles were set out, I both knowing and consenting to them. Mine own hand will testify the same, and Mr. Cranmer put his hand to them likewise, and gave them to others afterwards. Now, as for the place which you alledged out of it, that may be easily expounded, and without any inconvenience.

Ward. Christ is the power and virtue of his Father.

Therefore, he was not of so little strength, that he could not bring to pass whatsoever he would himself.

Ridley. Granted.

Ward. Christ was the wisdom of the Father.

Therefore, what he spoke he spoke wisely, and so as every man might understand: neither was it his mind to speak one thing instead of another.

Ridley. All this I grant.

Ward. Christ was likewise the very truth: Therefore, he made and performed indeed that which he intended to make. And likewise it is, that he doth neither deceive, nor could be deceived, nor yet would go about to deceive others.

Weston. Hilarius hath these words, "All God's words or sayings are true, and neither idly placed, nor unprofitably, but fiery, and wonderful fiery, without all doubtfulness of superfluous vanity, that there may be nothing thought to be there, which is not absolute and proper."

Ward. He is the truth of the Father: Therefore, he can neither deceive, nor yet be deceived; especially I mean when he spoke at his latter end, and his testament.

Ridley. Christ is the very truth of the Father: and I perceive well to what scope you drive your reason. This is but a far fetch compass of words. If these words of Christ, "This is my body," which you mean, be rightly understood, they are most true.

Ward. He took, he brake, he gave, &c. What took he?

Ridley. Bread, his body.

Ward. What brake he?

Ridley. Bread.

Ward. What gave he?

Ridley. Bread.

Ward. Gave he bread made of wheat, and material bread?

Ridley. I know not whether he gave bread of wheat; but he gave true and material bread.

Ward. I will prove the contrary by scripture:

(1) He delivered to them that which he bade them take.

(2) But he bade not them take material bread, but his own body.

(3) Therefore, he gave not material bread, but his own body.

Ridley. I deny the minor. For he bade them take his body sacramentally in material bread: and after that sort it was both bread which he bade them take, because the substance was bread, and it was also his body, because it was the sacrament of his body, for the sanctifying and the coming of the Holy Ghost; which is always assistant to those mysteries which were instituted of Christ, and lawfully administered.

Harpfield. What is he that so saith, By the coming unto of the Holy Spirit?

Ridley. I have Theophylact for mine author for this manner of speaking. And here I bring him, that ye may understand that phrase not to be mine, upon Matthew xxvi. Furthermore, the said Theophylact writing upon these words, "This is my body," sheweth that the body of the Lord is bread, which is sanctified on the altar.

Oglethorp. That place of Theophylact maketh openly against you. For he saith in that place, that Christ said not, This is the figure of my body, but my body. For, saith he, by an unspeakable operation it is transformed, although it seem to us to be bread.

Ridley. It is not a figure that is to say, "Non tantum est figura;" that is, "It is not only a figure of his body."

Weston. Where have you that word [tantum] "only."

Ridley. It is not in that place, but he hath it in another, and Augustine doth so speak many times, and other doctors also.

Weston. [Here Weston, repeating the words of Theophylact in English, said,] He saith it is no figure, and you say it is a figure.

And the same Theophylact saith moreover, that the converting or turning of the bread is made into the Lord's flesh.

That which Christ gave, we do give.

But that which he gave was not a figure of his body.

Therefore, we give no figure, but his body.

[Concerning the authority of Theophylact, what he thought, and might have spoken of that author, Doctor Ridley did not then speak, nor could conveniently (as he himself afterwards declared, reporting and writing with his own word the disputations in the prison) because of the uproars and clamours, which were so great, and he of so many called upon, that he could not answer as he would, and what he thought touching the authority of Theophylact, but answered simply to that which is brought out of that author in this manner.]

Ridley. I grant, the bread to be converted and turned into the flesh of Christ, not by transubstantiation, but by a sacramental conversion or turning. It is transformed, saith Theophylact, in the same place, by a mystical benediction, and by the accession or coming of the Holy Ghost unto the flesh of Christ. He saith not, by expulsion or driving away the substance of bread, and by substituting or putting in its place the corporal substance of Christ's flesh. And where he saith, It is not a figure of the body, we should understand that saying, as he himself doth elsewhere add, [only], that is, it is no naked or bare figure only. For Christ is present in his mysteries, neither at any time, as Cyprian saith, doth the Divine Majesty absent himself from the divine mysteries.

Weston. You put in [only], and that is one lye. And I tell you farther, Peter Martyr was fain to deny the author, because the place was so plain against him. But mark his words, how he saith, It is no figure, but his flesh.

N

Ridley. To take his words and not his meaning, is to do injury to the author.

Ward. No other doctor maketh more against you: for his words are, "Turned from one element into another." And shewing the cause why it is in the form of bread, he saith, "Because we are infirm, and abhor to eat the raw flesh, specially the flesh of man; therefore it appeareth bread, but it is flesh."

Ridley. That word hath not that strength which you seem to give it. You strain it overmuch, and yet it maketh not so much for your purpose. For the same author hath in another place, "We are transelemented, or transformed into the body of Christ." And so by that word, in such meaning as you speak of, I could prove as well that we are transformed indeed into the very body of Christ.

Ward. Learned doctor, thus you expound the place, "This is my body;" that is, a figure of my body.

Ridley. Although I know there be some that so expound it, yet that exposition is not full to express the whole.

Ward. My sheep here my voice, and follow me.

But all the sheep of Christ hear this voice, "This is my body," without a figure.

Therefore, the voice of Christ here hath no figure.

Ridley. The sheep of Christ follow the voice of Christ, unless they be seduced and deceived through ignorance.

Ward. But the fathers took this place for no figurative speech.

Ridley. Yet they do all number this place among figurative and tropical speeches.

Ward. Justine Martyr, in his second apology, hath this passage (which place Cranmer hath corrupted), "For we do not take this for common bread and drink, but like as Jesus Christ our Saviour incarnate by the word of God, had flesh and blood for our salvation; even so we are taught, the food wherewith our flesh and blood is nourished by alteration, when it is consecrated by the prayer of his word, to be the flesh and blood of the same Jesus incarnate."

Dr. Cranmer hath thus translated it; "Bread, water, and wine, are not to be taken as other common meats and drinks be, but they are ordained purposely to give thanks to God, and therefore are called Eucharistia, and likewise the body and blood of Christ; and that it is lawful for none to eat and drink of them, but such as profess Christ, and live according to the same; and yet the same meat and drink is changed into our flesh and blood, and nourisheth our bodies."

Ridley. O good Mr. Doctor, go sincerely to work: I know that place, and I know how it is used.

[Here Ward repeated the place again out of Justine, "We are taught," &c. as above.]

Ridley. O what upright dealing is this! I have the self same place of Justine here copied out. You know yourself who are skilful in Greek, how the words here be removed out of the right place, and without any just cause.

Ward. I stand still upon mine argument. What say you?

Ridley. If you will that I should answer to Justine, then you must hear. I have but one tongue, I cannot answer at once to you all.

Weston. Christ gave us his very and true flesh to be eaten.

But he never gave it to be eaten but in his last supper, and in the sacrament of the altar.

Therefore, there is the very flesh of Christ.

Ridley. If you speak of the very true flesh of Christ, after the substance of his flesh taken in the womb of the virgin Mary, and not by grace and spiritually, I then do deny the first part of your reason. But if you understand it of the true flesh, after grace and spiritual communication, I then grant the first part and deny the second. For he giveth unto us truly his flesh, to be eaten of all that believe in him. For he is the very and true meat of the soul, wherewith we are fed unto everlasting life, according to his saying, "My flesh is meat indeed," &c.

Ward. "I have desired with my hearty desire to eat this paschal with you." What paschal, I pray you, desired he to eat? Did he understand by this paschal the Judaical lamb? or that which he gave afterwards in his own supper?

Ridley. I suppose that the first he understood of the Judaical passover, and afterwards of the eucharist.

Ward. Tertullian is against you, who saith,

"He desired to eat this passover.

But the Judaical passover was not his, but strange from Christ.

Therefore, he meant not the Judaical passover."

Ridley. The Judaical passover was not strange from Christ, but his own; for he is Lord of all; as well of the Judaical passover, as of his own supper.

Tertullian may here play with an analogical sense. I know Cyprian hath these words, "He began then to institute the holy eucharist, but both were Christ's."

Ward. Augustine, in Psalm xcvi. writing upon these words, "Worship his foot-stool," &c. "I ask (saith he) what is the foot-stool of his feet? and the scripture telleth me, The earth is the foot-stool of my feet. And I turn myself to Christ, because I seek him here on the earth, and find how, without impiety, the foot-stool of his feet may be worshipped; for he took earth of earth, in that he is flesh and earth; and of the flesh of Mary he took flesh, because in the same flesh he here walked; and he also gave the same flesh to us to be eaten unto salvation. But no man eateth that flesh, except he hath worshipped before. And so it is found, how such a foot-stool of the Lord is to be worshipped, so that not only we sin in not worshipping, but also do sin in not worshipping the same."

He gave to us his flesh to be eaten, the which he took of the earth, in which also here he walked, &c.

But he never gave his flesh to be eaten, but when he gave it at his supper, saying, "This is my body."

Therefore, in the eucharist he gave his flesh.

Ridley. You do alledge the place of Austin, where he saith, that Christ gave his flesh to be eaten which he took of the earth, and in which here he walked, inferring herefrom, that Christ never gave the same his flesh to be eaten, but only in the eucharist. I deny your minor; for he gave it both in the eucharist to be eaten, and also otherwise, as well in the word, as also upon the cross.

Smith. What if Augustine say, that Christ did not only give himself to us in figure, but gave his own very flesh indeed and really?

Ridley. I never said that Christ gave only a figure of his body. For indeed he gave himself in a real communication, that is, he gave his flesh after a communication of his flesh.

[Here Weston read the place of Augustine in English, and afterwards said thus:]

Weston. You say Christ gave not his body, but a figure of his body.

Ridley. I say not so; I say he gave his own body verily. But he gave it by real, effectual, and spiritual communication.

[After this, Dr. Glin began to reason, who, (notwithstanding Dr. Ridley had always taken him for his old friend) made a very contumelious preface against him. This preface Dr. Ridley therefore did the more take to heart, because it proceeded from him. But he thought that Dr. Glin's mind was to serve the time. For, afterwards, he came to the house wherein Dr. Ridley was kept, and as far as Dr. Ridley could call to remembrance, before Dr. Young and Dr. Oglethorp, he desired him to pardon his words. With this Dr. Ridley complied, even from his very heart, and wished earnestly, that God would give not only unto him, but unto all others, the true and evident knowledge of God's evangelical sincerity, that all offences put apart, they being perfectly and fully reconciled, might agree and meet together in the house of their heavenly Father.]

Glin. I see that you evade all scriptures and fathers; I will go to work with you after another manner.

Christ hath here his church known on earth, of which you were once a child, although now you speak contumeliously of the sacraments.

Ridley.

Ridley. This is a grievous reproach, that you call me a shifter away of the scripture, and of the doctors: as touching the sacraments, I never yet spake contumeliously of them. I grant that Christ hath here his church on earth: but that church did ever receive and acknowledge the eucharist to be a sacrament of the body of Christ, yet not the body of Christ really; but the body of Christ by grace.

Glin. Then I ask this question; Whether the catholic church hath ever, or at any time, been idolatrous?

Ridley. The church is the pillar and stay of the truth, that never yet had been idolatrous in respect of the whole: but peradventure in respect of some part thereof, which sometimes may be seduced by evil pastors, and through ignorance.

Glin. That church ever hath worshipped the flesh of Christ in the eucharist.

But the church hath never been idolatrous.

Therefore, it hath always judged the flesh of Christ to be in the eucharist.

Ridley. And I also worship Christ in the sacrament, but not because he is included in the sacrament; like as I worship Christ also in the scriptures, not because he is really included in them. Notwithstanding, I say, that the body of Christ is present in the sacrament; but yet sacramentally and spiritually, according to his grace giving life, and in that respect really, that is, according to his benediction giving life.

Furthermore, I acknowledge, gladly, the true body of Christ to be in the Lord's supper, in such sort as the church of Christ (which is the spouse of Christ, and is taught of the Holy Ghost, and guided by God's word) doth acknowledge the same. But the true church of Christ doth acknowledge a presence of Christ's body in the Lord's supper to be communicated to the godly, by grace, and spiritually, as I have often shewed, and by a sacramental signification, but not by the corporal presence of the body of his flesh.

Glin. Austin saith, "Some there were which thought us, instead of bread and of the cup, to worship Ceres and Bacchus."

From whence I gather, that there was an adoration of the sacrament among the fathers; and Erasmus, in an epistle to the brethren of Low-Germany, saith, that the worshipping of the sacrament was before Austin and Cyprian.

Ridley. We do handle the signs reverently: but we worship the sacrament as a sacrament, not as a thing signified by the sacrament.

Glin. What is the symbol or sacrament?

Ridley. Bread.

Glin. Therefore, we worship bread.

Ridley. There is a deceit in the word [adoramus.] We worship the symbols, when reverently we handle them. We worship Christ wheresoever we perceive his benefits. But we understand his benefit to be greatest in the sacrament.

Glin. So I may fall down before the bench here, and worship Christ: and if any may ask me what I do, I may answer, I worship Christ.

Ridley. We adore and worship Christ in the eucharist. And if you mean the external sacrament; I say, that also is to be worshipped as a sacrament.

Glin. So was the faith of the primitive church.

Ridley. Would to God we would all follow the faith of that church.

Glin. Think you that Christ hath now his church?

Ridley. I do so.

Glin. But all the church adoreth Christ, verily and really in the sacrament.

Ridley. You know yourself that the eastern church would not acknowledge transubstantiation, as appeareth in the council of Florence.

Cole. That is false. For in the same they did acknowledge transubstantiation, although they would not intreat of the matter, for that they had not in their commission so to do.

Ridley. Nay, they would determine nothing of the matter, when the article was propounded unto them.

Cole. It was not because they did not acknowledge the same, but because they had no commission so to do.

Curtop. Reverend sir, I will prove and declare, that the body of Christ is really and truly in the eucharist: and whereas the holy fathers, both of the west and east church, have written both many things and no less manifest of the same matter, yet will I bring forth only Chrysostom.

That which is in the cup, is the same that flowed from the side of Christ.

But true and pure blood did flow from the side of Christ.

Therefore, his true and pure blood is in the cup.

Ridley. It is his true blood which is in the chalice, I grant; and the same which sprang from the side of Christ. But how? It is blood indeed, but not after the same manner, in which it sprang from his side. For here is the blood, but by way of a sacrament.

Again, I say, like as the bread of the sacrament and of thanksgiving is called the body of Christ given for us; so the cup of the Lord is called the blood which sprang from the side of Christ. But as the sacramental bread is called the body, because it is the sacrament of his body; even so likewise the cup is called the blood which flowed out of Christ's side, because it is the sacrament of that blood which flowed out of his side, instituted by the Lord himself for our singular advantage; namely, for our spiritual nourishment: like as baptism is ordained in water to spiritual regeneration.

Curtop. The sacrament of the blood is not the blood.

Ridley. The sacrament of the blood is the blood, and that is attributed to the sacrament, which is spoken of the thing of the sacrament.

[Here Weston repeateth Curtop's argument in English.]

Weston. That which is in the chalice, is the same which flowed out of Christ's side.

But there came out very blood.

Therefore, there is blood in the chalice.

Ridley. The blood of Christ is in the chalice indeed, but not in the real presence, but by grace, and in a sacrament.

Weston. That is very well. Then we have blood in the chalice.

Ridley. It is true, but by grace, and in a sacrament.

[Here the people hissed at him.]

Ridley. O my masters! I take this for no judgment: I will stand to God's judgment.

Watson. Good sir, I have determined to have respect of the time, and to abstain from those things which may hinder the progress of our disputation; and therefore first I ask this question; when Christ said in the sixth of John, "He that eateth my flesh," &c. doth he signify in those words the eating of his true and natural flesh, or else of the bread and symbol?

Ridley. I understand that place of the very flesh of Christ to be eaten, but spiritually; and further I say, that the sacrament also pertaineth unto the spiritual eating. For without the spirit to eat the sacrament, is to eat it unprofitably. For whoso eateth not spiritually, he eateth his own condemnation.

Watson. I ask then, whether the eucharist be a sacrament?

Ridley. The eucharist, taken for a sign or symbol, is a sacrament.

Watson. Is it instituted of God?

Ridley. It is instituted of God.

Watson. Where?

Ridley. In the supper.

Watson. With what words is it made a sacrament?

Ridley. By the words and deeds which Christ said and did, and commanded us to say and do the same.

Watson. It is a thing commonly received of all, that the sacraments of the new law give grace to them that worthily receive.

Ridley. True it is, that grace is given by the sacrament, but as by an instrument. The inward virtue and Christ give grace through the sacrament.

Watson. What is a sacrament?

Ridley. I remember there be many definitions of a sacrament in Augustine: but I will take that which seemeth most fit to this present purpose. A sacrament is a visible sign of invisible grace.

Watson. Therefore, grace is given to the receivers.

Ridley. The union or conjunction with Christ through the Holy Ghost is grace, and by the sacrament we are made members of the mystical body of Christ, for by the sacrament part of the body is grafted in the head.

Watson. But there is a difference between the mystical body, and natural body.

Ridley. There is (I grant you) a difference, but the head of them both is one.

Watson. The eucharist is a sacrament of the New Testament.

Therefore, it hath a promise of grace.

But no promise of grace is made to bread and wine.

Therefore, bread and wine are not the sacraments of the New Testament.

Ridley. I grant that grace pertaineth to the eucharist, according to this saying, "The bread which we break, is it not the communication or partaking of the body of Christ?" And like as he that eateth, and he that drinketh unworthily of the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, eateth and drinketh his own damnation; even so he that eateth and drinketh worthily, eateth life, and drinketh life. I grant also, that there is no promise made to bread and wine. But inasmuch as they are sanctified, and made the sacraments of the body and blood of the Lord, they have a promise of grace annexed unto them; namely, of spiritual partaking of the body of Christ to be communicated and given, not to the bread and wine, but to them who worthily receive the sacrament.

Watson. If the substance of bread and wine do remain, then the union betwixt Christ and us is promised to them that take bread and wine.

But that union is not promised to bread and wine, but to the receivers of the flesh and blood. John vi. "He that eateth my flesh," &c.

Therefore, the substance of bread and wine remaineth not.

Ridley. The promise undoubtedly is made to the flesh and blood, but the same is to be received in the sacrament through faith.

Watson. Every sacrament hath a promise of grace annexed unto it.

Therefore, the bread and wine are not sacraments.

Ridley. True it is, every sacrament hath grace annexed unto it instrumentally. But there are divers understandings of this word [habet], "hath." For the sacrament hath not grace included in it; but to those that receive it well, it is turned to grace. After that manner the water in baptism hath grace promised, and by that the Holy Spirit is given; not that grace is included in water, but that grace cometh by water.

Watson. This promise is made to the flesh and blood of Christ, and not to the bread and wine.

Therefore, the sacrament is not bread and wine, but the body and blood of Christ.

Ridley. There is no promise made to him that taketh common bread and common wine, but to him that receiveth the sanctified bread, and bread of the communion, there is a large promise of grace made; neither is the promise given to the symbols, but to the thing of the sacrament. But the thing of the sacrament is the flesh and blood.

Watson. Every sacrament of the New Testament giveth grace, promised of God to those that worthily receive it.

Ridley. This sacrament hath a promise of grace made to those that receive it worthily, because grace is given by it, as by an instrument, not that Christ hath transfused grace into bread and wine.

Watson. But this promise which is made, is only to those that worthily receive the flesh and blood; not the bread and wine.

Ridley. That proposition of your's hath a double understanding. There is no promise made to them that receive common bread, as it were; but to those that worthily receive the sanctified bread, there is a promise of grace made, as Origin doth testify.

Watson. Where is that promise made?

Ridley. "The bread which he brake, is it not a communication of the body of Christ?" And, "We being many are one bread, one body of Christ."

Watson. What doth he mean by bread in that place?

Ridley. The bread of the Lord's table; the communion of the body of Christ.

Watson. Hear what Chrysostom saith upon that passage: "The bread which we break, is not the communication of Christ's body? Wherefore did he not say, participation? Because he would signify some greater matter, and that he would declare a great convenience and conjunction betwixt the same. For we do not communicate by participation only, and receiving, but also by co-uniting. For, like as that body is co-united to Christ, so also we by the same bread are united to him."

Ridley. Let Chrysostom have his manner of speaking, and his sentence. If it be true, I reject it not. But let it not be prejudicial to me to name it true bread.

Watson. "All (saith Chrysostom) which sit together at one board, do communicate together of one true body. What do I call (saith he) this communicating? We are all the self-same body. What doth bread signify? The body of Christ. What are they that receive it? The body of Christ. For many are but one body." Chrysostom doth interpret this place against you. "All we be one bread, and one mystical body, which do participate together one bread of Christ."

Ridley. All we be one mystical body, which do communicate of one Christ in bread, after the efficacy of regeneration or quickening.

Watson. Of what manner of bread speaketh he?

Ridley. Of the bread of the Lord's table.

Watson. Is that bread one?

Ridley. It is one, of the church being one, because one bread is set forth upon the table: and so of one bread all together do participate, which communicate at the table of the Lord.

Watson. See how absurdly you speak. Do you say, all which be from the beginning to the end of the world?

Ridley. All, I say, which at one table together have communicated in the mysteries might well so do. But the heavenly and celestial bread is likewise one also, whereof the sacramental bread is a mystery: the which being one, all we together do participate.

Watson. A perverse answer. Which all? Mean you all christian men?

Ridley. I do distribute this word [All:] for all were wont together to communicate of the one bread divided into parts. All, I say, which were one congregation, and which all did communicate together at one table.

Watson. What? Do you exclude then from the body of Christ, all them that did not communicate being present?

Pecknam. But Cyprian saith, "Bread which no multitude doth consume." Which cannot be understood but only of the body of Christ.

Ridley. Also Cyprian in this place did speak of the true body of Christ, and not of material bread.

Pecknam. Nay, rather he did there treat of the sacrament in that treatise De Cæna Domini, writing upon "the supper of the Lord."

Ridley. Truth it is, that I grant he treateth there of the sacrament: but also he doth mix something therewithal of the spiritual eating.

Smith. When the Lord saith, "This is my body," he useth no tropical speech.

Therefore, you are deceived.

Ridley. I deny your antecedent.

Smith. I bring here-Augustine in ps. xxxiii. expounding these words, Ferebatur in manibus suis, "He was carried in his own hands." "How may this be understood to be done in man? For no man is carried in his own hands, but in the hands of another. How this may be understood of David after the letter, we do not find; of Christ we find it. For Christ was born in his own hands, when he saith, "This is my body," for he carried that same body in his own hands," &c.

Augustine

Augustine here did not see how this place after the letter could be understood of David, because no man can carry himself in his own hands. Therefore, saith he, this place is to be understood of Christ after the letter. For Christ carried himself in his own hands in his supper, when he gave the sacrament to his disciples, saying, "This is my body."

Ridley. I deny your argument, and will explain the same. Austin could not find, after his own understanding, how this could be understood of David after the letter. Austin differs here from others in this exposition, but I differ not from him. But let this exposition of Austin be granted to you; although I know this place of scripture be otherwise read of other men, after the verity of the Hebrew text, and it is also otherwise to be expounded. Yet to grant to you this exposition of Austin, I say, yet notwithstanding it maketh nothing against my assertion: for Christ did bear himself in his own hands, when he gave the sacrament of his body to be eaten of his disciples.

Smith. Therefore, it is true of Christ after the letter, that he was borne in his own hands.

Ridley. He was borne literally, and after the letter, which was spoken of David: but not after the letter of these words, "This is my body."

Smith. Every man may bear in his own hands a figure of his body.

But Austin denieth that David could carry himself in his hands.

Therefore, he speaketh of no figure of his body.

Ridley. If Austin could have found in all the scripture, that David had carried the sacrament of his body, then he would never have used that exposition of Christ.

Smith. But he did bear himself in his own hands: Therefore, he did not bear a figure only.

Ridley. He did bear himself, but in a sacrament: and Austin afterwards added Quodam modo, that is, sacramentally.

This place Dr. Weston repeated again in English, which done, Dr. Tresham began thus to speak:

I bring a place here out of the council of Lateran, the which council, representing the universal church, wherein were congregated three hundred bishops, and seventy metropolitans, besides a great multitude of others, decreed, That bread and wine, by the power of God's word, was transubstantiated into the body and blood of the Lord. Therefore, whosoever saith contrary, cannot be a child of the church, but an heretic.

Ridley. Good sir, I have heard what you have cited out of the council of Lateran, and remember that there was a great multitude of bishops and metropolitans, as you said: but yet you have not numbered how many abbots, priors, and friars were in that council, who were to the number of eight hundred.

Tresham. What do you not receive the council of Lateran?—Whereupon he, with certain others, cried, Write, write.

Ridley. No, sir, I receive not that council; write, and write again.

Tresham. Evil men do eat the natural body of Christ. Therefore, the true and natural body of Christ is on the altar.

Ridley. Evil men do eat the very true and natural body of Christ sacramentally, and no further, as St. Augustine saith: but good men do eat the very true body both sacramentally, and spiritually by grace.

Tresham. I prove the contrary by Augustine, "Like as Judas, to whom the Lord gave the morsel, did offend; not in taking a thing that was evil, but in receiving it after an evil manner," &c. And a little after, "Because some do not eat unto salvation, it followeth not, therefore, that it is not his body."

Ridley. It is the body to them, that is, the sacrament of the body: and Judas took the sacrament of the Lord to his condemnation. Austin hath distinguished these things well in another place; "The bread of the Lord, the bread the Lord. Evil men eat the bread of the Lord, but not bread the Lord. But good men eat both the bread of the Lord, and bread the Lord."

Another then came in, whom Mr. Ridley knew not, and said, "The universal church both of the Greeks and Latins, of the east and of the west, have agreed in the council of Florence, uniformly in the doctrine of the sacrament, that there is the true and real body in the sacrament of the altar."

Ridley. I deny the Greek and the east church to have agreed either in the council at Florence, or at any time else, with the Romish church, in the doctrine of transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. For there was nothing in the council of Florence, wherein the Greeks would agree with the Romanists; however I confess, it was left for every church to use, as they were wont, leavened or unleavened bread.

Dr. Cole now cried out, and said, they agreed together concerning transubstantiation of bread into the body of Christ. Dr. Ridley said that was not possible.

Pye. What say you to that council, where it is said, that the priest doth offer an unbloody sacrifice of the body of Christ?

Ridley. I say, it is well said, if it be rightly understood.

Pye. But he offered an unbloody sacrifice.

Ridley. It was called unbloody, and is offered after a certain manner, and in a mystery, and as a representation of that bloody sacrifice, and he doth not lye, which saith Christ to be offered.

Weston. I with one argument will throw down to the ground your opinion, out of Chrysostom, Hom. xxiv, in 1 Cor. And I will teach, not only a figure and a sign, or grace only, but the very same body, which was here conversant on the earth, to be in the eucharist.

(1) We worship the self same body in the eucharist, which the wise men did worship in the manger.

(2) But that was his natural and real body, not spiritual.

(3) Therefore, the real body of Christ is in the eucharist.

Again, the same Chrysostom saith, "We have not here the Lord in the manger, but on the altar. Here a woman holdeth him not in her hands, but a priest."

Ridley. We worship, I confess, the same true Lord and Saviour of the world, which the wise men worshipped in the manger; howbeit we do it in a mystery, and in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that in spiritual liberty, as saith St. Augustine, l. 3. De Doctrina Christiana: not in carnal servitude; that is, we do not worship fervently the signs for the things; for that should be as he also saith, a part of a servile infirmity. But we behold with the eyes of faith him present after grace, and spiritually set upon the table; and we worship him which sitteth above, and is worshipped of the angels. For Christ is always assistant to his mysteries, as the said Augustine saith.

Weston. That which the woman did hold in her womb, the same holdeth the priest.

Ridley. I grant, the priest holdeth the same thing, but after another manner. She did hold the natural body; the priest holdeth the mystery of the body.

Now Weston again repeated this argument out of Chrysostom in English.

Ridley. I say that the author meant it spiritually.

Dr. Weston, the prolocutor, now put an end to the disputation with these words: You see the stubborn, the boasting, the crafty, the inconstant mind of this man. Here you see, this day, that the strength of the truth is without foil. Therefore, I beseech you all most earnestly to blow the note of triumph: having said this, he began, and they followed, exclaiming, "Truth bath the victory, Truth bath the victory."

In the course of the debate, Dr. Ridley displayed great acuteness of understanding, strength of reasoning, and extent of learning, though he had fourteen opponents to encounter; but he was determined to support his opinions, and declared, that as long as God gave him life, he should not only have his heart, but also his mouth and pen to defend his truth.

A THIRD DISPUTATION at OXFORD, between the Rev. Dr. HUGH LATIMER, BISHOP of WORCESTER, and others, April 18th, 1554.

ON Wednesday the 18th of April, bishop Latimer was brought out to dispute. This disputation began at eight o'clock, and was conducted in much the same manner as those preceding, except that most part of it was in English: for the bishop alledged that he was out of use with the Latin, and unfit for that place.

Mr. Smith, of Oriel college, Dr. Cartwright, Mr. Harpsfield, and others, replied to him, with many cruel insinuations and bitter taunts. The old bishop escaped no hissings, and scornful laughings, which those who went before had patiently endured. Being very faint, he desired that he might not long tarry; nor durst he drink for fear of vomiting. The disputation ended before eleven of the clock. Dr. Latimer was not suffered to read what he had, as he observed, painfully written: but it was exhibited up, and the prolocutor, after having read part thereof, proceeded unto the disputation.

A COPY of BISHOP LATIMER'S PROTESTATION, as delivered in writing to Dr. WESTON.

The conclusions whereunto I must answer are these:

1. The first is, That in the sacrament of the altar, by the virtue of God's word pronounced by the priest, there is really present the natural body of Christ, conceived of the virgin Mary, under the kinds of the appearance of bread and wine; in like manner his blood.

2. The second is, That after consecration there remaineth no substance of bread and wine, nor any other substance, but the substance of God and man.

3. The third is, that in the mass there is the lively sacrifice of the church, which is propitiabile, as well for the sins of the quick, as of the dead.

Concerning the first conclusions, I think it is set forth with certain new-found terms that are obscure, and do not sound according to the speech of the scripture. But however I understand it, this I do answer plainly, (though not without peril) that to the right celebration of the Lord's Supper, there is no other presence of Christ required, than a spiritual presence: and this presence is sufficient for a Christian man, as a presence by which we abide in Christ, and Christ abideth in us, to the obtaining of eternal life, if we persevere. And this same presence may be called most fitly a real presence, that is, a presence not feigned, but a true and faithful presence. Which thing I here rehearse, lest some sycophant, or scorner should suppose me, with the Anabaptists, to make nothing else of the sacrament, but a naked and a bare sign. As for that which is feigned of many concerning their corporal presence, I for my part take it but for a papistical invention: therefore think it utterly to be rejected.

Concerning the second conclusion, I dare be bold to say, that it hath no ground in God's word, but is a thing invented and found out by man, and therefore to be taken as false; and I had almost said, as the mother and nurse of the other errors. It were good for my lords and masters of the transubstantiation, to take heed lest they conspire with the Nestorians, for I do not see how they can avoid it.

The third conclusion (as I understand it) seemeth subtilly to sow sedition against the offering which Christ himself offered for us in his own proper person, according to those words of St. Paul, Heb. i. where he saith, "That Christ his ownself hath made purgation of our sins." And afterwards, "That he might (saith he) be a merciful and faithful bishop, concerning those things which are to be done with God, for the taking away of our sins." So that the expiation or taking away of our sins may be thought rather to depend on this, that Christ was an offering bishop, than that he was offered, were it not that he was offered of himself: and therefore it is needless that he should be offered of any other. I will speak nothing of the wonderful presumption of man, to dare to attempt this thing without a manifest vocation, especially in that it tendeth to the overthrowing and making fruitless (if not wholly, yet partly) of the cross of Christ; for truly it is no base or mean thing to offer Christ. And therefore well may a man say to my lords and masters, the offerers, by what authority do ye this? and who gave you this authority? Where? When? A man cannot (saith the baptist) take any thing, except it be given him from above: much less then may any man presume to usurp any honour, before he be thereto called.

Again, If any man sin (saith St. John), we have not a master, or offerer at home, which can sacrifice for us at mass, but we have (saith he) an advocate, Jesus Christ, which once offered himself long ago; of which offering the efficacy and effect is for ever, so that it is needless to have such offerers.

What meaneth Paul, when he saith, "They that serve at the altar, are partakers of the altar?" and so addeth; "So the Lord hath ordained, that they that preach the gospel, shall live of the gospel." Whereas he should have said, the Lord hath ordained, that they that sacrifice at mass, should live of their sacrificing, that there might be living assigned to our sacrificers now, as was, before Christ's coming, to the Jewish priests. For now they have nothing to alledge for their living, as they that be preachers have. So that it appeareth, that the sacrificing priesthood is changed by God's ordinance into a preaching priesthood, and the sacrificing priesthood should cease utterly, saving inasmuch as all christian men are sacrificing priests.

The supper of the Lord was instituted to provoke us to thanksgiving, for the offering which the Lord himself did offer for us, much rather than that our offerers should do there as they do.

"Feed (saith Peter) as much as ye may the flock of Christ:" nay, rather let us sacrifice as much as we may for the flock of Christ. If the matter be as men now make it, I can never wonder enough, that Peter would or could forget this office of sacrificing, which at this day is in such a price and estimation, that to feed is almost nothing with many. If thou cease from feeding the flock, how shalt thou be taken? Truly catholic enough. But if thou cease from sacrificing and massing, how will that be taken? At the least, I warrant thee, thou shalt be called an heretic.

And whence, I pray you, come these papistical judgments? Except perchance they think a man feedeth the flock in sacrificing for them: and then what needeth there any learned pastors? For no man is so foolish, but soon he may learn to sacrifice and mass it.

Thus I have taken the more pains to write, because I refused to dispute, in consideration of my debility thereunto: that all men may know, how that I have so done not without great pains, having not any man to help me, as I have never before been debarred to have.

I would as fain obey my sovereign as any in this realm: but in these things I can never do it with an upright conscience.

God be merciful unto us. Amen.

The prolocutor, on receiving this paper, thus addressed bishop Latimer, artfully leading him by a train of familiar questions into an argument:

Weston. Then refuse you to dispute? Will you here then subscribe?

Latimer. No, good master, I pray be good to an old man. You may, if it please God, be once old, as I am: you may come to this age, and to this debility.

Weston. You said upon Saturday last, that you could not find the mass, nor the marrow bones thereof, in your book: but we will find a mass in that book.

Latimer. No, good Mr. Doctor, you cannot.

Weston. What find you then there?

Latimer. A communion.

Weston. Which communion, the first or the last?

Latimer. I find no great diversity in them; they are one supper of the Lord: but I like the last very well.

Weston. The first you do not approve of?

Latimer. I do not well remember wherein they differ.

Weston. Then cake bread, and loaf bread, are all one? You

You call it the supper of the Lord; but you are deceived in that; for they had done the supper before, and therefore the scripture saith, "After they had supped:" St. Paul findeth fault with the Corinthians, that some of them were drunken at this supper; and you know, no man can be drunken at your communion.

Latimer. The first was called [Cæna Judaica] "The Jewish supper," when they did eat the paschal lamb together; the other was called [Cæna Dominica] "The Lord's Supper."

Weston. That is false; for Chrysostom denieth that. St. Ambrose on the x. chap. of the 1 Cor. saith, "The mystery of the sacrament, given as they were at supper, is not the supper of the Lord." Also Gregory Nazianzene saith the same. And that first supper was called Agapæ: can you tell what that is?

Latimer. I understand not Greek: yet I think it meaneth charity.

Weston. Mr. Opponent, begin.

Smith. Because I perceive that this charge is laid upon my neck to dispute with you; to the end that the same may go forward after a right manner and order, I will propose three questions, so as they are put forth unto me. And first I ask this question of you, although the same indeed ought not to be called in question; but such is the condition of the church, that it is always vexed of the wicked. I ask, I say, whether Christ's body be really in the sacrament?

Latimer. I trust I have obtained of Mr. Prolocutor, that no man shall exact that thing of me which is not in me. And I am sorry that this worshipful audience should be deceived of their expectation for my sake. I have given up my mind in writing to Mr. Prolocutor.

Smith. Whatsoever you have given up, it shall be registered among the acts.

Latimer. Disputation requireth a good memory; my memory is gone, and marvellously weakened, and never the better, I think, for the prison.

Weston. How long have you been of this opinion?

Latimer. It is not long, sir, that I have been of this opinion.

Weston. The time hath been when you said mass full devoutly.

Latimer. Yes, I crave God's mercy heartily for it.

Weston. Where learned you this new fangleness?

Latimer. I have long sought for the truth in this matter of the sacrament, and have not been of this mind more than seven years: and my lord of Canterbury's book hath especially confirmed my judgment herein. If I could remember all therein contained, I would not fear to answer any man in this matter.

Tresham. There are in that book six hundred errors.

Weston. You were once a Lutheran.

Latimer. No, I was a Papist: for I never could perceive how Luther could defend his opinion without transubstantiation. The Tygurines once did write a book against Luther, and I often desired God, that he might live so long to answer them.

Weston. Luther in his book, "Of private mass," says, "That the devil reasoned with him, and persuaded him, that the mass was not good," fol. 14. So that Luther said mass, and the devil dissuaded him from it.

Latimer. I do not take in hand to defend Luther's sayings or doings. If he were here, he would defend himself well enough. I told you before that I am not meet for disputations. I pray you, read mine answer, wherein I have declared my faith.

Weston. Do you believe this, as you have written?

Latimer. Yes.

Weston. Then have you no faith.

Latimer. Then would I be sorry, sir.

Tresham. It is written, "Except you shall eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye shall have no life in you." Which when the Capernaïtes, and many of Christ's disciples heard, they said, "This is a hard saying," &c. Now that the truth may the better appear, here I ask of you, Whether Christ, speaking these words, did mean of his flesh to be eaten with the mouth, or of the spiritual eating of the same?

Latimer. I answer (as Augustine understandeth) that Christ meant of the spiritual eating of his flesh.

Tresham. Of what flesh meant Christ, his true flesh, or no?

Latimer. Of his true flesh, spiritually to be eaten in the supper by faith, and not corporally.

Tresham. Of that flesh meant the Capernaïtes?

Latimer. Of his true flesh also; but to be eaten with the mouth.

Tresham. They, as you confess, did mean his true flesh to be eaten with the mouth. And Christ also (as I shall prove) did speak of the receiving of his flesh with the mouth.

Therefore, They both did understand it of the eating of one thing, which is done by the mouth of the body.

Latimer. I say, Christ meant not of the bodily mouth; but of the mouth of the spirit, mind, and heart.

Tresham. I prove the contrary, that Christ understandeth it of the eating with the bodily mouth. For whereas custom is a good interpreter of things, and whereas the acts put in practice by Christ, do certainly declare those things which he first spake; Christ's deeds in his supper, where he gave his body to be taken with the mouth, together with the custom which hath been ever since that time of that eating which is done with the mouth, doth evidently intimate that Christ did understand his words, here cited by me, out of the vi. of John, of the eating with the mouth.

Latimer. He gave not his body to be received with the mouth, but he gave the sacrament of his body to be received with the mouth; he gave the sacrament to the mouth, his body to the mind.

Weston. Augustine in his Enchiridon, saith, "We must not deny that the souls of the dead are relieved by the devotion of their friends which are living, when the sacrifice of the Mediator is offered for them." Where he proveth the verity of Christ's body and praying for the dead. And it is said, that the same Augustine said mass for his mother.

Latimer. But that mass was not like your's, which thing doth manifestly appear in his writings, which are against it in every place. And Augustine is a reasonable man, he requireth to be believed no further than he bringeth scripture for his proof, and agreeth with God's word.

Weston. Well, Mr. Latimer, this is our intent, to wish you well, and to exhort you to come to yourself, and remember, that without Noah's ark, there is no health: Remember what they have been, that were the beginners of your doctrine; none but a few flying apostates, running out of Germany for fear of the faggot. Remember what they have been which have set forth the same in this realm: a sort of fling-brains and light heads, which were never constant in any one thing, as it was to be seen in the turning of the table, where like a sort of apes they could not tell which way to turn their tails, looking one day west, and another day east; one that way, and another this way. They will be like (they say) to the apostles, they will have no churches; a hovel is good enough for them. They come to the communion with no reverence. They get them a tankard, and one faith, I drink, and I am thankful; the more more joy of thee, faith another. And in them was it true that Hilary saith, "We make every year and every month a faith." A runaway Scot did take away the adoration or worshiping of Christ in the sacrament, by whose procurement that heresy was put into the last communion-book; so much prevailed that one man's authority at that time. You never agreed with the Tygurines, or Germans, or with the church, or with yourself. Your stubbornness cometh of a vain glory, which is to no purpose: for it will do you no good when a faggot is in your beard. And we see all, by your own confessions, how little cause you have to be stubborn, for your learning is in feoffers hold. The queen's grace is merciful, if you will turn.

Latimer. You shall have no hope in me to turn. I pray for the queen daily, even from the bottom of my heart, that she may turn from this religion.

Weston. Here you all see the weakness of heresy against the truth: he denieth all truth, and all the old fathers.

Thus we have given a full account of those disputations, that were maintained against three worthy confessors and martyrs of the Lord, wherein may be seen the disorderly usage of the university men; their unmannerly deportment in the divinity school, the tumult of a rude multitude, the passion, fierceness, and interruption of the grave doctors, the full ground of the reasonings, the censure of the partial judges, the foul language, and indecent railing of the prolocutor, with his vain blast of triumph at the conclusion of each debate, by which he shewed himself both actor, moderator, and judge. We need not wonder then that this victorious conqueror, having the law in his own hands, should say of himself, Vecit veritas, though he said not one true word, nor ever made a true conclusion, almost throughout the several disputations.

The day after these were closed being the 19th of April, it happened that Mr. Harpsfield was called upon, to dispute for his form, to be made a doctor of divinity; on which occasion Dr. Cranmer was again brought forth, and permitted, among the rest, to deliver an argument or two in defence of his cause, as the sequel will shew.

A DISPUTATION with Mr. HARPSFIELD, BACHELOR of DIVINITY when answering for his FORM to be made DOCTOR.

Harpsfield. I Am not ignorant what a weighty matter it is to intreat of the whole order and trade of the scriptures: and most hard it is too, in the great contention of religion, to shew the ready way whereby the scriptures may best be understood; for the often reading of them doth not bring the true understanding of them. What other thing is there then? Verily this is the ready way, not to follow our own heads and senses, but to give over our judgment unto the holy catholic church, who hath had of old years the truth, and always delivered the same to her posterity: but if the often reading of scriptures, and ever so painful comparing of places, should bring the true understanding, then divers heretics might prevail even against whole general councils. The Jews did greatly brag of their knowledge of the law, and of the Saviour that they waited for. But what availed it them? Notwithstanding, I know right well, that divers places of the scripture do much warn us of the often reading of the same, and what fruit doth thereby follow; as "Search the scriptures, for they do bear witness of me," &c. "The law of the Lord is pure, able to turn souls." And that saying of St Paul, "All scripture inspired from above doth make that a man may be instructed to all good works." Howbeit, doth the law of the Jews convert their souls? Are they by reading instructed to every good work? The letter of the Old Testament is the same that we have.

The heretics also have ever had the same scriptures, which we have that be catholics. But they are served as Tantalus that the poets speak of, who, in the plenty of things to eat and drink, is said to be oppressed with hunger and thirst. The swifter that men do seek the scriptures without the catholic church, the deeper they fall, and find hell for their labour. St. Cyprian, never swerving from the catholic church, saith, "He that doth not acknowledge the church to be his mother, shall not have God to his father." Therefore it is true divinity to be wise with the church, where Christ saith, "Unless ye eat my flesh, and drink my blood, ye have no life in you."

If he had meant of only eating bread and drinking wine, nothing had been more pleasant to the Capernaïtes, neither would they have forsaken him. The flesh profiteth nothing to them that do take it. For the Capernaïtes did imagine Christ to be given in such sort as he lived. But Christ spake high things; not that they should have him as flesh in the market, but to consider his presence with the Spirit, under the forms whereby it is given. As there is an alteration of bodies by courses and times of ages; so there is no less variety in eating of bodies.

These things which I have recited briefly, Mr. Harpsfield did set out with many more words; and hereupon Dr. Weston disputed against him.

Weston. Christ's real body is not in the sacrament. Therefore, You are deceived.

Harpsfield. I deny the antecedent.

Weston. John xvi. "I speak the truth unto you: it behoveth me that I go away from you. For unless I do depart, the comforter cannot come," &c.

I will make this argument.

(1) Christ is so gone away, as he did send the Holy Ghost.

(2) But the Holy Ghost did verily come into the world.

(3) Therefore, Christ is verily gone.

Harpsfield. He is verily gone, and yet remaineth here.

Weston. St. Augustine saith that these words, "I will be with you even to the end of the world," are accomplished, [secundum majestatem] "according to his majesty:" but [secundum presentiam carnis non est hic] "By the presence of his flesh he is not here." The church hath him not in flesh, but by belief.

Harpsfield. We must diligently weigh that there are two natures in Christ; the divine nature, and human nature. The divine nature is of such sort that it cannot chuse but be in all places. The human nature is not such that of force it must be in all places, although it be in divers after a divers manner. So where the doctors do intreat of his presence by majesty, they do commend the majesty of the divine nature, not to hinder us of the natural presence here in the sacrament.

Weston. He saith further, "Ye shall not have me always with you," is to be understood in the flesh.

Harpsfield. The presence of the flesh is to be considered, that he is not here as he was wont to live in conversation with them, to be seen, talked withal, or in such sort as man may give him any thing: after that sort he is not present.

Weston. But what say you to this of Augustine, "He is not here?"

Harpsfield. I do answer out of St. Augustine upon John, Tractat. 25, upon these words, "I go to the Father, ye shall not see me!" that is, "such as I am now." Therefore I do deny the manner of his presence.

Weston. I will overthrow St. Augustine with St. Augustine, who saith this also, "How may a man hold Christ? send thy faith, and thou holdest him."

So he sheweth, that by sending our faith, we do hold Christ.

Harpsfield. Indeed no man holdeth Christ, unless he believe in him; but it is another thing to have Christ merciful and favourable unto us, and to have him present in the sacrament.

There St. Augustine speaketh of holding him by faith, as he is favourable unto us.

Weston. Nay, he speaketh there how the fathers had him in the flesh, and teacheth that we have him not so in the flesh, as they had him long time, saying, "Your fathers did hold Christ present in the flesh: do you hold him in your heart?" What words can be more plain? Further he saith, "He is gone and is not here: he hath left us, and yet hath not forsaken us. He is here in majesty, and gone touching the flesh."

Harpsfield. I do understand Augustine thus, that Christ is here in his flesh to them that receive him worthily: to such as do not worthily receive him, to them he is not present in the flesh. I judge, St. Augustine meaneth so. We have him, and have him not. We have him in receiving him worthily, otherwise not.

Weston. I will prosecute another argument. Cyril doth say, "By the majesty of his divinity he is ever here, but the presence of his flesh hath he taken away."

Harpsfield. The sense of Cyril is thus to be understood. The most true flesh of Christ is at the right hand of the Father. Thus the fathers taught, and so they believed. Thus said Cyril; thus said Augustine: and because this is the foundation of our faith, they did oftentimes teach it. Therefore, when they prove this, (the body to be in heaven) they do not make against the presence in the sacrament.

So unless ye can plainly shew, that the fathers do directly say he is not in the sacrament, you make nothing against me: for I have shewed why the fathers so spake. They

They did teach the great difference between the divine nature, and the human nature, as I have before said.

Weston. I will then prove, that he is not in the sacrament. Vigilius against the heretic Eutiches, upon these words, "Ye shall not have me always with you," saith, "The son of God, as touching his humanity, is gone from us; by his divinity he remaineth with us." And the same Vigilius, in his fourth book, saith, "He that is in heaven, is not on earth;" speaking of Christ.

Harpsfield. I will shew you the reason of these words. The heretic Eutiches did beleive that the divine nature of Christ was fastened on the cross, and believed that Christ had no natural body. To this Vigilius said, That the human nature was taken up and ascended, which could not so have done, unless he had a body. This he said not, to take away the presence in the sacrament.

For what had he to refer this sentence to the sacrament? He never did so much as dream of the sacrament.

Weston. Cyril saith, "Although he be absent from us in body, yet are we governed by his Spirit."

Harpsfield. By these words he gave us a cheerfulness to aspire upwards, seeking from thence our help. For as touching his conversation, he is not so in the sacrament as one meet to be lived withal. But let him not teach us, that he is not there to feed us: for after that sort he is there.

Weston. You have satisfied me with your answers, in doing the same learnedly, and catholicly. But now to another argument

(1) Christ is now so absent from the earth, by his body, as he was absent from heaven when he lived here.

(2) But when he did live bodily on earth, the same natural body was out of heaven.

(3) Therefore now whilst this natural body is in heaven, it is not on the earth.

Harpsfield. I deny the major.

Weston. These are Fulgentius's words, touching his human substance: "He was absent from heaven; when he descended from heaven; and touching the same substance, now he is in heaven, he is not on the earth: but concerning the divine nature, he never forsook either heaven or earth.

Here upon, not waiting Harpsfield's answer, he offered Mr. Cranmer to dispute; who began in the following manner.

Cranmer. I have heard you right learnedly and eloquently treat of the dignity of the scripture, which I do both commend, and wonder thereat. But whereas you refer the true sense and judgment of the scriptures to the catholic church, you are herein much deceived; especially, since, under the name of the church, you appoint such judges as have judged corruptly, and contrary to the true sense of scripture. I wonder, likewise, why you attribute so little to the diligent reading of the scriptures, and comparing of passages, seeing the scriptures do so much commend the same, in divers places, as also in those which you yourself have already alledged. And as touching your opinion of these questions, it seemeth to me neither to have any ground of the word of God, nor of the primitive church. My first question is: "How Christ's body is in the sacrament, according to your mind or determination?"

A doctor answered, He is there as touching his substance, but not after the manner of his substance.

Harpsfield. He is there in such sort of manner, as he may be eaten.

Cranmer. My next question is, "Whether he hath his quantity and qualities, form, figure, and such like properties?"

Harpsfield. Are these your questions? I may likewise ask you, "When Christ passed through the virgin's womb, An ruperit necne?"

Various opinions took place upon these questions. A buzzing was heard among the doctors, who knew not what to answer. Some thought one way; some another; nor could these learned doctors agree on this matter.

Weston. Tertullian doth call the sacrament the sign and figure of the Lord. St. Augustine to Dardanus, saith, "The Lord did not stick to say, This is my body, when he gave a sign of his body."

Besides this, he giveth rules how to understand the scriptures, saying, If the scriptures seem to command some heinous thing, then it is figurative, as by example, "To eat the flesh, and drink the blood, is a tropical speech."

Harpsfield. Tertullian did write in that place against Marcion an heretic, who denied Christ to have a true body, and said, he had only a fantastical body. He went about to shew that we had Christ both in heaven and on earth; and though we have the true body in the sacrament, yet he would not go about so to confound him, as to say, that Christ was truly in the sacrament; for that heretic would have thereat rather marvelled, than believed it. Therefore he shewed him, that it was the figure of Christ; and a figure cannot be but of a thing that is, or hath been extant.

To the text of Augustine, the church hath never taught the contrary. There is an outward thing in the sacrament, which sometimes hath sundry names. For it may be called a figure in this declaration, That body which is in the sacrament, is a figure of Christ dwelling in heaven.

To the third, That which is wrote by Augustine, for example, about the understanding of scriptures, is thus to be understood, as tending to a general manner of eating; so, To eat the flesh, and drink the blood, may be a figurative speech to exclude Anthropophagiam, that is, "The eating of man's flesh." The which is, when we eat man's flesh, cut in morsels, as we eat common meat; so as we neither have, nor eat Christ in the sacrament.

Weston. I understand your short and learned answer; which doth sufficiently satisfy me. But now to the second question, which is of transubstantiation.

The scripture calleth it bread.

Therefore, it is bread.

Harpsfield. In the name of bread, all is signified which we do eat.

Weston. Theodoret, an ancient writer, in his first dialogue says, "That Christ changed not the nature, but called it his body."

Harpsfield. He doth there speak of a symbol, which is the outward form of the sacrament. He meaneth, that doth tarry its own nature.

Weston. Theodoret also, in his second dialogue of those kinds of bread and wine, saith, "They go not out of their own nature, but they tarry in their own substance."

Harpsfield. They are understood to be of the same substance into which they are turned.

Weston. But what say you to this? "They remain in their former substance."

Harpsfield. Symbola manent; that is, "The outward signs do tarry."

Weston. But what is meant here by this word, (a symbol?)

Harpsfield. The outward form or shape only of the nature.

Weston. Then you cannot call them a substance.

Harpsfield. Yes, sir, every thing has a certain substance in its kind.

Weston. That is true, but accidents are not substances in their kind.

Harpsfield. They are something in their kind.

Weston. Chrysostom to Cæsarius the monk saith, "Like as before it is consecrated, it is bread; so after it is consecrated, it is delivered from the name of bread, and is endued with the name of the Lord's body, whereas the nature doth remain."

Harpsfield. Where read you this place, I pray you.

Weston. Here in Peter Martyr I find it.

Harpfield. The author shall be of more credit before I make so much of him as to frame an answer unto it.

Weston. Indeed I know not well where he findeth it. But Gelasius saith, That the nature of bread and wine do tarry?

Harpfield. What is that Gelasius?

Weston. A bishop of Rome.

Harpfield. Then he allowed the mass.

Weston. Yes, and oftentimes said it; and purgatory he also allowed, and prayer for the dead, relicks, and invocation to the saints.

Harpfield. Then he meant nothing against transubstantiation.

Weston. It doth appear so indeed. But Origin saith, "That the material bread doth tarry, and is conveyed into the privy, and is eaten of worms."

Harpfield. Tush, tush, this place appertaineth unto holy bread.

Weston. What, doth it appertain to holy bread?

Harpfield. Yes, unto holy bread.

Weston. By what means can you shew how this miraculous work bringeth Christ into the sacrament?

Harpfield. By the scriptures I prove it, which say, "this is my body."

Weston. It doth rejoice us all not a little, that you have so well maintained the sound doctrine of the sacrament of the altar, wherein you have faithfully cleaved to the catholic church, as an only stay of our religion.

When the disputation of Mr. Latimer was ended, on the Friday following, April 20th, the commissioners sat in St. Mary's church, as they did the Saturday before, and Dr. Weston used particular dissuasions with every one of them, and would not suffer them to answer in any wise, but directly and peremptorily, as his words were, to say whether they would subscribe or no. And first to Dr. Cranmer he said, He was overcome in disputations. To whom the bishop answered, That whereas Dr. Weston said, he hath answered and opposed, and could neither maintain his own errors, nor overturn the truth; all that he said was false; for he was not suffered to oppose as he would, nor could answer as he was required, unless he would have brawled with them, so thick their reasons came one after another, four or five frequently interrupting him, that he could not speak. Mr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer were asked, what they would do: they replied, that they would stand to what they had said. Then they were all called together, and sentence read over them, that they were no members of the church; and therefore, they, their favourers, and patrons, were condemned as heretics. And in reading of it, they were asked, Whether they would turn or no? But they bade them read on in the name of God, for they were not minded to turn. So they were all three condemned.

After which sentence of condemnation being awarded against them, they answered again, each in his turn, in manner and effect of words as follow; the archbishop speaking first:

Bishop Cranmer. "From this your judgment and sentence, I appeal to the just judgment of God Almighty, trusting to be present with him in heaven, for whose presence in the altar I am thus condemned."

Bishop Ridley. "Although I be not of your company, yet doubt I not but my name is written in another place, whither this sentence will send us sooner, than we should by the course of nature have come."

Bishop Latimer. "I thank God most heartily, that he hath prolonged my life to this end, that I may in this case glorify God by that kind of death."

Dr. Weston's answer unto Latimer. "If you go to heaven in this faith, then I will never come thither, as I am thus persuaded."

On the ensuing Saturday they had a mass, with a general procession and great solemnity. Dr. Cranmer was caused to behold the procession out of Bocardo, Dr. Ridley out of the sheriff's house. Latimer also being brought to see it from the bailiff's house, thought that he should have gone to burning, and spake to one Augustine, a catchpole, to make a quick fire: but when he came to Carfox, (Oxford market-place, where four ways meet) he ran as fast as his old bones would carry him, to one Spencer's shop, and would not look towards it.

mer also being brought to see it from the bailiff's house, thought that he should have gone to burning, and spake to one Augustine, a catchpole, to make a quick fire: but when he came to Carfox, (Oxford market-place, where four ways meet) he ran as fast as his old bones would carry him, to one Spencer's shop, and would not look towards it.

On the succeeding Monday, April 23, Dr. Weston took his journey up to London, with the letters certificatory from the university to the queen, by whom the archbishop (Dr. Cranmer) directed his letters supplicatory unto the council; which letters, after the prolocutor had received, and had carried them well near half-way to London, by the way he opened the same, and seeing the contents thereof, sent them back again, refusing to carry them. Likewise bishop Ridley, hearing of the prolocutor's going to London, wrote to him his letters, wherein he desired him to carry his answers up to certain bishops in London: the form of which letters, first of Dr. Ridley, then of the Archbishop, and lastly, another letter of Dr. Ridley to the Archbishop, followeth here in order:

BISHOP RIDLEY'S LETTER to Dr. WESTON.

MR. Prolocutor, I desire you, and in God's name require you, that you truly bring forth and shew all mine answers, written and subscribed with mine own hand, unto the higher house of the convocation, and especially to my lord chancellor, my lords of Durham, Ely, Worcester, Norwich, and Chichester; and also to shew and exhibit this my writing unto them, which in these few lines here I write unto you: and that I did make this request unto you by this my writing, know you, that I did take witness of them by whom I send you this writing, and also of those which were then with them present. viz. the two bailiffs of Oxford, and of Mr. Irish alderman, then there called to be a witness.

By me NICHOLAS RIDLEY.
April 13, 1554.

Dr. CRANMER'S LETTER to the COUNCIL, which Dr. WESTON refused to deliver.

IN right humble wise sheweth unto your honourable lordships, Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, beseeching the same to be a means for me unto the queen's highness for her mercy and pardon. Some of you know by what means I was brought and trained unto the will of our late sovereign lord king Edward the sixth, and what I spake against the same, wherein I refer me to the reports of your honours and worships. Furthermore, this is to signify unto your lordships, that upon Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last past, were open disputations here in Oxford against me, Mr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, in three matters concerning the sacrament: First, of the real presence. Secondly, of transubstantiation. And thirdly, of the sacrifice of the mass. Upon Monday against me; upon Tuesday against Dr. Ridley; and upon Wednesday against Mr. Latimer. How the other two were ordered I know not, for we were separated, so that none of us knoweth what the other said, nor how they were ordered. But as concerning myself, I can report: Dr. Chedsey was appointed to dispute against me; but the disputation was so confused that I never knew the like, every man bringing forth what he liked without order: and such haste was made, that no answer could be suffered to be taken fully, to any argument before another brought a new argument. And in such weighty matters the disputation must needs be ended in one day, which can scanty be ended in three months. And when we had answered them, they would not appoint us one day to bring forth our proofs, that they might answer us, being required by me thereunto unto, whereas I myself have more to say, than can be well discussed, as I suppose, in twenty days. The means to resolve the truth, had been to have suffered us to answer fully to all that they could say, and then they again to answer us fully to all that we can say. But why they would not answer us, what other cause can there be, but that either they feared their matter, that they were not able to answer us, or else for some consideration they made such haste, not to seek the truth, but to condemn us, that it must be done in post-haste before the matters could be thoroughly heard: for in haste we were all three condemned of heresy. Thus much I thought good to signify unto your lordships, that you may know the indifferent handling of matters, leaving the judgment thereof unto your wisdoms. And I beseech your lordships to remember me, a poor prisoner, unto the queen's majesty, and I shall pray, as I do daily unto God, for the long preservation of your good lordships in all godliness and felicity. April 23.

PROCEEDINGS of the PAPISTS against the PROTESTANTS.—The MARRIAGE of QUEEN MARY with the EMPEROR's SON, PHILIP, PRINCE of SPAIN.—Events that followed the Solemnization of the MARRIAGE.

HAVING finished our account of the disputations between the Roman catholics and protestant divines of the reformed religion, at Oxford, we shall now prosecute the historical narration, respecting various transactions in this tumultuous time of Queen Mary. However, we shall return again to the month of July, 1553, when the duke of Northumberland was brought to London, by the earl of Arundel, on St. James's day, July 25th; and these are the names of those who were committed with the duke to the Tower:

The Earl of Warwick, the earl of Huntington, lord Ambrose, and lord Henry Dudley, lord Hastings, who was delivered again the same night; sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, Andrew Dudley, sir Thomas Palmer, and Dr. Sands, chancellor of Cambridge.

July 26, the lord marquis of Northampton, the bishop of London, lord Robert Dudley, and sir Richard Corbet, were committed and sent to the Tower.

July 27, the lord chief justice of England, and the lord Mountacute, chief justice of the common pleas, were committed to the Tower.

July 28, the duke of Suffolk and sir James Cheek were committed to the Tower.

July 30, the lord Russell was committed to the sheriff of London's custody.

July 31, the earl of Rutland was committed to the Fleet; and on the same day the duke of Suffolk was delivered out of the Tower again.

Upon Thursday, August 3, the queen entered into the city of London at Aldgate, and so to the Tower, where she remained seven days, and then removed to Richmond.

August 4, Dr. Day was delivered out of the Fleet; and the day after, the lord Ferris was committed to the Tower, and Dr. Bonner delivered out of the Marshalsea. The same day at night Dr. Cocks was committed to the Marshalsea, and one Mr. Edward Underhill to Newgate. Also the same day Dr. Tonstal and Stephen Gardiner were delivered out of the Tower, and Gardiner received into the queen's privy council, and made lord chancellor.

August 7, Henry Dudley, captain of the guard at Guines, who before had been sent to the French king by his cousin the duke of Northumberland, after the dispatch of his ambassage with the French king, returned to Guines, and was this day brought to the Tower.

August 7, Dirige in Latin was sung within the Tower by all the king's chapel, and the bishop of Winchester was chief minister, the queen being present, and most of the council.

August 8, the king's body was brought to Westminster, and there buried; where Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, preached. The same day a mass of Requiem was sung within the Tower by the bishop of Winchester, who had on his mitre; and did all things as in times past was done; the queen being present.

Upon Thursday the duke of Norfolk came out of the Tower, with whom the duchess of Somerset was also delivered.

August 16, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Beacon, and Mr. Vernon, were committed to the Tower: with whom also Mr. Samson should have been committed, and was sought for the same time, at Mr. Elsing's house in Fleetstreet, where Mr. Bradford was taken: and because he was not found, the bishop of Winchester was greatly displeased with the messenger.

August 18, the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, were arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, the duke of Norfolk that day being the high judge.

August 19, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Gates, sir Henry Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, the lord marquis of Winchester being high judge.

August 21, the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, heard mass within the Tower, and after mass they all five received the sacrament in one kind only, as in the popish time was used. On which day also queen Mary set forth a proclamation, signifying to the people, that she could not hide any longer the religion which she from her infancy had professed, &c. prohibiting, in the said proclamation, printing and preaching.

August 22, the duke of Northumberland, sir John Gates, and sir Thomas Palmer, were beheaded at Towerhill. The same day certain noble personages heard mass within the Tower, and likewise after mass received the sacrament in one kind.

August 27, Dr. Chedsey preached at Paul's Cross, and the same day the archbishop of Canterbury, sir Thomas Smith, and the dean of St. Paul's, were cited to appear the week following before the queen's commissioners, in the bishop's consistory within St. Paul's.

September 7, lord Mountacute, chief justice, and lord chief baron were delivered out of the Tower.

September 13, the reverend father, Hugh Latimer, bishop of Worcester, was committed to the Tower.

September 14, the archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Cranmer, was committed to the Tower.

September 28, the queen came to the Tower of London, and on the 30th she rode from the Tower through the city, where were made many pageants to receive her, and so she was triumphantly brought to Whitehall.

October 1, the queen's highness went from Whitehall to Westminster-Abbey, accompanied with most part of the nobility of the realm, where she was crowned by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord Chancellor of England. At the time of the coronation, Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, made a sermon to the queen's majesty, and to the rest of the nobility.

October 3, the vice chancellor of Cambridge did challenge one Mr. Pierfon, for that he ministered still the communion in his own parish, and did receive strangers of other parishes to the same, and would not say mass. Whereupon, within two days after, he was discharged from farther ministering in his cure.

Upon the Wednesday following, the archbishop of York was committed to the Tower.

October 5, the queen rode to the parliament in her robes, and all the nobility with her; and when they were set in the parliament-house, the bishop of Winchester made to them a solemn oration, and serjeant Pollard was chosen speaker. The same day the bishops of Lincoln, Hereford, and Westchester, were discharged from the parliament and convocation.

Also October 10, the earl of Huntingdon was delivered out of the Tower.

Sunday October 15, Mr. Laurence Saunders preached at Alhallows in Bread-street, in the morning; where he fully declared the abomination of the mass, with divers other matters. But about noon of the same day, he was sent for by the bishop of London, and committed to the Marshalsea.

October 26, the vice-chancellor of Cambridge went to Clare-hall, and in the presence of Dr. Walker, displaced Dr. Madew, and placed Mr. Swyborne in the mastership there, by virtue of the lord chancellor's letters, for that he was married.

November 6, Mr. Pollard preached at St. Michael's, and in his sermon approved purgatory.

November 28, the archdeacon's official visited in Hinton, where he gave in charge to imprison all such as did disturb the queen's proceedings, in hindering the Latin service, the setting up of their altars, and saying of mass, or any part thereof.

December 15, there were two proclamations at London; the one for repealing of certain acts made by king Edward, and for the setting up of the mass the 20th of December following. The other was, that no man should interrupt any of those who would say mass.

The parliament beginning about the 5th of October, continued till the 5th of December. In which parliament were dissolved, as well as all the statutes made of Præmunire in the reign of king Henry VIII. &c. as also other laws and statutes concerning religion and administration of sacraments, decreed under king Edward VI. In which parliament was appointed, that on December 20, then next ensuing, the same year 1553, the old form and manner of church-service, used in the last year of king Henry, should again be restored.

December 31, the lord marquis of Northampton was delivered out of the Tower.

January 13, 1554, Dr. Crome was committed to the Fleet: also the Sunday following, one Mr. Addington was committed to the Tower. The same Sunday likewise, the bishop of Winchester declared openly in the court, that the marriage between the queen's majesty and the king of Spain was concluded; and the day following, January 15, the mayor with the aldermen and certain commons were at the court, and there they were commanded by the lord chancellor to prepare the city ready to receive the said king of Spain.

Saturday, January 20, the court of the first-fruits and tenths was dissolved.

January 17, justice Hales was committed to the Marshalsea; and the same day Mr. Rogers was committed to Newgate.

Thursday night, January 25, the lord marquis of Northampton was again committed to the Tower, and sir Edward Warner with him, who were brought to the Tower by the mayor.

About the latter end of January, the duke of Suffolk, with his brethren, departed from his house at Shene, and went into Leicestershire; after whom the earl of Huntington was sent, to take him and bring him to London, who proclaimed the said duke traitor by the way as he rode.

February 17, the duke of Suffolk was arraigned at Westminster, and the same day condemned to die by his peers; the earl of Arundel was chief judge.

Monday 19th, lord Cobham's three sons, and four other men, were arraigned at Westminster: of which sons the youngest was condemned, whose name was Thomas; the other two came not to the bar; and the other four men were condemned.

Tuesday 20th, lord John Gray was arraigned at Westminster, and condemned the same day, and other three men, whereof one was named Nailer.

Wednesday 21st, lord Thomas Gray, and sir James Croft, were brought through London to the Tower, with a number of horsemen.

Thursday 22d, sir Nicholas Throgmorton was committed to the Tower.

Friday 23d, 1554, the duke of Suffolk was beheaded on Tower-hill. His behaviour on the day of execution was remarkably devout.

The same day several prisoners had their pardon, and came through the city with their halters about their necks, in number about two hundred and forty.

Saturday, February 24th, sir William Bentlow was committed as prisoner to the master of the horse. This sir William was at this time one of lady Elizabeth's gentlemen.

Sunday 25th, sir John Rogers was committed to the Tower.

In this week, all such priests, within the diocese of London, as were married, were divorced from their livings, and commanded to bring their wives within a fortnight, that they might be likewise divorced from them; this the bishop did of his own power.

February 27th, certain gentlemen of Kent were sent into that county to be executed, among whom we find the two Mantels, two Knevets, and Bret. Mr. Rudstone also, with others, were condemned, and would have been executed, but they had their pardon.

As to Mr. Mantel, senior, it is to be noted, that, when under the gallows, upon his being turned off, the rope broke. Upon which, they urged him to recant, and receive the sacrament of the altar, promising him the queen's pardon; but this worthy gentleman rejected their insidious counsel, and chose rather to die, than to live, by dishonouring God.

It was reported of this Mr. Mantel, but falsely, that he had recanted; to clear himself from which aspersion, he wrote the following apology.

March 20th, 1554.

PERCEIVING that already certain false reports are raised of me concerning my answer in the behalf of my belief, while I was prisoner in the Tower of London, and considering how fore a matter it is to be an occasion of offence to any of those little ones that believe in Christ; I have thought it the duty of a christian man, as near as I can (with the truth), to take away this offence. It pleased the queen's majesty to send unto me Dr. Bourne, unto whom at the first meeting I acknowledged my faith in all points to agree with the four creeds, that is, the common creed, the creed of Nicene, Quicumque vult, and Te Deum laudamus.

Further, as concerning confession and penance, I declared that I could be content to shew unto any learned minister of Christ's church any thing that troubled my conscience, and of such a man I would most willingly hear absolution pronounced.

Touching the sacrament of the altar (as he termed it) I said, that I believe Christ to be there present as the Holy Ghost meant, when these words were written, "This is my body."

Further, when this would not satisfy, I desired him to consider, that I was a man condemned to die by law, and that it was more meet for me to seek a readiness and preparation for death. And inasmuch as I dissented not from him in any article of the christian faith necessary to salvation, I desired him for God's sake no more to trouble me with such matters, as which to believe, is neither salvation; nor not to believe, damnation. He answered, that if I dissented but in the least matter from the catholic church, my soul was in great danger; therefore much more in this great matter, alledging this text, "He that offendeth in the least of these, is guilty of them all." Yes, said I, "It is true of these commandments of God." To this I desired him to consider it was not my matter, nor could I in these things hold disputation, nor minded so to do; and therefore to take these few words for a full answer, that I not only in the matter of the sacrament, but also in all other matters of religion, believe as the holy catholic church of Christ (grounded upon the prophets and apostles) believeth. But upon this word [Church] we agreed not; for I took exception at the antichristian popish church.

Then fell we in talk of the mass, wherein we agreed not; for I, both for the occasion of the idolatry, and also the clear subversion of Christ's institution, thought it naught; and he, on the contrary, upon certain considerations, supposed it good. I found fault that it was accounted a sacrifice propitiatory for sin, and at certain other applications of it. But he said that it was not a propitiatory sacrifice for sin (for the death of Christ only was the sacrifice), and this but a commemoration of the same. Then, if you think so, (certain blasphemous collects left out) I could be content (were it not for offending my poor brethren that believe in Christ, which know not so much) to hear your mass. See, said he, how vain-glory toucheth you. Not so, sir, I am not now, I thank God, in case to be vain-glorious.

Then I found further fault with it, that it was not a communion. Yes, saith he, one priest saying mass here, and another there, and the third in another place, &c. is a communion. This agreeth not, said I, with these words of Paul, "Ye come not after a better manner, but after a worse." Yes, and it is a communion too, said he, when they come together. Now draweth on the time, said he, that I must depart from you to the court, to say mass before the queen, and must signify unto her in what case I find you, and methinks I find you sore seduced. Then I said, I pray you report the best: for I trust you find me not obstinate. What shall I say? are you content to hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the mass? I beseech you, said I, signify unto her majesty, that I am neither obstinate nor stubborn; for time and persuasion may alter me, but as yet my conscience is such, that I can neither hear mass, nor receive the sacrament after that sort.

To be short, Dr. Bourné came often unto me, and I always said unto him, that I was not minded, nor able to dispute in matters of religion: but I believed as the holy catholic church of Christ, grounded upon the prophets and apostles, doth believe: and namely in the matter of the sacrament, as the holy fathers, St. Cyprian and St. Augustine, do write, and believed; and this answer and none other they had of me in effect; what words soever have been spread abroad of me, that I should be conformable to all things, &c. The truth is, I never heard mass, nor received the sacrament during the time of my imprisonment.

Thus I have left behind me written with my own hand the effect of all the talk, especially of the worst that ever I granted unto, to the uttermost I can remember, as God knoweth. All the whole communication I have not written, for it were both too long and too foolish so to do. Now I beseech the living God, which hath receiveth me to his mercy, and brought to pass, that I die steadfast and undefiled in his truth, at utter defiance and detestation of all papistical and antichristian doctrine; I beseech him, I say, to keep and defend all his chosen, for his name's sake, from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, that antichrist, and from the assaults of all his satellites. God's indignation is known: he will try and prove who are his. Amend your lives. Deny not Christ before men, lest he deny you before his heavenly Father. Fear not to lose your lives for him; for ye shall find them again. God hold his merciful hand over this realm, and avert the plagues imminent from the same. God save the queen, and grant her knowledge in his truth. Amen.

WALTER MANTEL, prisoner.

TRANSACTIONS in the Second Year of QUEEN MARY'S REIGN.

SATURDAY, March 3d, sir Gawen Carew and M. Gibbes, were brought through London to the Tower with a company of horsemen.

March 17th, every householder in London was commanded to appear before the aldermen of their ward, and there were commanded, that they, their wives, and servants, should prepare themselves for confession, and receive the sacrament at Easter, and that neither they, nor any of them, should depart out of the city until Easter was past.

The Sunday following, March 18th, lady Elizabeth, the queen's sister, was brought to the Tower.

Upon Easter-eve, March 24th, the lord marquis of Northampton, the lord Cobham, and sir William Cobham, were delivered out of the Tower.

March 25, being Easter-day, in the morning, at St. Pancrase in Cheap, the crucifix with the pyx [the vessel in which the host was kept] were taken out of the sepulchre, before the priest rose to the resurrection: so that when, after his accustomed manner, he put his hand into the sepulchre, and said very devoutly, "He is risen, he is not here," he found his words true, for he was not there indeed. Whereupon being half dismayed, they consulted among themselves, whom they thought to be the likeliest to do this thing: in which consultation they remembered one Marsh, who a little before had been put from that parsonage, because he was married, to whose charge they laid it. But when they could not prove it, being brought before the mayor, they then burthened him to have kept company with his wife, since that they were by commandment divorced. Whereunto he answered, That he thought the queen had done him wrong, to take from him both his living and his wife: which words were then noted, and taken very grievously, and he and his wife were both committed to separate compters, notwithstanding that he had been very sick.

April 8, a cat was hanged upon a gallows, at the cross, in Cheapside, apparelled like a priest ready to say mass, with a shaven crown: her two fore-feet were tied over her head, with a round paper like a wafer-cake put between them: whereon arose great ill will against the city of London. For the queen and the bishops were very angry; and the same afternoon there was a proclamation issued, that whosoever could bring forth the party that did hang up the cat, should have twenty nobles, which was afterwards increased to twenty marks, but none could, or would earn them.

As to the first occasion of setting up this gallows in Cheapside, here is to be understood, that after the bishop of Winchester's sermon above-mentioned, made before the queen, for the speedy execution of Wyatt's soldiers, immediately upon the same, February 13, there were several gibbets set up in divers parts of the city; namely, two in Cheapside, one at Leadenhall, one at Billingsgate, one at St. Magnus church, one in Smithfield, one in Fleet-street, four in Southwark, one at Aldgate, one at Bishopsgate, one at Aldersgate, one at Newgate, one at Ludgate, one at St. James's-park corner, one at Cripplegate: all which remained for the terror of others, from February 13, to June 4; and then at the coming in of king Philip they were taken down.

April 11, sir Thomas Wyatt was beheaded and quartered on Tower-hill, where he spoke these words concerning the lady Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonshire: "Concerning, said he, what I have said of others in my examination, to charge any others as partakers of my doings, I accuse neither my lady Elizabeth's grace, nor my lord of Devonshire. I cannot accuse them, neither am I able to say, that to my knowledge they knew any thing of my rising." And when Dr. Weston told him, that his confession was otherwise before the council, he answered: "That which I said then, I said; but that which I say now, is true."

Tuesday, April 17, sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were brought to Guildhall, with whom also was brought sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and there arraigned of treason, for that he was suspected to be of the conspiracy with the duke of Suffolk and the rest, against the queen; where he so learnedly and wisely behaved himself, (as well in clearing his own case, as also in opening such laws of the realm as were then alledged against him) that the jury which were charged with this matter, could not in conscience but find him not guilty; for which, the said twelve persons of the quest, being substantial men of the city, were each bound in the sum of 500 pounds, to appear before the queen's council at a day appointed, there to answer such things as should be laid against them. Which jury appeared accordingly before the council in the Star-chamber, upon Wednesday, April 25: from whence, after certain questioning, they were committed to prison, Emanuel Lucar and Mr. Whetstone to the Tower, and the other ten to the Fleet. *

Concerning the condemnation of Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, which was the 20th of this month, and also of their disputations, having said enough before, we need not here rehearse the same.

On Friday after their condemnation, April 27, the lord Thomas Gray, brother to the late duke of Suffolk, was beheaded on Tower-hill.

Saturday, April 28, sir James Croft and Mr. Winter were again brought to Guildhall, where sir James Croft was arraigned and condemned; and because the day was far spent, Mr. Winter was not arraigned.

Thursday, May 17, William Thomas was arraigned at Guildhall, and the same day condemned, who the next day after was hanged, drawn, and quartered. His accusation was, for conspiring the queen's death. He made a godly end, and wrote many fruitful exhortations, letters, and sonnets, in the prison, before his death.

In the month of May it was given out, that a solemn disputation should be held at Cambridge, between Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, Mr. Rogers, and others of that side, and the doctors of both universities on the other side, like as had been before in Oxford. Whereupon the godly preachers who were in prison, having notice thereof, notwithstanding they were destitute of their books, and not ignorant of the purpose of their adversaries, and how the cause was prejudged before, also how the disputations were confusedly handled at Oxford; nevertheless, they thought not to refuse the offer of disputation, so that they might be quietly heard; and therefore wisely pondering the matter with themselves, by a public consent, directed out of prison a declaration of their mind by writing, the 8th of May. Wherein first, as touching the disputation, although they knew that they should do no good, because all things were pre-determined before; yet, nevertheless, they would not deny to dispute, if the disputation might be either before the queen, or before the council, or before the parliament, or if they might dispute by writing; for else, if the matter were brought to the doctors' handling in their own schools, they had sufficient proof, they said, by the experience of Oxford, what little good would be done at Cambridge; and, consequently, declaring the faith and doctrine of their religion, and exhorting the people withal to submit themselves with all patience and humility, either to the will or punishment of the higher powers, they appealed, in the end, from them to be their judges in this behalf, and thus ended their protestation, signed by them on the 8th of May.

On the 19th of the said month, lady Elizabeth, the queen's sister, was brought to the Tower, and committed to the custody of sir John Williams, afterwards lord Williams of Tame, by whom her highness was gently and courteously treated: who afterwards was had to Woodstock, and there committed to the keeping of sir Henry Benifield, knight, of Oxborough, in Norfolk; who, on the other side, both forgetting her estate, and his own duty, shewed himself more hard and straight unto her, than either cause was given on her part, or reason of his own should have led him.

July 25, being St. James's day, Philip prince of Spain, and Mary queen of England, were solemnly married in the cathedral church at Winchester, in the presence of a great number of noblemen of both realms. At the time of this marriage, the emperor's ambassador being present, openly pronounced, that, in consideration of that marriage, the emperor had granted and given unto his son the kingdom of Naples, &c.

Whereupon the first of August following, there was a proclamation, that from that time forth the stile of all manner of writings should be altered, and this following used:

"Philip and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, and Ireland, defenders of the faith, princes of Spain and Sicily, archdukes of Austria, dukes of Milan, Burgundy, and Brabant, Countess of Hapsburg, Flanders, and Tyrol."

Of this marriage as the papists chiefly seemed to be very glad, so several of them, after divers studies to shew forth their inward affections, made interludes and pageants; some drew forth genealogies, deriving his pedigree from Edward the Third, and John of Gaunt. Among others, Mr. White, then bishop of Lincoln, (his poetical vein being drunk with joy of the marriage) made the following verses:

JOHN of Gaunt, father of princes, did beget
John the puissant earl of Somerset:
From him John, duke of Somerset, did spring,
Whose daughter Marg'ret brought forth England's king,
Henry the seventh, who, of life bereft,
The throne unto his son prince Henry left:
His daughter Mary, England's scepter bears,
And may she bear it long, exempt from cares.

Other VERSES of Mr. WHITE, Bishop of LINCOLN, concerning the MARRIAGE of PHILIP and MARY.

THE devil, that old enemy of mankind,
Strives to prevent, though to it God's inclin'd,
That Mary, England's queen, should join her hands
To Spanish Philip in hymeneal bands.
Against the match, with the dark of prince of night,
The helpless Scots and tim'rous French unite.
With these hell's prelates join, Caiaphas's race,
Eight married fathers, void of heav'nly grace,
*John Dudley, Wyat, and rebellious Kent,
With †Gray, conspire the marriage to prevent.
But that the nuptials should performed be,
‡Cæsar and Flanders would, and Italy,
Catholic bishops, and with these comply
Five holy fathers, for their sanctity
In fetters bound, the senate of the nation,
And all true catholics in every station,
Lords, commons, learned, ignorant, and we,
'Cause God himself doth thereunto agree.
When Philip to queen Mary shall be join'd,
Their blood its wonted course shall run refin'd.

* Duke of Northumberland.

† Duke of Suffolk.

‡ Charles V. Emperor of Germany.

ANSWER to Mr. WHITE, Bishop of LINCOLN, by the Bishop of NORWICH.

THAT Mary should to Spanish Philip wed,
And England's glory be extirpated,
The devil wills; jointly with him agree,
All Flanders, Italy, and Germany,
Caiaphas's race, the mitred company
Of popish bishops, five for impiety
In prison cast: but God's extended arm
Kindly supports us, and averts the harm:
He nills the match, gives England liberty,
With him the warlike Scots and French agree,
Eight married in the Lord: and Dudley you,
Foreboding dreadful things, the marriage view,
The senate nills; brave Wyat doth espouse
With pious zeal his country's injur'd cause;
With him Gray, and the Kentish folk comply,
Either to gain their liberty, or die.
Then say, what profits will the Spanish king,
Having wedded Mary, to the English bring.

After the consummation of the marriage, the king and queen removed from Winchester to several other places, and by easy journeys came to Windsor-castle, where where he was installed with the order of the garter, on Sunday August 12; at which time, an herald took down the arms of England at Windsor, and in the place of them would have set up the arms of Spain, but he was commanded to set them up again by certain lords. From thence they both removed to Richmond, and, by water, to London, and landed at the bishop of Winchester's house, through which they passed both into Southwark-park, and so to Southwark-house, called Suffolk-place; where they lay that night, being the 18th of August.

The next day the king and queen rode from Suffolk-place (accompanied with a great number, as well of noblemen as gentlemen) through the city of London to Whitehall; and at London-bridge, as he entered at the draw-bridge, was a vain great spectacle set up; two images representing two giants, one named Corineus, and the other Gogmagog, holding between them certain Latin verses, which for the vain ostentation of flattery I overpass.

As they passed over the bridge, there was a number of ordnance shot off at the Tower, such as by old men's report; the like hath not been heard or seen these 100 years.

From London-bridge they passed the conduit in Gracechurch-street, which was finely painted, and among other things, the nine worthies, whereof king Henry VIII. was one. He was painted in harness, having in one hand a sword, and in the other hand a book, whereupon was written Verbum Dei, "the word of God," delivering the same book, as it were, to his son king Edward, who was painted in a corner by him.

But this gave great offence: for the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, sent for the painter, and not only called him knave for painting a book in king Henry's hand, and especially for writing thereupon Verbum Dei, but also rank traitor and villain, saying to him that he should rather have put the book into the queen's hand, who was also painted there, for that she had reformed the church religion, with other things according to the pure and sincere word of God indeed. The painter answered, and said, That if he had known that had been the matter wherefore his lordship sent for him, he could have remedied it, and not troubled his lordship. The bishop answered, That it was the queen's majesty's will and commandment that he should send for him: and so commanding him to wipe out the book and Verbum Dei too, he sent him home. The painter departed, but fearing lest he should leave some part either of the book, or of Verbum Dei, in king Henry's hand, he wiped away a piece of his fingers withal.

Here I pass over other pageants shewed to him in passing through London, with the flattering verses in Latin, wherein were blazed out in one place the five Philips, as the five worthies of the world, Philip of Macedon, Philip the emperor, Philip the bold, Philip the good, Philip prince of Spain, and king of England.

In another poetry, king Philip was resembled by an image representing Orpheus, and all English people resembled to brute and savage beasts, following after Orpheus's harp, and dancing after king Philip's pipe. Not that I reprehend the art of the Latin verses, which was fine and cunning, but that I pass over the matter, having weightier things in hand; and also the sight at St. Paul's church side, of him that came down upon a rope tied to the battlements, with his head before, neither staying himself with his hand nor foot; which shortly after cost him his life.

But one thing by the way I cannot let pass, touching the rood newly set up against this time, to welcome king Philip into St. Paul's church. The setting up of which rood was this, and may make as good a pageant as the best.

In the 2d year of Mary, Bonner, bishop of London, in his royalty, and all his prebendaries about him, in St. Paul's quire, the rood (or cross) laid along upon the pavements, and also the doors of St. Paul's being shut, the bishop, with others, said and sung divers prayers by the rood: that being done, they anointed the rood with oil in divers places, and after anointing, crept unto it, and kissed it.

After that, they took the said rood and weighed it up, and set it in its old accustomed place, and all the while they were doing thereof, the whole quire sang Te Deum, and when that was ended, they rang the bells, not only for joy, but also for the notable and great fact they had done therein.

Not long after this, a merry fellow came into St. Paul's, and spied the rood, with Mary and John now set up; whereto, among a great sort of people, he made low courtsey, and said, Sir, your mastership is welcome to town. I had thought to have talked further with your mastership, but that you be here clothed in the queen's colours. I hope that you be but a summer's bird, in that you are dressed in white and green.

The prince, being in the church of St. Paul's, after Dr. Harpsfield had finished his oration in Latin, set forward through Fleet-street, and so came to Whitehall, where he with the queen remained four days after, and from thence removed unto Richmond.

After this, all the lords had leave to depart into their countries, with strait commandment, to bring all their harness and artillery into the Tower of London with all speed. Now remained there no English lord at the court, but the bishop of Winchester. From Richmond they removed to Hampton-court, where the hall-door within the court was continually shut, so that no man might enter.

About the 8th of September, bishop Bonner began his visitation, who charged six men, in every parish, to inquire (according to their oaths) and to present before him, the 30th of September, all such persons as either had or should offend in any of his articles, which he had set forth, to the number of 37. Of the which visitation of Bonner, I have somewhat more largely to treat.

September 17, was a proclamation in London, that all vagabonds and masterless men, as well strangers as Englishmen, should depart the city within five days; and straitly charging all innholders, victuallers, taverners, and alehouse-keepers, with all others who sell victuals, that they (after the said five days) should not sell any meat, drink, or any kind of victuals to any serving-man whatsoever, unless he brought a testimonial from his master, to declare whose servant he was, and were in continual household with his said master, upon pain of the law if they offended herein.

Upon the Sunday following, the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor of England, preached at St. Paul's Cross, at whose sermon were present all the council that were at the court; namely, the marquis of Winchester, the earl of Arundel, lord North, sir Anthony Brown, Mr. Rochester, Mr. Walgrave, Mr. Englefield, lord Fitzwater, and secretary Peter, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Ely, which three sat under the bishop's arms. The gospel whereof he made his sermon, is written in the xxii. chapter of Matthew, where the Pharisees came unto Christ, and among them one asked Christ which was the greatest commandment; Christ answered, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. and thy neighbour as thyself, in these two is comprehended the law and the prophets."

After this long declaration of these words, speaking very much of love and charity, at last he had occasion upon St. James's words, to speak of the true teachers, and of the false teachers; saying, that all the preachers almost in king Edward's time, preached nothing but voluptuousness, and filthy and blasphemous lies, affirming their doctrine to be that false doctrine whereof St. James speaketh in his third chapter, saying, that it was full of perverse zeal, earthly, full of discord and dissension, that the preachers afore-named would report nothing truly, and that they taught that it was lawful for a man to put away his wife for adultery; and marry another, and that if a man vowed to-day, he might break it to-morrow at his pleasure, with many other things which I omit. And when he spake of the sacrament, he said, that all the church from the beginning have confessed Christ's natural body to be in heaven, and here to be in the sacrament, and so concluded that matter: and then willed all men to say with Joseph's brethren, brethren, "We have all sinned against our brother;" and so said he, have I too. Then he declared what a noble king and queen we have, saying, that if he should go about to shew that the king came hither for no necessity or need, and what he had brought with him, it would be superfluous, seeing it is evidently known, that he hath ten times as much as we are in hope and possession of, affirming him to be as wise, sober, gentle, and temperate a prince as ever was in England, and if it were not so proved, then to take him for a false liar for his so saying: exhorting all men to make much of him, and to win him whilst we had him, and so should we also win all such as he hath brought with him: and so concluded.

Tuesday, October 7, twenty carts came from Westminster, laden (as it was noised) with gold and silver, and certain of the guard with them through the city to the Tower, and it was received in by a Spaniard, who was the king's treasurer, and had custody of it within the Tower. It was matted about with mats, and mailed in little bundles about two feet long, and almost half a foot thick, and in every cart were six of those bundles. What it was indeed, God knoweth, for it is to us uncertain.

About the same time, or a little before, upon Corpus-Christi day, the procession being made in Smithfield, where, after the manner, the priest, with his box, went under the canopy, by chance there came by the way a certain simple man, named John Street, a joiner, of Coleman-street, who having some haste in his business, and finding no other way to pass through, by chance went under the canopy by the priest. The priest seeing the man so to presume to come under the canopy, being belike afraid, and worse feared than hurt, let his pyx fall down. The poor man, being straightway apprehended, was had to the compters, the priest accusing him before the council, as though he had come to slay him; whereas the poor man, as himself hath since declared unto us, had no such thought ever in his mind. Then from the compters, he was had unto Newgate, where he was cast into the dungeon, there chained to a post, where he was cruelly and miserably handled, and so extremely dealt withal, that being but simple before, he was now out of his wits altogether, and so upon the same had to Bedlam. Whereupon the brief chronicle of London in this point is not to be credited, which untruly reported that he feigned himself in Newgate to be mad: which thing we in writing of this history, by due inquisition of the party, have found to be contrary.

About the 5th of October, divers, as well householders, as servants, and apprentices, were apprehended and taken, and committed to sundry prisons, for having and selling of certain books, which were sent into England by the preachers that fled into Germany and other countries; which books touched a great number so near, that within one fortnight there were little less than threescore imprisoned for this matter: among whom was Mr. Brown, a goldsmith, Mr. Spark, a draper, Randal Tiler, a stationer, Mr. Beston, a merchant, with many others.

Sunday, October 14, the old bishop of Durham preached in the shrouds.

October 18, the king came from Westminster to St. Paul's church, accompanied with a great number of noblemen, and there he was received under a canopy, at the west door, and so came into the chancel, where he heard mass, which a Spanish bishop and his own chapel sung; and that done, he returned to Westminster to dinner.

Friday, October 26, certain men, whereof I spake before, which were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, being in number eight (for the other four were delivered out of prison, having submitted themselves), whereof Mr. Emanuel Lucas, and Mr. Whetstone were chief, were called before the council in the Star-chamber: where they all affirmed that they had done all things in that matter according to their knowledge, and with good consciences, even as they should answer before God at the day of judgment. When Mr. Lucas said openly before all the lords, that they had done in the matter like honest men, and true and faithful subjects, and therefore they humbly besought the lord chancellor, and the other lords, to intercede with the king and queen, that they might be discharged and set at liberty, and said that they were all contented humbly to submit themselves to their majesties, saving and reserving their truth, consciences, and honesty. Some of the lords said, that they deserved to pay a 1000l. a-piece, and others said, that Mr. Lucas and Mr. Whetstone deserved to pay a 1000 marks a-piece, and the rest 500l. a-piece. At last, sentence was given by the lord chancellor, that they should pay a thousand marks a-piece, and that they should go to prison again, and there remain till further orders were taken for their punishment.

Tuesday, October 30, the lord J. Gray was delivered out of the Tower, and set at liberty.

Sunday, November 4, five priests did penance at Paul's Cross, who were content to put away their wives, and take upon them again to minister. Each of them had a taper in his hand, and a rod, wherewith the preacher did dispel them.

Wednesday, November 7, the lord Paget, and sir Edward Hastings, master of the horse, were sent as ambassadors, I know not whither, but, as it was judged, to Cardinal Poole, who lay all that summer before at Brussels: and it was thought they were sent to accompany and conduct him into England, where at that time he was nominated and appointed bishop of Canterbury.

Friday, November 9, Mr. Barlow, late bishop of Bath, and Mr. Cardmaker, were brought before the council, in the Star-chamber, where after communication they were commanded to the Fleet.

Saturday, November 10, the sheriffs of London had orders to take an inventory of everyone of their goods, which were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, and to seal up their doors, which was done the same day. Mr. Whetstone, Mr. Lucas, and Mr. Kytely, were adjudged to pay 1000l. a-piece, and the rest 1000 marks a-piece, to be paid within one fortnight after. From this payment were exempted only four, who submitted themselves, whose names are these, Mr. Loc, Mr. Poynter, Mr. Beswike, and Mr. Carter.

Mention has been made of the visitation of Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, which begun (as is said) about the month of September; for the better preparation whereof were set forth certain articles, to the number of 37; which articles, partly for the tediousness of them, partly for that Mr. Bale in a certain treatise hath sufficiently painted out the same in proper colours, partly also, because I will not infect this book with them. I pass them over, proceeding in the progress of this bishop in his visitation in the county of Essex; who passing through the said county of Essex, being attended with divers worshipful of the shire, (for so they were commanded) arrived at Sterford in Hertfordshire, where he rested certain days, solacing himself after that painful peregrination, with no small feasting and banqueting with his attendants, at the house of one Parsons, his nephew, whose wife he commonly called his fair niece: (fair she was indeed) and he took there great pleasure to hear her play upon the virginals, wherein she excelled, insomuch that every dinner (sitting by his sweet side) she arose and played three several times at his request, of his good and spiritual devotion towards her. After some days were passed in this fashion, he proceeded in his popish visitation toward Hadham, his own house and parish, not more than two miles from Sterford, being there most solemnly rung out, as in all other places where he passed. At length drawing near unto Hadham, when he heard no stirring there in honour of his holiness, he grew into some choler, and the nearer he approached, the hotter was his fit: and the quieter the bells were, the quieter was his mood. Thus rode he on, chafing and fuming with himself: "What meaneth (saith he) that knave the clerk, that he ringeth not? and the parson, that he meeteth me not?" with other passionate expressions. There this patient prelate, coming to the town, alighted, calling for the key of the church, which was then all unready, since, as they pretended, he had come two hours before his time; whereupon he grew from choler to plain melancholy, so as no man willingly would deal with him to qualify the raging humour so far incorporated porated in his breast. At last, the church door being opened, the bishop entered, and finding no sacrament hanged up, no rood-loft decked after the popish precept, (which had commanded about the same time a well-favoured rood, cross, or image, and of tall stature, universally in all churches to be set up) curtailed his small devotions, and fell from choler and melancholy to madness in the greatest degree, swearing and raging, with an hunting oath or two, (and by no small oaths) that in his own church, where he hoped to have seen best order, he found most disorder, to his honour's most heavy discomfort, as he said, calling the parson (whose name was Dr. Bricket) knave and heretic; who there humbled himself, and yielded, as it were, to his fault, saying, He was sorry his lordship was come before that he and his parish looked for him, and therefore could not do their duties to receive him accordingly: and as for those things which were lacking, he trusted in short time hereafter he should compass that which hitherto he could not bring about. Therefore if it pleased his lordship to come to his poor house, where his dinner was prepared, he would satisfy him in those things, which his lordship thought amiss. Yet this reasonable answer neither could satisfy, nor assuage his unreasonable passion. For the catholic prelate utterly defied him and his cheer, commanding him out of his sight, saying, as his bye-word was, "Before God thou art a knave, avaunt heretic," and therewithal, whether thrusting, or striking at him, so it was; that with his hand he gave sir Thomas Josselin (who then stood next the bishop) a good blow upon the ear; whereat, being somewhat astonished, sir Thomas said, What meaneth your lordship? have you been trained in Will Somer's school, to strike him who standeth next you? The bishop, still in a rage, either heard not, or would not hear. Upon which Mr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, addressing the knight, said, "O Mr. Josselin, you must bear with my lord, for truly his long imprisonment in the Marshalsea, and the misusing of him there hath altered him; that in these passions he is not master of himself, nor will it avail to give him counsel until his heat be passed; and then assure yourself Mr. Josselin, my lord will be sorry for those abuses, and that misconduct which he cannot now see in himself." To whom sir Thomas merrily replied, "So it seems, Mr. Fecknam, that now he is come forth from the Marshalsea, he is ready to go to Bedlam." At which conceit some laughed, and more smiled, because the nail was hit so truly upon the head. The bishop appeared not in the least abashed at his own folly; and it is no wonder he was not ashamed to strike a stranger, who spared not the burning of so many good men.

This combat being finished, the martial prelate presently taketh him to his horse again, notwithstanding he at first intended to tarry at Hadham three or four days, and had made provisions in his own house accordingly; but leaving his dinner, he rode that night with a small company of his household to Ware, to the great wonder of all the country, who looked not for his coming till three days after.

But though the bishop posted hastily away, his retinue thought it most prudent to tarry behind; and his doctors and chaplains, a few excepted, dined at Dr. Bricket's, as merrily as the bishop rode to Ware chafing-ly. Now the causes which induced him to leave a good dinner, were supposed to be, that his lordship was offended at not receiving those solemnities he was accustomed to be saluted withal in other places, and because his wooden god was not elevated seemly in the rood-loft to entertain strangers: on which account he took occasion to quarrel with Dr. Bricket; for the bishop had issued out his precept, that in every parish a rood, (a cross, crucifix, and other images) should be erected, both well favoured, and tall in stature: which brings to my mind (says Mr. Fox) what happened in a certain town in Lancashire, near to Lancaster, called Cockram, where the parishioners and church-wardens, having at the same time a like charge for the erecting of a rood in their parish church, had made their bargain, and were at a price with one that could cunningly carve and paint such idols, for the framing of their rood; who, according to his promise, made them one, and set it up in their church. This done, he demanded his money: but they misliking his workmanship, refused to pay him, whereupon he arrested them, and the matter was brought before the mayor of Lancaster, who was a very fit man for such a purpose, and an old favourer of the gospel, which is rare in that country. Then the carver began to declare how they covenanted with him for the making of a rood with the appurtenances, ready carved and set up in their church; which he according to his promise had done; and now demanding his money, they refused to pay him. Is this true? quoth the mayor to the wardens. Yes, sir, said they. And why do you not pay the poor man his due? quoth he. May it please you, master mayor, quoth they, because the rood we had before was a well-favoured man, and he promised to make us such another; but this that he hath set us up now, is the worst favoured thing that ever you set your eyes on, gaping and grinning in such sort, that none of our children dare once look him in the face, or come near him. The mayor thinking that it was good enough for that purpose, if it had been worse, My masters, quoth he, howsoever you like the rood, the poor man's labour hath been never the less, and it is a pity that he should have any hindrance or loss thereby. Therefore I will tell you what you shall do: pay him the money you promised him, and go your ways home and look on it, and if it will not serve for a god, make no more ado, but clap a pair of horns on his head, and so he will make an excellent devil. This the parishioners took exceeding well; the poor man had his money, and divers laughed well thereat: but so did not the Babylonish priests.

This mayor continued a protestant almost 50 years, and was the only reliever of Mr. March, the martyr, (whose story followeth hereafter) with meat, drink, and lodging, while he lay in Lancaster-castle, the space of three quarters of a year, before he was had to Chester to be burned, &c.

BISHOP BONNER'S MANDATE.—The QUEEN'S supposed PREGNANCY.—POOLE'S ORATION.—SUBMISSION to the QUEEN.—A LETTER to the POPE.—PRAYERS on Account of MARY'S CONCEPTION.—TRANSACTIONS of the PRIVY COUNCIL, &c. in 1555.

ABOUT this time came forth a precept, or mandate, from Bonner, bishop of London, to all bishops and curates within his diocese, for abolishing of such scripture passages and writings as had been painted upon church-walls in king Edward's days; the copy whereof is inserted here, that the present generation may see the wicked proceedings of their impious zeal, or rather their malicious rage against the Lord and his word; as also against the edifying of christian people; and hence will appear, not only how blasphemously they spake against the holy scriptures, but likewise how studiously they fought by all manner of means to keep the people still in ignorance.

Bishop BONNER'S MANDATE to abolish the SCRIPTURE WRITINGS upon CHURCH-WALLS.

EDMUND (by God's permission) bishop of London, to all and every parsons, vicars, clerks, and lettered, within the parish of Hadham, or within the precinct of our diocese of London, wheresoever being, sendeth greeting, grace and benediction.

Because

Because some children of iniquity, given up to carnal desires and novelties, have by many ways enterprized to banish the ancient manner and order of the church, and to bring in and establish sects and heresies; taking from thence the picture of Christ, and many things besides instituted and observed of ancient time laudably in the same, placing in the room thereof such things, as in such a place it behoved them not to do, and also have procured as a stay to their heresies (as they thought) certain scriptures wrongly applied to be painted upon the church-walls, all which persons tend chiefly to this end; that they might uphold the liberty of the flesh, and marriage of the priests, and destroy, as much as lay in them, the reverend sacrament of the altar, and might extinguish and enervate holy days, fasting days, and other laudable discipline of the catholic church, opening a window to all vices, and utterly closing up the way unto virtue: wherefore we being moved with a christian zeal, judging that the premises are not to be longer suffered, do, for discharge of our duty, commit unto you jointly and severally, and by the tenor hereof do straitly charge and command you, that at the receipt hereof, with all speed convenient, you do warn; or cause to be warned; first, second, and third time, and peremptorily, all and singular church-wardens and parishioners whosoever within our foresaid diocese of London, wheresoever any such scriptures or paintings have been attempted, that they abolish and extinguish such manner of scriptures, so that by no means they be either read or seen, and therein to proceed moreover as they shall see good and laudable in this behalf. And if, after the said monition, the said churchwardens and parishioners shall be found remiss and negligent, or culpable, then you jointly and severally shall see the foresaid scriptures to be razed, abolished and extinguished forthwith: citing all and singular those church-wardens and parishioners, (whom we also for the same do cite here by the tenor hereof) that all and singular the church-wardens and parishioners being slack and negligent, culpable therein, shall appear before us, our vicar general and principal official, or our commissary special in our cathedral church of St. Paul at London, in the consistory there, at the hour appointed for the same, the sixth day next after their citation, if it be a court-day, or else at the next court-day after ensuing, where either we or our official or commissary shall sit; there to say and alledge for themselves some reasonable cause, if they have or can tell of any, why they ought not to be excommunicated, or otherwise punished for such their negligence, slackness, and fault, to say and to alledge, and further to do and receive, as law and reason requireth. And what you have done in the premises, do you certify us, or our vicar, principal official, and such our commissary, diligently and duly in all things, and through all things, or let him among you thus certify us, which hath taken upon him to execute this mandate. In witness whereof we have set our seals to these presents. Dated in the bishop's palace at London, the 25th day of the month of October, in the year of our Lord 1554, and of our translation the 16th.

About this time the Lord Chancellor sent M. Christopher unto the university of Cambridge with these three articles, which he enjoined them to observe.

The first, that every scholar should wear his apparel according to his degree in the schools.

The second was touching the pronunciation of the Greek tongue.

The third, that every preacher there should declare the whole stile of the king and queen in their sermons.

In this university of Cambridge, and also of Oxford, by reason of introducing these things, and especially for the alteration of religion, many wise and learned men departed from the universities: of whom, some of their own accord gave over, some were thrust out of their fellowships, some were miserably handled: insomuch that in Cambridge, in the college of St. John, there were 24 places void together, in whose rooms were taken in 24 others, which neither in virtue nor religion were to be compared to those that were before. And no less miserable was the estate of Oxford, by reason of the time, and the strait dealing of the visitors, who for setting forward their papistical proceedings, had no regard or respect to the forwardness of good wits, and the maintenance of good letters.

We must not pass over in silence the famous exhortation of Dr. Tresham, after he had called the students together; to allure them to the catholic service of the church, he used these reasons, declaring that there were a goodly company of copes, that were appointed to Windsor, but he had found the queen so gracious unto him, that they should come to Christ's-church. Now, if they like honest men would come to church, they should wear them on holy days. And besides all this, he would get them the lady bells of Bampton, and that should make the sweetest ring in all England. And as for holy water to sprinkle, he had already the fairest that was within the realm. Wherefore he thought that no man would be so mad to forego these commodities, &c.

On Monday, November 22d, the parliament met; at the opening whereof, both the king and queen rode to the house of lords in their robes, having two swords borne before them.

Wednesday, 21st, Cardinal Poole landed at Dover, on which day an act passed for his restitution in blood, utterly repealing, as false and most slanderous, that act made against him in the reign of Henry VIII: and on the next day, November 22d, the king and queen came to the parliament-house to give the royal assent to this act, and to establish the same against his coming.

Saturday, 24th, the cardinal came by water to London, and so to Lambeth-house, which was ready prepared against his coming.

Wednesday, 18th, there was a general procession in St. Paul's, for joy that the queen was conceived and quick with child, as was declared in the letter sent from the council to the bishop of London. At this procession ten bishops, and all the prebendaries of St. Paul's were present, and also the lord mayor with the aldermen, and a great number of the commons of the city in their best array. The following is a copy of the council's letter.

A LETTER,

From the COUNCIL to EDMUND BONNER, concerning QUEEN MARY'S CONCEPTION.

AFTER our hearty commendations unto your good lordship: whereas it hath pleased Almighty God amongst other his infinite benefits of late most graciously poured upon us and this whole realm, to extend his benediction upon the queen's majesty in such sort, as she is conceived and quick of child: whereby her majesty (being our natural liege lady, queen, and undoubted inheritor of this imperial crown) good hope of certain succession in the crown is given unto us, and consequently the great calamities (which for want of such succession might otherwise have fallen upon us and our posterity) shall by God's grace be well avoided, if we thankfully acknowledge this benefit of Almighty God, endeavouring ourselves with earnest repentance to thank, honour and serve him, as we are most bounden: these are not only to advertise you of these good news, to be by you published in all places within your diocese, but also to pray and require you, that both yourself do give God thanks with us for this his especial grace, and also give order that thanks may be openly given by singing of Te Deum in all the churches within your said diocese; and that likewise all priests and other ecclesiastical ministers, in their masses, and other divine services, may continually pray to Almighty God so to extend his holy hand over his majesty, the king's highness, and this whole realm, as this thing, being by his omnipotent power graciously thus begun, may by the same be well continued and brought to good effect, to the glory of his name. Whereunto, albeit we doubt not, ye would of yourself have had special regard without these our letters, yet for the earnest desire we have to have this thing done out of hand, and diligently continued, we have also written these letters, to put you in in remembrance; and so bid your lordship most heartily well to fare. From Westminster, the 27th of November, 1554.

Your assured loving friends,

The same day, in the afternoon, cardinal Poole came to the parliament house, which at that time was kept in the great chamber of the court at Whitehall, for that the queen was then sick, and could not go abroad: where the king and queen's majesty sitting under the cloth of state, and the cardinal sitting on the right hand, with all the other estates of the parliament being present the bishop of Winchester, being lord chancellor, began in this manner.

MY lords of the upper house, and you my masters of the nether house, here is present the right reverend father in God my lord cardinal Poole, come from the apostolic see of Rome, as ambassador to the king and queen's majesties, upon one of the weightiest causes that ever happened in this realm; and which pertaineth to the glory of God, and your universal benefit. The which ambassage their majesties pleasure is to be signified unto you all by his own mouth, trusting that you will receive and accept it in as benevolent and thankful wise as their highnesses have done, and that you will give an attentive and inclinable ear unto him.

The lord chancellor having ended, the cardinal began his oration, wherein he declared the causes of his coming, and what were his desires and requests. In the mean time, the court gate was kept shut until he had made an end of his oration.

The next day the three estates assembled again in the great chamber of the court at Westminster: where the king, queen, and the cardinal being present, they did exhibit (all kneeling) a supplication to their highnesses; which being read, the king and queen delivered the same unto the cardinal, who (perceiving the effects thereof to answer his expectation) did receive the same most gladly from their majesties: and after he had in a few words given thanks to God, and declared what great cause he had to rejoice above all others, that his coming from Rome into England had taken such happy success, he, by the pope's authority, did give them this absolution following.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ, who with his most precious blood hath redeemed and washed us from all our sins and iniquities, that he might purchase unto himself a glorious spouse without spot or wrinkle, and whom the Father hath appointed head over all his church, he by his mercy absolve you. And we by apostolic authority given unto us (by the most holy lord pope Julius the third, his vicegerent on earth) do absolve and deliver you and every of you, with the whole realm and dominions thereof, from all heresy and schism, and from all and every judgment, censures, and pains, for that cause incurred; and also we do restore you again unto the unity of our mother the holy church, as in our letters more plainly it shall appear: in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

Having finished this business, they went into the chapel, and there singing Te Deum, with great solemnity declared the joy that for this reconciliation was pretended.

The report of which was with great speed sent unto Rome; as well by the king and cardinal's letters, which hereafter follow, as also otherwise. Whereupon the pope caused three processions to be made at Rome, and thanks to be given to God, with great joy for the conversion of England to his church; and therefore praising the cardinal's diligence, and the devotion of the king and queen; on Christmas eve, by his bulls he set forth a general pardon to all such as did truly rejoice for the same.

On Sunday, December 2, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor of England, preached at Paul's-Cross, at which sermon the king and cardinal Poole were present. He took for his text the ninth chapter of the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans; "This also we know the season, brethren, that we should now awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed," &c.

First, he shewed how the saying of St. Paul was verified upon the gentiles, who had a long time slept in dark ignorance; not knowing God: therefore St. Paul said he, to stir up their heavy dulness, willed them to awake out of their long sleep, because their salvation was nearer than when they believed. In amplifying this matter, and comparing our times with their's, he took occasion to declare what difference the Jewish sacraments had from those of the Christians, wherein he used these words:

"Even as the sacrament of the Jews did declare Christ to come, so do our sacraments declare Christ to be already come: but Christ to come, and Christ to be come, is not all one. For now that he is come, the Jews' sacraments are done away, and our's only remain which declare that he is already come, and is nearer us, than he was to the fathers of the old law; for they had him but in signs, but we have him in the sacrament of the altar, even his very body. Wherefore now also it is time that we awake out of our sleep, who have slept, or rather dreamed these twenty years past, as shall more easily appear by declaring at large some of the properties and effects of a sleep or a dream. And first, As men intending to sleep, do separate themselves from company, and desire to be alone; even so have we separated ourselves from the see apostolic of Rome, and have been alone, unlike any other realm in Christendom.

Secondly, As in sleep men dream sometimes of killing, sometimes of maiming, sometimes of burning, or drowning, sometimes of such beastliness as I dare not name, but will spare your ears; so we have in this our sleep, not only dreamed of beastliness, but we have done it indeed. For in this our sleep hath not one brother destroyed another? Hath not half our money been wiped away at one time? And again, those that would defend their conscience, were slain, and others also otherwise troubled; besides infinite other things which you all know as well as I, whereof I appeal to your own consciences. Further, in a man's sleep all his senses are stopped, so that he can neither see, smell nor hear; even so, whereas the ceremonies of the church were instituted to move and stir up our senses, they being taken away, were not our senses (as ye would say) stopped, and we fast asleep? Moreover, when a man would gladly sleep, he will put out the candle, lest peradventure it may hinder his sleep, and awake him: so of late all such writers as did hold any thing with the apostolic see, were condemned and forbidden to be read: and images (which were laymen's books) were cast down and broken.

The sleep hath continued with us these twenty years, and we all that while without a head. For when king Henry did first take upon him to be head of the church, it was then no church at all. After whose death, king Edward (having over him governors and protectors, which ruled as they listed) could not be head of the church, but was only a shadow or sign of a head, and at length it came to pass, that we had no head at all; no, not so much as our two archbishops. For on the one side, the queen being a woman, could not be head of the church; and on the other side, they were both convicted of one crime, and so deposed. Thus while we desired to have a supreme head among us, it came to pass that we had no head at all. When the tumult was in the north, in the time of king Henry VI. (I am sure) the king was determined to have given over the supremacy again to the pope; but the hour was not then come, and therefore it went not forward, lest some would have said, that he did it for fear.

After this, Mr. Knevet and I were sent ambassadors unto the emperor, to desire him that he would be a means between the pope's holiness and the king, to bring the king to the obedience of the see of Rome, but the time was not yet come. For it might have been said, that it had been done for a civil policy. Again, in the beginning of king Edward's reign, the matter was moved, but the time was not yet: for it would have been said, that the king (being but a child) had been bought and sold. Neither in the beginning of the queen's reign was the hour come; for it would have been said, that it was done in a time of weakness. Likewise when the king first came, if it had been done, they might have said it had been done by force and violence. But now, even now, the hour is come, when nothing can be objected, but that it is the mere mercy and providence of God. Now hath the pope's holiness, pope Julius III. sent unto us this most reverend father, cardinal Poole, an ambassador from his side. What to do? not to revenge the injuries done by us against his holiness, but to give his benediction to those that defamed and persecuted him.

And that we may be the more meet to receive the said benediction, I shall desire you that we may always acknowledge ourselves offenders against his holiness; I do not exclude myself from the number; I will "weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice." And I shall desire you, that we may defer the matter no longer, for now the hour is come. The king and queen's majesties have already restored our holy father the pope to his supremacy; and the three estates assembled in the parliament, representing the whole body of the realm, have also submitted themselves to his holiness, and his successors for ever; wherefore let us not any longer stay. And even as St. Paul said to the Corinthians, that he was their father, so may the pope say, that he is our father; for we received our doctrine first from Rome, therefore he may challenge us as his own. We have all cause to rejoice, for his holiness hath sent hither and prevented us, before we sought him: such care hath he for us. Therefore let us say, "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it." Rejoice in this day, which is of the Lord's working, that such a noble birth is come, yea, such a holy father (I mean my lord cardinal Poole) which can speak unto us as unto brethren, and not as unto strangers, who hath been a long time absent. And let us now awake, who have so long slept, and in our sleep have done so much mischief to the sacraments of Christ, denying the blessed sacrament of the altar, and pulled down the altar, which thing Luther himself would not do, but rather reproveth them that did, examining them of their belief in Christ."

This was the sum of his sermon before his prayers, wherein he prayed first for pope Julius the third, with all his college of cardinals, the bishop of London, with the rest of that order; then for the king and queen, and the nobility of this realm; and lastly, for the commons of the same, with the souls departed, lying in the pains of purgatory. This ended, the time being late, they began in St Paul's to ring their evening song, whereby the preacher could not be well heard, which caused him to make an end of his sermon.

About this time a messenger was sent from the parliament to the pope, to desire him to confirm and establish the sale of abbey lands and chauntry lands: for the lords and the parliament would grant nothing in the pope's behalf, before their purchases were fully confirmed.

Thursday, December 6, the whole convocation, both bishops and others, were sent for to Lambeth to the cardinal, who the same day forgave them all their perjuries, schisms, and heresies, and they all there kneeled down, and received his absolution; and after an exhortation and gratulation for their conversion to the catholic church, made by the cardinal, they departed.

Wednesday, December 12, five of the eight men which lay in the Fleet, that were of Mr. Throgmorton's jury, were discharged, and set at liberty upon paying a fine of 220l. a-piece: and the other three put up a supplication, therein declaring, that their goods did not amount to the sum that they were appointed to pay; upon which declaration, paying 40l. a piece, they were delivered out of prison on the 21st of December.

Saturday, December 22, the parliament had a strict command that none of them should depart into the country this Christmas, nor before the parliament were ended. Which command was very contrary to their expectations; for as well many of the lords, as also many of the commons, had sent for their horses, and had them brought hither.

Friday, December 28, the prince of Piedmont came to the court at Westminster.

On New-year's-day, 1555, at night, several honest men and women of the city, to the number of thirty, and Mr. Rose, a minister, were taken as they were in a house in Bow-church-yard, at the communion, and the same night were all committed to prison. And on the third of January following, Mr. Rose was before the bishop of Winchester, the lord chancellor, and from thence the same day committed to the Tower, after some communication between the bishop and him.

The same day the act of supremacy passed in the parliament, and at night a great tumult was at Westminster, between some Spaniards and Englishmen, whereof a great mischief had like to have ensued, by means of a Spanish friar, who got into the church, and rung the alarum. The occasion was about two prostitutes then in the cloyster at Westminster, with a sort of Spaniards, whereof whilst some played the knaves with them, others kept the entry of the cloyster with dogs in harness. In the mean time, some of the dean's men came into the cloyster, and the Spaniards discharged their dogs, and hurt some of them. By and by the noise of this came into the streets, so that the whole town was up almost, but never a stroke was stricken. Notwithstanding, the noise of this doing with the dean's men, and also the ringing of the alarum, made much ado, and a great number to be sore afraid.

We have before mentioned the council's letter sent to bishop Bonner, signifying the good news of queen Mary to be not only conceived, but also quick with child, which was the twenty-eighth of November. Of this child great talk at this time began to rise in every man's mouth, especially amongst such as seemed to carry Spanish hearts in English bodies. In which number here is not to be forgotten, nor defrauded of his commendation for his worthy affection towards his prince and her issue, one sir Richard Southwell, who being the same time in the parliament-house, when, as the lords were occupied in other affairs and matters of importance, suddenly starting up, for fulness of joy burst out in these words following: "Tush, my masters, said he, why talk ye of these matters? I would have you take some order for our master that is now coming into the world apace, lest he find us unprovided," &c. By which words, and also by the aforesaid letters of the council, and the common talk abroad, it may appear what an assured opinion was then conceived in men's heads, of queen Mary to be conceived and quick with child. Inasmuch that at the same time, and in the same parliament, there was a bill exhibited, and the following act made upon the same.

The WORDS of the ACT.

ALBEIT, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in the present parliament assembled, have firm hope and confidence in the goodness of Almighty God, that like as he hath hitherto miraculously preserved the queen's majesty from many great imminent perils and dangers; even so he will of his infinite goodness give her highness strength, the rather by our continual prayers, to pass well the danger of deliverance of child, wherewith it hath pleased him (to all our great comforts) to bless her: yet forasmuch as all things of this world be uncertain, and having before our eyes the dolorous experience of this inconstant government, during the time of the reign of the late king Edward the sixth, do plainly see the manifold inconveniences, great dangers and perils that may ensue in this whole realm, if foresight be not used to prevent all evil chances, if they should happen; for the eschewing hereof, we the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, for and in consideration of a most special trust and confidence that we have and repose in the king's majesty, for and concerning the politic government, order, and administration of this realm, in the time of the young years of the issue or issues of her majesty's body to be born, if it should please God to call the queen's highness out of this present life, during the tender years of such issue or issues, (which God forbid) according to such order and manner, as hereafter in this present act his highness's most gracious pleasure is, should be declared and set forth, have made our humble suit, by the assent of the queen's highness, that his majesty would vouchsafe to accept and take upon him the rule, order, and education, and government of the said issue or issues to be born, as is aforesaid: upon which our suit, being of his said majesty most graciously accepted, it hath pleased his highness not only to declare, That like as for the most part his majesty verily trusteth that Almighty God (who hath hitherto preserved the queen's majesty, to give this realm so good an hope of certain succession in the blood royal of the same realm) will assist her highness with his graces and benedictions, to see the fruit of her body well brought forth, live, and able to govern; wherefore neither all this realm, nay all the world besides, should or could receive more comfort than his majesty should or would) yet if such chance should happen, his majesty at our humble desires is pleased and contented, not only to accept and take upon him the care and charge of the education, rule, order, and government of such issues as of this most happy marriage shall be born between the queen's highness and him; but also, during the time of such government, would by all ways and means, study, travel, and employ himself to advance the weal both public and private of this realm and dominion thereunto belonging, according to the said trust in his majesty reposed, with no less good will and affection, than if his highness had been naturally born amongst us. In consideration whereof, be it enacted by the king and the queen's most excellent majesties, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, &c. [As it is to be seen in the act more at large ratified and confirmed by the same parliament, to the same intent and purpose.]

Thus we see how man doth purpose, but God deposeth as pleaseth him. For all this great labour, provision, and order, taken in the parliament-house for their young master long-looked for, coming so surely into the world, in the end, appeared neither young master, nor young mistress, that any man yet to this day can hear of. Furthermore, as the labour of the lay-sort was herein deluded; so no less ridiculous was it to behold, what little effect the prayers of the papists had with Almighty God, who travelled no less with their processions, masses, and collects, for the happy deliverance of this young master to come, as what follows will shew.

A PRAYER by DR. WESTON, DEAN of WESTMINSTER, to be daily said for the QUEEN's DELIVERANCE.

O Most righteous Lord God, which for the offence of the first woman, hath threatened unto all women, a common, sharp, and inevitable malediction, and hath enjoined them that they should conceive in sin, and being conceived, should be subject to many and grievous torments; and finally, be delivered with the danger and jeopardy of their lives; we beseech thee for thine exceeding great goodness and bottomless mercy, to mitigate the strictness of that law. Assuage thine anger for a while, and cherish in the bosom of thy favour and mercy our most gracious queen Mary, being now at the point of being delivered. So help her, that without danger of her life she may overcome the sorrow; and in due season bring forth a child, in body beautiful and comely, in mind noble and valiant. So that afterwards, she forgetting the trouble, may with joy laud and praise the bountifulness of thy mercy, and together with us, praise and bless both thee and thy holy name world without end.

Another solemn PRAYER for KING PHILIP and QUEEN MARY's CHILD; that it may be a MALE-CHILD, &c.

O Most mighty Lord God, who regardest the prayer of the humble, and despisest not their request; bow down from thine high habitation of the heavens, the eyes of thy mercy to us wretched sinners, bowing the knees of our hearts, and with many and deep sighs bewailing our sins and offences humbly with eyes intent, and hands displayed, praying and beseeching thee, with the shield of thy protection, to defend Mary thy servant; and our queen, who hath none other helper but thee, and whom, through thy grace, thou hast willed to be conceived with child: and at the time of her travail graciously with the help of thy right hand deliver her, and from all danger, with the child in her conceived, mercifully preserve:

It is well known unto us how marvellously thou didst work in Sarah of the age of 90 years, and in Elizabeth the barren, and also fair stricken in age: for thy council is not in the power of men. Thou Lord that art the searcher of hearts and thoughts thou knowest that thy servant never lusted after man, never gave herself to wanton company, nor made herself partaker with them that walk in lightness: but she consented to take an husband with thy fear; and not with her lust. Thou knowest that thy servant took an husband not for carnal pleasure, but only for the desire and love of posterity, wherein thy name might be blessed for ever and ever.

Tuesday, January, 10th, nineteen members of the lower-house, with their speaker, came to Whitehall to the king, and offered him the government of the realm, and of the issue, if the queen should fail, which was confirmed by act of parliament within ten days after.

Wednesday, 26th, the parliament was dissolved. In this parliament the bishop of Rome was established, and all such laws as were made against him since the twentieth year of king Henry VIII. were repealed, and cardinal Poole, bishop Pates, Lilly, and others, were restored to their blood. Also an act was made, that whoever should speak any thing against the king or queen, or that might move any sedition or rebellion, at the first time to have one of his ears cut off, or to forfeit an hundred marks; and at the second time, to have both his ears cut off, or else to forfeit feit an hundred pounds; and whosoever should write, cypher, or print any of the premises, to have their right hand cut off.

Likewise in this parliament three statutes were revived for trial of heresy: one made in the fifth year of Richard II. another in the second year of Henry IV. and the third in the second year of Henry V. Also the affair of Mr. Rose, and others that were with him, was communed of in this parliament, and upon that occasion an act was made, that certain evil prayers should be treason against the queen's highness. The prayers of these men were thus: "God turn the heart of queen Mary from idolatry, or else shorten her days."

At the apprehending of Mr. Rose, and his companions, word was brought thereof to bishop Hooper, being then in the Fleet; whereupon the bishop sent a letter of consolation to the said prisoners; enjoining them not to fear their adversaries, though he acknowledged the papist's church was more bloody and tyrannical, than ever was the sword of the heathens and gentiles.

Upon Friday, January 18th, all the council went to the Tower, and set at liberty most part of the prisoners, among whom were the late duke of Northumberland's sons, Ambrose, Robert, and Henry, sir Andrew Dudley, sir John Rogers, sir James Crofts, sir Nicholas Throgmorton, sir Nicholas Arnal, sir George Harper, sir Edward Warner, sir William Sentlow, sir Gawen Carew, Mr. Gibbes, Cuthbert Vaughan, with many others.

Tuesday, 22d, all the preachers who were in prison, were called before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, and certain others, at the bishop's house, in St. Mary Overy's. From whence, (after communication, being asked whether they would convert, and enjoy the queen's pardon, or else stand to that they had taught; they all answered, that they would stand to that they had taught) they were committed to straighter prison than before, with charge that none should speak with them: of whom, one James George, the same time, died in prison, being there in bonds for religion and righteousness' sake, who therefore being exempted burial in the popish church-yard, was buried in the fields.

Wednesday, 23d, all the bishops, with the rest of the convocation-house, were before the cardinal at Lambeth, where he desired them to repair every man where his cure and charge lay, exhorting them to treat their flock with all mildness, and to endeavour to win the people rather by gentleness, than by extremity and rigour, and so let them depart.

Friday, 25th, being the day of conversion of St. Paul, there was a general and solemn procession through London to give God thanks for their conversion to the catholic church: wherein (to set out their glorious pomp) there were fourscore and ten crosses, one hundred and sixty priests and clerks, who had every one of them copes upon their backs, singing loudly. There followed also, for the better estimation of the fight, eight bishops; and last of all came Bonner, bishop of London, carrying the popish pyx under a canopy.

There were also present the mayor, and aldermen, and all the livery of every occupation. Moreover the king also himself, and the cardinal, came to St. Paul's church the same day. From whence after mass they returned to Westminster again. As the king was entering the church, at the steps going up to the choir, all the gentlemen that of late were set at liberty out of the Tower, kneeled before the king, and offered unto him themselves and their services.

After the procession, there was also commandment given to make bonfires at night. Whereupon did rise among the people a doubtful talk why all this was done: some saying it was, that the queen being with child, might have a safe delivery; others thought, that it was for joy that the realm was joined again to the see of Rome.

Monday, 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, had commission from the cardinal to sit upon, and order, according to the laws; all such preachers and heretics (as they termed them) as were in prison; and according to this commission, the same day the bishop of Winchester, and the other bishops, with certain of the council, sat in St. Mary Overy's church, and called before them bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Cardmaker, who were brought thither by the sheriffs; from whence, after communication, they were committed to prison till the next day, but Cardmaker submitted himself.

Tuesday, 29th, Hooper, Rogers, Dr. Taylor, and Bradford, were brought before them, where sentence of excommunication, and judgment ecclesiastical, were pronounced upon bishop Hooper, and Mr. Rogers, by the bishop of Winchester, who sat as judge in Caiaphas's seat, and drove them out of the church, according to their law and order. Dr. Taylor and Bradford were committed to prison till the next day.

Wednesday, 30th, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Crome, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunders, and Dr. Ferrar, sometime bishop of St. David's, were before the said bishops, when Dr. Taylor, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Bradford, were likewise excommunicated; and, sentence being pronounced upon them, they were committed to the sheriffs. Dr. Crome desired two months respite, which was granted him; and Mr. Ferrar was again committed to prison till another time. All these men shewed themselves to be learned, as indeed they were: but what availeth either learning, reason, or truth itself, where arbitrary will alone beareth rule?

After the examination and condemnation of these good men and preachers, commissions and inquisitors were sent abroad into all parts of the realm: by reason whereof, a great number of most godly and true christians (out of all the quarters, but especially Kent, Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk) were apprehended, brought up to London, cast into prison, and afterwards (most of them) either consumed cruelly by fire, or else through evil handling died in prisons, and were buried on the dung-hills, in the fields, or in some back-side of the prison.

What the cruel sufferings, persecutions, tortures, and agonizing deaths were, which these, and numberless other subjects of the bloody queen Mary, endured from her hands, and those of her no less bloody instruments, the bishops Bonner and Gardner, shall (God willing) be the substance of the next book.

As to the queen (chief cause of all these barbarities) her health had been, for some time in a declining state; and on mistaking her dropsy for a pregnancy, she had used an improper regimen, which daily increased her disorder. Every reflection was now a subject of torment begun in this world, and struck a dagger in her heart. The corroding worm, that never dies began to gnaw it's vital strings. The consciousness of having incurred the hatred of her subjects; the idea of Elizabeth's succeeding to the crown; her fear that the catholic religion would be exposed to danger; her dejection for the loss of Calais with which she was deadly affected; and above all, her grief for the loss of her husband, whom, she knew, intended soon to return to Spain, to settle there during the remainder of his life: these melancholy reflections, preying upon her mind, with the greatest violence, threw her into a complication of disorders, attended with a lingering fever, of which she died, November 17th, 1558, in the forty-third year of her age, after a short, cruel, and unhappy reign of five years, four months, and eleven days. She was interred at Westminster, in the chapel of her grandfather Henry VII. Some writers have been of opinion, that this unworthy queen had a serious sense of religion, but can we call that profession serious, however distinguished by the peaceful, sacred name of religion, which prompts us to be guilty of savage cruelty, and destitute of all the social virtues? There are, we acknowledge, a few devout pieces extant, composed by Mary.

C H A P. I.

The LIFE, EXAMINATIONS, WRITINGS, and CONDEMNATION, of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, and also the LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS; who were burned, the former in SMITHFIELD, February 4th, the latter at COVENTRY, February 8th, 1555.

HE Rev. Mr. John Rogers, vicar of St. Sepulchre's, and reader of St. Paul's London, was educated in the university of Cambridge, and at length was chosen chaplain to the English factory at Antwerp, in Brabant; there he became acquainted with Mr. William Tindal, whom he assisted in his translation of the New Testament, and with Miles Coverdale, who, with several other worthy protestants, had been driven out of England on account of the persecutions for five articles, in the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. By means of conversing with these worthy and pious servants of God, Mr. Rogers came to the knowledge of the scriptures, and finding, according to those sacred oracles, that matrimony was both honest and honourable, he entered into that state, and went with his wife to Wittenberg, in Saxony, where, through indefatigable study and application in a short time he attained to such a knowledge of the Dutch language as to be capable of taking charge of a christian congregation in that part of Europe.

Having cast off all popish superstitions, idolatry and restrictions, this aged minister served his cure faithfully and diligently for many years, until such time that it pleased God to dispel the mists of popish darkness from his native country, and restore the glorious light of the pure gospel of Christ, by the introduction of his chosen servant Edward VI. to the throne of England.

Mr. Rogers then, being orderly called, left his living in Saxony, and came into England to preach the gospel without any previous condition, appointment, or establishment whatever: but after having laboured in the vineyard of his master for a time, with great success, Dr. Ridley, then bishop of London, gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's: of which he was afterwards chosen by the dean and chapter, one of the divinity lecturers, or a reader of divinity in that church. Here he continued till queen Mary soon after her accession, banished the true religion and again introduced the superstition and idolatry of the church of Rome with all the horrid cruelties of blood-thirsty Antichrist.

When queen Mary was in the Tower of London imbibing Gardiner's pernicious counsels, Mr. Rogers preached at Paul's Cross, confirming those doctrines which he and others had there taught in king Edward's days, and exhorted the people, with peculiar energy, to continue steadfast in the same, and to beware of the false tenets of pestilent popery. For this sermon the preacher was summoned before the council, then filled with popish and bloody bishops; before whom he pleaded his own cause in so pious, bold, and yet prudent a manner, as to obviate their displeasure for that time, and he was dismissed. But after Mary's proclamation, to prohibit the preaching of the doctrines of the reformed religion, Mr. Rogers, for a contempt of the same, was again summoned before a council of bishops, who, after having debated upon the nature of his offence, ordered him to keep close prisoner in his own house, where he remained a considerable time, till at the instigation of the cruel Bonner, bishop of London, he was removed to Newgate, and placed among the common felons. What passed between him and the adversaries of Christ, during the time of his imprisonment, is not certainly known; but the following examinations he left in his own hand-writing: and it is the will of God they should be handed down to us, and remain a perpetual testimony in the cause of true religion.

The FIRST and SECOND EXAMINATIONS of the Rev. Mr. JOHN ROGERS, before the LORD CHANCELLOR, GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and OTHERS of the COUNCIL of BISHOPS, January 22d, 1555.

FIRST, the lord Chancellor said unto me thus: Sir, you have heard the state of the realm in which it standeth now:

Rogers. No, my lord, I have been kept in close prison, and except there have been some general things said at the table, when I was at dinner or supper, I have heard nothing; and there have I heard nothing, whereupon any special thing might be grounded.

Then said the lord chancellor, General things, mockingly: you have heard of my lord cardinal's coming, and that the parliament hath received his blessing, not one resisting it, except one man which did speak against it. Such an unity, and such a miracle hath not been seen. And all they, of which there are eight score in one house, (said one that was by, whose name I know not) have with one assent received pardon of their offences, for the schism that we have had in England, in refusing the holy father of Rome to be head of the catholic church. How say you? are you content to unite yourself to the faith of the catholic church with us, in the state in which it is now in England? will you do that?

Rogers. The catholic church I never did nor will dissent from.

Lord Chancellor. Nay, but I speak of the state of the catholic church, in that wise in which we stand now in England, having received the pope to be supreme head.

Rogers. I know none other head but Christ of his catholic church, neither will I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to have any more authority than any other bishop hath by the word of God, and by the doctrines of the old and pure catholic church, four hundred years after Christ.

Lord Chancellor. Why didst thou then acknowledge king Henry the eighth to be supreme head of the church, if Christ be the only head?

Rogers. I never granted him to have any supremacy in spiritual things, as are the forgiveness of sins; giving of the Holy Ghost; authority to be a judge above the word of God.

Lord Chancellor. Yea, said he and Tonstall bishop of Durham, and N. bishop of Worcester, if thou hadst said so in his days, (and they nodded their head at me with a laughter) thou hadst not been alive now.

Rogers. Which thing I denied. The lord chancellor said, What sayest thou? make us a direct answer whether thou wilt be one of this catholic church or not, with us in that state in which we are now?

Rogers. My lord, without fail I cannot believe, that ye yourselves do think in your hearts that he is supreme head in forgiving of sins, &c. (as is before said) seeing you and all the bishops of the realm have now twenty years long preached, and some of you also written to the contrary, and the parliament hath so long ago condescended unto it. And there he interrupted me thus:

Lord Chancellor. Tush, that parliament was with most great cruelty constrained to abolish and put away the primacy from the bishop of Rome.

Rogers. With cruelty? why then I perceive that you take a wrong way with cruelty to persuade men's consciences. For it should appear by your doings now, that the cruelty then used hath not persuaded your consciences. How would you then have our consciences persuaded with cruelty?

Lord Chancellor. I talk to thee of no cruelty but that they were so often and so cruelly called upon in that parliament, to let the act go forward; yea, and even with force driven thereunto, whereas in this parliament it was uniformly received. Here are two things, mercy and justice: if thou refuse the queen's mercy now, then shalt thou have justice ministered unto thee.

Rogers. I never offended, nor was disobedient unto her grace, and yet I will not refuse her mercy. I cannot be so persuaded.

Lord Chancellor. If thou wilt not receive the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the catholic church, then thou shalt never have her mercy, thou mayest be sure. If thou wilt enter into one church with us, &c. tell us that; or else thou shalt never have so much professed thee again as thou hast now.

Rogers. I will find it first in the scripture, and see it tried thereby, before I receive him to be supreme head.

Worcester. Why, do you not know what is in your creed: "I believe in the holy catholic church?"

Rogers. I find not the bishop of Rome there. For [catholic] signifieth not the Romish church: it signifieth the consent of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages. But how should the bishop of Rome's church be one of them, which teacheth so many doctrines that are plainly and directly against the word of God? Can that bishop be the true head of the catholic church, that doth so? That is not possible.

Lord Chancellor. Shew me one of them, one: let me hear one.

Rogers. The bishop of Rome and his church, say, read, and sing, all that they do in their congregations, in Latin, which is directly and plainly against the 1st. to the Corinthians, the xiv. chapter.

Lord Chancellor. I deny that; I deny that is against the word of God. Let me see you prove that: how prove you that?

Rogers. Thus I began to say the text from the beginning of the chapter, "He that speaketh in an unknown tongue," &c. To speak with tongues, is to speak with a strange tongue, as Latin or Greek, &c. and so to speak, is not to speak unto men, but to God. But ye speak in Latin, which is a strange tongue, wherefore ye speak not unto men, but unto God (meaning God only at the most). This he granted, that they spake not unto men, but unto God.

This a point of sophistry, quoth secretary Bourne.

Then the lord chancellor began to tell the lord Howard, that when he was in High-Dutchland, they at Hale, which had before prayed and used their service all in Dutch, began then to turn part into Latin, and part into Dutch.

Worcester. Yes, and at Wittenberg too.

Rogers. Yes, (but I could not be heard for the noise). And here I would have declared how they ought to proceed in these days and so have come again to my purpose, but it was impossible: for one asked one thing, another said another; so that I was fain to hold my peace, and let them talk. And even when I would have taken hold on my proof, the lord chancellor ordered me to prison again: and away, away, said he, we have more to talk withal; if I would not be reformed (so he termed it) away, away. Then up I stood, for I had kneeled all the while.

Then Sir Richard Southell, who stood by in a window, said to me, Thou wilt not burn in this cause when it cometh to the purpose; I know well that.

Rogers. Sir, I cannot tell, but I trust in my Lord God, yes, lifting up mine eyes unto heaven.

Then my lord of Ely told me much of the queen's majesty's pleasure and meaning, and set out with large words, saying, That she took them that would not receive the pope's supremacy, to be unworthy to have her mercy, &c.

Rogers. I said I would not refuse her mercy; and yet I never offended her in all my life: and that I besought her grace, and all her honours, to be good to me, reserving my conscience.

Divers spake at once. No? quoth they then a great many of them, and especially secretary Bourne, a married priest, and have not offended the law?

Rogers. I said, I had not broken the queen's law, nor yet any point of the law of the realm therein: for I married where it was lawful.

Divers at once. Where was that? said they: thinking that to be unlawful in all places.

Rogers. In Dutchland. And if ye had not here in England made an open law that priests might have had wives, I would never have come home again: for I brought a wife and eight children with me: which thing ye might be sure that I would not have done if the laws of the realm had not permitted it before.

And one said (I could not well perceive who) that there was never a catholic man or country, that ever yet granted that a priest might have a wife.

Rogers. I said, the catholic church never denied marriage to priests, nor yet to any other man; and therewith was I going out of the chamber, the serjeant which brought me thither, having me by the arm.

Then the bishop of Worcester turned his face towards me, and said, that I knew not where that church was or is.

Rogers. I said, yes, that I could tell where it was, but therewith the serjeant went with me out of the door.

This was the very true effect of all that was spoken unto me, and of all that I answered thereunto.

The SECOND EXAMINATION, 28th of Jan. 1555.

BEING asked again by the lord chancellor, what I thought concerning the blessed sacrament, whether I belived in the sacrament to be the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, that was born of the Virgin Mary, and hanged on the cross, really and substantially.

I answered, I had often told him that it was a matter in which I was no meddler, and therefore suspected of my brethren to be of a contrary opinion. Notwithstanding, even as the most part of your doctrine in other points is false, and the defence thereof only by force and cruelty; so in this matter I think it to be as false as the rest. For I cannot understand [really and substantially] to signify otherwise than corporally: but corporally Christ is only in heaven, and so cannot Christ be corporally also in your sacrament. And here I somewhat set out his charity after this sort: My lord, said I, you have dealt with me most cruelly: for you have put me in prison without law, and kept me there now almost a year and a half, for I was almost half a year in my house, where I was obedient to you, God knoweth, and spake with no man. And now have I been a full year in Newgate, at great costs and charges, having a wife and ten children to provide for, and have not received a penny from my livings, which was against the law.

He replied, that Dr. Ridley, who had given them me, was an usurper, and therefore, I was the unjust possessor of them.

Was the king then an usurper, said I, who gave Dr. Ridley the bishopric?

Yes, said he, and began to set out the wrongs that the king had done to the bishop of London, and to himself also. But yet I do misuse my terms, said he, to call the king usurper. But the word was gone out of the abundance of the heart before: and I think that he was not very sorry for it in heart.

I asked him wherefore he put me in prison. He said, because I preached against the queen.

I answered that it was not true; and I would be bound to prove it, and to stand to the trial of the law, that no man should be able to disprove it, and thereupon would set my life. I preached, I confessed, a sermon at the Cross, after the queen came to the Tower: but therein was nothing said against the queen.

But you did read lectures after, said he, against the commandment of the council?

That I did not, said I; let that be proved, and let me die for it.

I might and would have added, if I could have been suffered to speak, that it had been time enough to take away men's livings, and then to have imprisoned them after after that they had offended laws : for they are good citizens that break not laws, and worthy of praise, and not of punishment. But their purpose is to keep men in prison, until they may catch them in their laws, and so kill them. I could and would have added the example of Daniel, who by a crafty devised law was cast into the lion's den. I might also have declared, that I most humbly desired to be set at liberty, sending my wife to him with a supplication, being great with child, and with her eight honest women, or thereabouts, to Richmond, at Christmas was a twelve-month, while I was yet in my house.

I wrote likewise two supplications to him out of Newgate, and sent my wife many times to him. Mr. Gosnold also, that worthy man, who is now departed in the Lord, laboured for me, and so did divers other worthy men also take pains in the matter. These things declare my lord chancellor's antichristian charity, which is, that he hath and doth seek my blood, and the destruction of my poor wife and my ten children.

This is a short sum of the words which were spoken on the 28th of January, in the afternoon, after that Mr. Hooper had been the first, and Mr. Cardmaker the second in examination before me.

Then the clock being, as I guessed, about four, the lord chancellor said, that he and the church must yet use charity with me, and gave me respite till to-morrow, to see whether I would return to the catholic church again, (for so he called his antichristian false church) and repent, and they would receive me to mercy.

I said that I was never out of the true catholic church, nor would be : but into his church would I, by God's grace, never come.

Well, said he, then is our church false and antichristian?

Yes, said I.

And what is the doctrine of the sacrament?

False; and I cast my hands abroad.

Then one said that I was a player. To whom I answered not; for I took no notice of his mock.

Come again, said the lord-chancellor, to-morrow, between nine and ten.

I am ready to come again, whensoever you call.

And thus was I brought up by the sheriffs to the compter in Southwark, Mr. Hooper going before me, and a great multitude of people being present, so that we had much ado to go in the streets. Thus much was done January 28.

The THIRD EXAMINATION, and CONDEMNATION, JANUARY 29, 1555.

THE next day, January 29, we were sent for in the morning about nine o'clock, and by the sheriffs fetched from the compter in Southwark, to St. Mary Overy's: and when Mr. Hooper was condemned, as I understood afterwards, then sent they for me. My lord chancellor said:

Rogers, here thou wast yesterday, and we gave thee liberty to remember thyself last night, whether thou wouldst come to the holy catholic church of Christ again or not. Tell us now what thou hast determined, whether thou wilt be repentant and sorry, and wilt return again and take mercy.

My lord, said I, I remember well what you yesterday said to me, and desire you to give me leave to declare my mind, what I have to say thereunto; and that done, I shall answer to your demanded question.

When I yesterday desired that I might be suffered by the scripture and authority of the first, best, and purest church, to defend my doctrine by writing, (meaning not only of the primacy, but also of all the doctrine that ever I had preached) you answered, that it might not, and ought not to be granted me, for I was a private person; and that the parliament was above the authority of all private persons, and therefore the sentence thereof might not be found faulty and useless by me, being but a private person. Yet, my lord, I am able to shew examples, that one man hath come into a general council, and after the whole had determined and agreed upon an act or article, some one man coming in afterwards, hath by the word of God proved so clearly that the council had erred in decreeing the said article, that he caused the whole council to change and alter their act or article before determined. And of these examples, I am able to shew two. I can also shew the authority of St. Augustine; that when he disputed with an heretic, he would neither himself, nor yet have the heretic to lean unto the determination of two former councils, of which the one made for him, and the other for the heretic that disputed against him; but said, that he would have the scriptures to be their judge, which were common and indifferent for them both, and not proper to either of them.

I could also shew the authority of a learned lawyer, Panormitanus, who saith, That unto a simple lay-man that bringeth the word of God with him, there ought more credit to be given, than to a whole council gathered together. By these things will I prove that I ought not to be denied to speak my mind, and to be heard against a whole parliament, bringing the word of God for me, and the authority of the old church 400 years after Christ, albeit that every man in the parliament had willingly and without respect of fear and favour agreed thereunto, which thing I doubt not a little of; especially seeing the like had been permitted in the old church, even in general councils, yea, and that in one of the chiefest councils that ever was, unto which neither any acts of this parliament, nor yet any of the late general councils of the bishops of Rome ought to be compared. For if Henry VIII. were alive, and should call a parliament, and begin to determine a thing, (and here I would have alledged the example of the act of making the queen a bastard, and of making himself the superior head; but I could not, being interrupted by one, whom God forgive) then would you (pointing to my lord chancellor) and ye, and all pointing to the rest of the bishops) say Amen: yea, and it please your grace, it is meet that it be so enacted.

Here my lord chancellor would suffer me to speak no more; but bade me sit down, mockingly, saying, That I was sent for to be instructed of them, and I would take upon me to be their instructor.

My lord, said I, I stand, and sit not: shall I not be suffered to speak for my life?

Shall we suffer thee to tell a tale, and prate? said he. And with that he stood up, and began to face me, after his old arrogant proud fashion, for he perceived that I was in a way to have touched them somewhat, which he thought to hinder by dashing me out of my tale, and so he did; for I could never be suffered to come to my tale again, no not to one word of it; but he had much like communication with me as he had the day before, and, as his manner is, taunt upon taunt, and check upon check. For in that case, being God's cause, I told him he should not make me afraid to speak.

Lord Chancellor. See what a spirit this fellow hath, saith he, finding fault at mine accustomed earnestness, and hearty manner of speaking.

Rogers. I have a true spirit, agreeing to, and obeying the word of God, and would further have said, that I was never the worse, but the better, to be earnest in a just and true cause, and in my master Christ's matters: but I could not be heard. And at length he proceeded towards his excommunication and condemnation, after that I had told him, that his church of Rome was the church of Antichrist, meaning the false doctrine and tyrannical laws, with the maintenance thereof by cruel persecutions used by the bishops of the said church of which the bishop of Winchester, and the rest of his fellow bishops that are now in England, are the chief members: of laws I mean, said I, and not all men and women which are in the pope's church. Likewise, when I was said to have denied their sacrament (where he made his wonted reverent mention, more to maintain his kingdom thereby, than for the true reverence of Christ's institution; more for his own and his popish generation's sake, than for religion or God's sake; I told him after what order I did speak of it, (for the manner of his speaking was not agreeing to my words, which are before recited in the communication that we had Jan. 28.) wherewith he was not contented, but asked the audience, whether I had not simply denied the sacrament. They would have said, and did what he desired, for most of them were of his own servants on this day. At last I said, I will never deny what I said, that your doctrine of the sacrament is false; but yet I tell you after what order I said it.

To be short, he read my condemnation before me, particularly mentioning therein but two articles: first, that I affirmed the Romish catholic church to be the church of Antichrist; and that I denied the reality of their sacrament. He caused me to be degraded and condemned, and put into the hands of the laity, and so he gave me over into the sheriff's hands, which were much better than his.

After his sentence was read, bishop Gardiner sent Mr. Hooper and me to the Clink, there to remain till night; and when it was dark, they carried us, Mr. Hooper going before with one sheriff, and coming after with the other, with bills and weapons enough, out of the Clink, and led us through the bishop's house, and St. Mary Overy's church-yard, and so into Southwark, and over the bridge in procession to Newgate, through the city. When the bishop had read the condemnation, I petitioned to see and speak to my wife, who was a stranger, and had ten children; but he said she was not my wife. I declared she was, for we had been married 18 years. He still denied it, said I maintained open whoredom, and that I should not see her.

The WRITINGS of the Rev. Mr. ROGERS, while in Prison; containing the Substance of what he intended, might he have been permitted to plead in his own Defence, when examined by the BENCH of POPISH BISHOPS.

DEARLY beloved, ye have heard what was said: now hear what I purposed the night before to have said, if I could have been permitted. Two things I purposed to have touched upon. The one, how it was lawful for a private man to reason and write against a wicked act of parliament, or ungodly council, which the lord chancellor the day before denied me; the other was to prove, that prosperity was not always a token of God's love.

And this I purposed to speak of, because the lord chancellor boasted of himself, that he was delivered forth of prison, as it were by miracle, and preserved of God to restore true religion, and to punish me and such others, whom he termed heretics. Concerning these two points, in this manner I purposed to have proceeded. It is not unknown to you, that king Henry VIII. in his time made his daughter, the queen that now is, a bastard: he pulled down abbeys; and all this he did by the consent of parliament.

King Edward VI. in his time made lawful the marriage of priests, turned the service into English, abolished the idolatrous mass, with all like superstitious trumpery, set up the holy communion, and all by consent of parliament.

The queen that now is, hath repealed the act that made her a bastard; hath brought in the bishop of Rome, and set him in his old authority; beginneth to set up abbeys again; hath made the marriage of priests unlawful; hath turned the English service into Latin again; hath set up mass again, and pulled down the holy communion: and all this is done by consent of parliament.

If the acts of parliament, made in king Henry's time, and in king Edward's, had their foundation upon God's word, whereupon all positive law ought to be grounded: then these which are established in the queen's time, being clean contrary to the others, as they are not warranted by God's word, so are they wicked, and therefore to be both spoken and written against of all men, as well of private as of public persons.

I am an Englishman born, and, God knoweth, do naturally wish well to my country. And, my lord, I have often proved that the things, which I have much feared should come to pass, have indeed followed. I pray God I may fail of my guessing in this behalf.

And as touching your rejoicing, as though God had set you aloft to punish us by miracle, (for so you report and brag openly of yourself) and to minister justice, if we will not receive your holy father's mercy, and thereby do declare your church to be true, and our's false; to that I answer thus: God's works are wonderful, and are not to be comprehended and perceived by man's wisdom, nor by the wit of the most wise and prudent.

But here they will cry out, Lo these men will be still John Baptist, the apostles, and prophets, &c.

I answer, We make not ourselves like unto them, in the singular virtues and gifts of God given unto them; as of doing miracles, and of many other things. The similitude and likeness of them and us consisteth not in all things, but only in this, that is, that we be like them in doctrine, and in the suffering of persecution and infamy for the same.

We have preached their very doctrine, and no other thing: that we are able sufficiently to declare by their writings; and by writing for my part, I have proffered to prove the same, as is often said. And for this cause we suffer the like reproach, shame, and rebuke of the world, and the like persecution, losing of our lives and goods, forsaking (as our master Christ commandeth) father, mother, sister, brethren, wives, children, and all that there is, being assured of a joyful resurrection, and to be crowned in glory with them, according to the infallible promises made unto us in Christ, our only and sufficient mediator, reconciler, priest, and sacrifice, which hath pleased the Father, and quieted and pacified his wrath against our sins, and made us without spot or wrinkle in his sight by imputation, although we, of and in ourselves, are blotted with many filthy sins, which if the great mercy granted in Christ did not put away, by not imputing them unto us of his unspeakable mercy and love to save us, they would have brought us to everlasting damnation: and herein, and in no other, do we affirm ourselves to be like unto our head Christ, and all his apostles, prophets, martyrs, and saints. And herein ought all christian men to be like them, and herein are all true christian men and women like them, every one according to the measure of the faith that God hath dealt unto them and to the diversity of the gifts of the spirit given unto them. But let us now consider, that if it be God's good will and pleasure to give his own beloved heart, that is, his beloved church, and the members thereof, into the hands of their enemies, to chasten, try, and prove them, and to bring them to the true unfeigned acknowledging of their own natural stubbornness, disobedience towards God and his commandments, as touching the love of God and of their brethren or neighbours, and their natural inclination, readiness, and desire to love creatures, to seek their own lusts, pleasures, and things forbidden of God, to obtain a true and earnest repentance, and sorrowfulness thereof, and to make them sigh and cry for the forgiveness of the same, and for the aid of the spirit, daily to mortify and kill the said evil desires and lusts: yea, and often falling into gross outward sins, as did David, Peter, Magdalen, and others, to rise again also, with a mighty crying for mercy, with many other causes. Let us also consider, what he hereafter doth with the same enemies, into whose hands he hath given his tender beloved dearlings to be chastened and tried: whereas he but chasteneth and crosseth them for a small while, according to his good pleasure, sure, as all fathers do with their children, Heb. xii. Prov. iii. he utterly destroyeth; yea, and everlastingly damneth the unrepentant enemies. Let Herod tell me what he got by killing James, and prosecuting Peter and his church. Verily God thought him not worthy to have death ministered unto him by men or angels, or any worthy creatures; but those small, and yet most vile vermin, lice and worms, must consume and kill his beastly, vile, and tyrannous body. Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar, for all their pride and most mighty power, must at length let God's dearlings go freely away out of their land, yea, out of their bands and tyranny. For when it could not be obtained at their hands, that God's congregation might have true mercy ministered unto them, but the counterfeit mercy of these our days, that is to say, extreme cruelty, and even the very, and that most horrible and cruel death, God arose and awoke out of his sleep, and destroyed those enemies of his flock with a mighty hand and stretched-out arm. Pharaoh did with most great and intolerable labours and burdens oppress and bring under the poor Israelites, and yet did the courtiers undoubtedly noise abroad, that the king was merciful unto them, to suffer them to live in the land, and to set them to work, that they might get them their livings. If he could thrust them out of his land, whither should they go, like a sort of vagabonds and runagates? This title and name of mercy would that tyrant have, and so did his flattering false courtiers spread his vain praise abroad. Have not we the like example now-a-days? O that I had now time to write certain things pertaining to our Winchester's mercy! How merciful he hath been to me and my good brethren, I will not speak of, neither yet unto the duke of Suffolk's most innocent daughter, and to her as innocent husband. For although their fathers were faulty, yet had their youth and lack of experience deserved a pardon by all true merciful men's judgements. O that I had time to paint out this matter aright! but there are many alive that can do it much better when I am dead. Pharaoh had his plagues; and his most flourishing land was, in consequence of his counterfeit mercy, which was indeed right cruelty and tyranny, utterly destroyed. And think you that bloody butcherly bishop of Winchester, and his most bloody brethren shall escape? Or that England shall for their offences, and especially for the maintenance of their idolatry, and wilful following of them, not abide as great brunts? yes undoubtedly.

After Mr. Rogers had been long and straitly imprisoned, and lodged in Newgate among thieves, often examined, and very uncharitably treated, and at length unjustly and most cruelly condemned by Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester: on the fourth of February, being Monday in the morning, he was suddenly warned by the keeper of Newgate's wife, to prepare himself for the fire; who being then sound asleep, could scarce be awaked. At length being raised and awaked, and bid to make haste. Then, said he, if it be so, I need not tie my points; and so was had down, first to bishop Bonner to be degraded; which being done, he craved of Bonner but one petition; and Bonner asking what that should be? Mr. Rogers replied, that he might speak a few words with his wife before his burning. But that could not be obtained of him. Then, said he, you declare what your charity is; and so he was brought into Smithfield by Mr. Chester and Mr. Woodroffe, then sheriffs of London, there to be burnt; at the place of execution, the sheriff asked him, if he would recant his opinions? To this he answered, "That what he had preached, he would seal with his blood." Then, said the sheriff, thou art an heretic. To which Mr. Rogers replied, "That shall be known at the day of judgement." Well, said Mr. Woodroffe, I will never pray for thee. But I will pray for you, said Mr. Rogers; and so he was brought the same day, Monday, February 4th, by the sheriffs towards Smithfield, saying the Psalm Miserere by the way, all the people wonderfully rejoicing at his constancy, with great praises and thanks to God for the same. And there in the presence of Mr. Rochester, comptroller of the queen's household, sir Richard Southwell, both the sheriffs, and a great number of people, he was burnt to ashes, washing his hands in the flame as he was burning. A little before his burning, his pardon was brought if he would have recanted; but he utterly refused it. He was the first martyr, of all the blessed company that suffered in queen Mary's time, that gave the first adventure upon the fire. His wife and children, being eleven in number, ten able to go, and one sucking at her breast, met him by the way as he went towards Smithfield: this sorrowful sight of his own flesh and blood could nothing move him, but he constantly and cheerfully took his death with wonderful patience, in the defence of the gospel of Christ.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, who was burned at COVENTRY, February 8th, 1555.

AFTER queen Mary, by public proclamation, in the first year of her reign, had prohibited the sincere preaching of God's holy word, several pious ministers who had the cure and charge of souls committed to them, did notwithstanding, according to their duty, feed their flock faithfully, not as preachers authorized by public authority, (as the godly order of the realm was in the happy days of blessed king Edward) but as the private pastors of particular flocks, among whom Laurence Saunders was one, a man of good parentage. His bringing up was in learning from his youth, in places meet for that purpose, as in the school of Eaton. From whence (according to the manner there used) he was chosen to go to the king's college in Cambridge, where he continued a scholar three whole years, and profited in knowledge and learning very much for that time: shortly after, he did forsake the university, and went to his parents, upon whose advice he minded to become a merchant, for that his mother, who was a gentlewoman of good estimation, being left a widow, and having a good portion for him among his other brethren, she thought to set him up wealthily, and so he coming up to London, was bound apprentice with a merchant named sir William Chester (who afterwards chanced to be sheriff of London the same year that Saunders was burnt at Coventry.)

It happened that the master, being a good man, and hearing his prentice thus in his secret prayers inwardly to mourn by himself, called him unto him, to know what the cause was of his solitariness and lamentations: who then perceiving him not to fancy that kind of life, (for so Saunders declared unto him) and perceiving also his whole purpose to be bent to the study of books, and spiritual contemplation, like a good man, directed his letters unto his friends, and giving him his indentures, set him free. Thus Mr. Laurence Saunders being ravished with the love of learning, and especially with the reading of God's word, tarried not long in the traffic of merchandize, but shortly returned to Cambridge again to his study, where he began to add to the knowledge of the Latin, the study of the Greek tongue, wherein he profited very much in a little time; therewith also he joined the study of the Hebrew. Then he gave himself wholly to the study of the holy scripture, to furnish himself for the office of a preacher.

In the beginning of king Edward's reign, when God's true religion was introduced, after licence obtained, he began to preach, and was so well liked of them who then had authority, that they had appointed him to read a divinity lecture in the college at Forthingham, where, by doctrine and life, he edified the pious, drew many ignorant to the true knowledge of God, and stopped the mouths of adversaries. He married about that time, and in the married state led a life unblameable before all men. The college of Fotheringham being dissolved, he was placed to be a reader in the minister at Litchfield: where he so behaved himself in teaching and living, that his very adversaries did give a full report as well of his learning, as of his piety. After a certain space, he departed from Litchfield to a benefice in Leicestershire, called Church-langton, where he keeping residence taught diligently, and kept a liberal house. From thence he was orderly called to take a benefice in the city of London, named Alhallows in Bread-street. Then he was minded to give over his cure in the country; and therefore after he had taken possession of his benefice in London, he departed from thence into the country, clearly to discharge himself thereof.

Sunday, October 15th, in the forenoon, he made a sermon in his parish, treating on that place which St. Paul writeth to the Corinthians: "I have coupled you to one man, that ye should make yourselves a chaste virgin unto Christ. But I fear lest it come to pass, that as the serpent beguiled Eve, even so your wits should be corrupt from the singleness which ye had toward Christ." He recited the sum of that true christian doctrine, through which they were coupled to Christ, to receive of him free justification through faith in his blood. The papistical doctrine he compared to the serpent's deceiving: and lest they should be deceived by it, he made a comparison between the voice of God, and the voice of the popish serpent; descending to more particular declaration thereof, as it were to let them plainly see the difference that is between the order of the church service, set forth by king Edward in the English tongue, and comparing it with the popish service then used in the Latin tongue.

The first he said was good, because it was according to the word of God, 1 Cor. xiv. and the order of the primitive church. The other, he said, was evil, and though in that evil, be intermingled some good Latin words, yet was it but as a little honey or milk mingled with a great deal of poison. In the afternoon he was ready in his church to have given another exhortation to his people. But the bishop of London interrupted him by sending an officer for him.

Mr. Saunders continued in prison one year and three months. In all which space he sent several letters to divers men; as one to Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer; another to his wife, and also to others, certifying them both of the public calamity of the time, and also of his private afflictions, and of his sundry conflicts with his adversaries; and in writing to his friend, he speaketh of Dr. Weston's conferring with him in the prison.

LETTER I.

Which the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS sent to BISHOP GARDINER, exculpating himself from CERTAIN CHARGES laid against him.

TOUCHING the cause of my imprisonment, I doubt whether I have broken any law or proclamation. In my doctrine I did not, forasmuch as at that time it was permitted by the proclamation to use, according to our consciences, such service as was then established. My doctrine was then agreeable unto my conscience and the same service then used. The act which I did (meaning his public teaching of God's word in his own parish, called Alhallows in Bread-street, in the city of London) was such as being indifferently weighed, sounded to no breaking of the proclamation, or at least no wilful breaking of it, forasmuch as I caused no bell to be rung, neither occupied I any place in the pulpit, after the order of sermons or lectures. But be it that I did break the proclamation, this long time of continuance in prison may be thought to be more than a sufficient punishment for such a fault.

Touching the charging of me with my religion, I say with St. Paul; this I confess, "That after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fore-fathers; believing all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and have hope towards God," &c. Acts xxiv. And herein study I to have always a clear conscience towards God and towards men; so that God I call to witness, I have a conscience. And this my conscience is not grounded upon vain fantasy, but upon the infallible verity of God's word, with the witnessing of his chosen church agreeable unto the same.

It is an easy thing for them which take Christ for their true pastor, and be the very sheep of his pasture, to discern the voice of their true shepherd, from the voice of wolves, hirelings, and strangers: forasmuch as Christ saith, "My sheep hear my voice," John x. yea, and thereby they shall have the gift to know the right voice of the true shepherd, and so to follow him, and to avoid the contrary, as he also saith, "The sheep follow the shepherd, for they know his voice: a stranger they will not follow, but will fly from him, for they know not the voice of a stranger." Such inward inspiration doth the Holy Ghost put into the children of God, being indeed taught of God, but otherwise unable to understand the true way of their salvation. And although the wolf (as Christ saith) cometh in sheeps cloathing, yet by their fruits you shall know them. That the Romish religion is ravening and wolfish, is apparent in three principal points.

First, it robbeth God of his due and only honour.

Secondly, It taketh away the true comfort of conscience, in obscuring, or rather burying of Christ and his office of salvation.

Thirdly, It spoileth God of his true worship and service in spirit and truth, appointed in his commandments, and driveth men unto that inconvenience, against which Christ with the prophet Isaiah doth speak sharply; "This people honoureth me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me. They worship me in vain, teaching the doctrines and precepts of men." And in another place, "Ye cast aside the commandments of God, to maintain your own traditions."

LETTER II.

From the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS to his WIFE.

GRACE, mercy, and peace in Christ our Lord, intirely beloved wife, even as unto my own soul and body, so do I daily in my hearty prayer wish unto you; for I do daily, twice at least, in this sort remember you. And I do not doubt, dear wife, but that both I and you, as we are written in the book of life, so we shall together enjoy the same everlastingly, through the grace and mercy of God our dear Father, in his Son our Christ. And for this present life, let us wholly appoint ourselves to the will of our good God, to glorify him either by life or by death; and even that same merciful Lord make us worthy to honour him either way as pleaseth him, Amen. I am chearful, I thank my God and my Christ, in whom and through whom I shall (I know) be able to fight a good fight, and finish a good course, and then receive the crown, which is laid up in store for me, and all the true soldiers of Christ. Wherefore, wife, let us, in the name of our God, fight lustily to overcome the flesh, the devil, and the world. What our harness and weapons be in this kind of fight, look in the sixth chapter unto the Ephesians, and pray, pray, pray. I would that you make no suit for me in any wise. Thank you know whom, for her most sweet and comfortable putting me in remembrance of my journey whither I am passing. God send us all good speed, and a joyful meeting. I have too few such friends to further me in that journey, which is indeed the greatest friendship. The blessing of God be with you all, Amen.

A prisoner in the Lord. L. SAUNDERS.

The

The constancy of this faithful servant of Christ, even unto the death, is sufficiently manifested and declared by his valiant contest with those two powerful enemies, Antichrist and death: to neither of these did he give place, and in the end got the victory over them both.

When Mr. Saunders was in prison, an order was sent to the keeper, that no person should speak with him; but his wife coming to the prison-gate with her young child in her arms, to visit her husband, the keeper, though he durst not, on account of his charge, suffer her to come into the prison, yet he took the infant out of her arms, and brought him unto his father. Mr. Saunders, seeing the child, said, that he rejoiced more to have such a boy, than he should if two thousand pounds were given him. And to the standers-by, who praised the goodliness of the child, he said, "What man fearing God, would not lose his life, rather than by prolonging it, he should adjudge this boy to be a bastard, his wife a whore, and himself a whoremonger? Yea, if there were no other cause, for which a man of my estate should lose his life, yet who would not give it, to vouch this child to be legitimate, and his marriage to be lawful and holy?"

After this good and faithful martyr had been kept in prison one year and a quarter, the bishops at length called him, as they did his fellow-prisoners, openly to be examined; and the purport of his examination, as written by himself, here followeth.

The EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. SAUNDERS before the QUEEN'S COUNCIL; GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, the then CHANCELLOR, and other BISHOPS, being present.

In this examination the Lord Chancellor thus spake:

Lord Chancellor.

IT is not unknown that you have been a prisoner for such abominable heresies and false doctrine as have been sown by you; and now it is thought good that mercy be shewed to such as seek for it. Wherefore if now you will shew yourself conformable, and come home again, mercy is ready. We must say that we have fallen in manner all: but now we are risen again, and returned to the catholic church; you must rise with us, and come home unto it. Give us forthwith a direct answer.

Saunders. My lord, and my lords all, may it please your honours to give me leave to answer with deliberation.

Chancellor. Leave off your painting and pride of speech: for such is the fashion of you all, to please yourselves in your glorious words. Answer yes, or no.

Saunders. My lord, it is no time for me now to paint. And as for pride, there is no great cause why it should be in me; my learning I confess to be but small; and as for riches or worldly wealth, I have none at all. Notwithstanding, it standeth me in hand to answer your demand circumspectly, considering that one of these two extreme perils is like to fall upon me, the losing of a good conscience, or the losing of this my body and life. And I tell you truth, I love both life and liberty, if I could enjoy them without the hurt of my conscience.

Chancellor. Conscience? you have none at all, but pride and arrogancy, dividing yourselves by singularity from the church.

Saunders. The Lord is the knower of all men's consciences. And where your lordship layeth to my charge this dividing myself from the church, (as you do mean, and is now among you concluded upon, and I do understand) I do assure you that I live in the faith wherein I have been brought up since I was fourteen years of age, being taught that the power of the bishop of Rome is but usurped, with many other abuses springing thereof. Yes, this I have received even at your hands that are here present, as a thing agreed upon by the catholic church and public authority.

Chancellor. But have you received by consent and authority all your heresies of the blessed sacrament of the altar?

Saunders. My lord, it is less offence to cut off an arm, hand, or joint of man, than to cut off the head. For the man may live though he doth lose an arm, hand, or joint; but he cannot without his head. Now you, all the whole sort of you, had agreed to cut off the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, whom now you will have to be the head of the church again.

Bishop of London. And if it please your lordship, I have his hand against the blessed sacrament: How say you to that?

Saunders. What I have written, that I have written, and further I will not accuse myself. Nothing have you to burden me withal, for breaking of your laws since they were in force.

Chancellor. Well, you are obstinate, and refuse liberty.

Saunders. My lord, I may not buy liberty at such a price: but I beseech your honours to be means to the queen's majesty for such a pardon for us, that we may live and keep our consciences unclogged; and we shall live as most obedient subjects. Otherwise, I must say for myself, that by God's grace I will abide the utmost extremity that man may do against me, rather than act against my conscience.

Chancellor. Ah firrah, you will live as you like. The Donatists did desire to live in singularity; but indeed they were not fit to live on earth: no more are you, and that you shall understand within these seven days; and therefore away with him.

Saunders. Welcome it, whatsoever the will of God shall be, either life or death. And I tell you truly, I have learned to die. But I exhort you to beware of shedding of innocent blood. Truly it will cry. The Spirit of God rest upon all your honours, Amen. This is the sum and form of my first examination. Pray, &c.

This examination being ended, the officers led him out of the place, and stayed until the rest of his fellow-prisoners were likewise examined; that they might have them altogether to prison. Laurence Saunders, standing among the officers, seeing there a great multitude of people, spoke freely, warning them all of that which by their falling from Christ to Antichrist they deserved; and therefore exhorting them by repentance to rise again, and to embrace Christ with stronger faith, to confess him to the end, in the defiance of Antichrist, sin, death, and the devil: so should they retain the Lord's favour and blessing.

Having been excommunicated and delivered over to the secular power, he was brought by the sheriffs of London to the Compter, a prisoner in his own parish of Breadstreet, whereat he rejoiced greatly, both because he found there a fellow-prisoner, Mr. Cardmaker, with whom he had much christian and comfortable discourse; and because out of prison, as before out of a pulpit, he might have an opportunity of preaching to his parishioners.

On the fourth day of February, Bonner, bishop of London, came to the prison to degrade him: which when he had done, Mr. Saunders said to him, "I thank God I am none of your church."

The day following in the morning, the sheriff of London delivered him to certain of the queen's guard, which were appointed to carry him to the city of Coventry, there to be burned.

When they were arrived at Coventry, a poor shoemaker, who used to serve him with shoes, came to him, and said, O my good master, God strengthen and comfort you. Good shoemaker, (Mr. Saunders replied) and I desire thee to pray for me, for I am the most unfit man for this high office, that ever was appointed to it: but my gracious God and dear Father is able to make me strong enough. The same night he was put into the common jail among other prisoners, where he slept little, but spent the night in prayer, and instructing of others.

The next day, being the eighth of February, he was led to the place of execution in the park, without the city, going in an old gown and a shirt, bare-footed, and oftentimes fell flat on the ground, and prayed. When he was come nigh to the place, the officer appointed to see the execution done, said to Mr. Saunders, that he was one of them who marred the queen's realm with false doctrine and heresy, wherefore thou hast deserved death: but yet if thou wilt revoke thine heresies, the queen hath pardoned thee: if not, yonder fire is prepared for thee. To whom Mr. Saunders answered, It is not I, nor my fellow-preachers of God's truth, that have hurt the queen's realm, but it is yourself, and such as you are, which have always resisted God's holy word; it is you who have and do marr the queen's realm. I do hold no heresies, but the doctrine of God, the blessed gospel of Christ; that hold I, that believe I, that have I taught, and that will I never revoke. With that, this tormentor cried, Away with him. And away from him went Mr. Saunders, with a cheerful courage, towards the fire. He fell to the ground, and prayed: he rose up again and took the stake to which he should be chained, in his arms, and kissed it, saying, Welcome the Cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life: and being fastened to the stake, and fire put to him, full sweetly he slept in the Lord.

Mr. Saunders often told his friends, that many would suffer, if ever Mary ascended throne. He knew the temper of that princess, and probably it was that which made him expect sufferings.

Some modern unbelievers have said, that the martyrs had good hearts, but confused heads; and to this they have added, that they were madmen. Supposing we should turn the argument against the deists, by begging the question, and asked them, whether Socrates, whom they so much glory in, was a madman, for asserting that there was but one divine being? For this crime (if it was one) Socrates suffered death, by being condemned to drink the hemlock. Now let any man read the Phædon of Plato, and then let him answer whether Socrates did not die an enthusiast.

It is also said, they had good hearts, but their heads were not clear. Let us admit the assertion to be true, and let us consider the circumstances from which it took its rise. The whole truth will appear from a careful attention to the following things:

First, many of these men had, from motives of conscience, left that system of superstition in which they had been educated, and embraced the truth perhaps in a more violent manner than was consistent with that calmness of reflection, which must, at all times, conduct those to the knowledge of the truth, who would willingly obey the gospel.

Secondly, It may be observed, that however desirable it may be to have a head well informed, it is much better to have a good heart. A man may have much knowledge, and at the same time be destitute of piety. There have been many learned men who were strangers to religion; there have been sufferers for the truth, who knew but little of what is commonly called human knowledge.

Lastly, Let them consider the circumstances of the times: light breaking out from darkness is apt to bewilder the rational faculties; and men are frequently led into extravagancies, without any intention to deceive. Indeed, the martyrs knew they had nothing to expect but sufferings; and therefore they thought they might avow their sentiments.

This may serve to shew, that all the objections which, from time to time, have been brought against the martyrs, are extremely insignificant, and not worthy of a serious answer.

We shall here relate the conversation which passed between Mr. Saunders, in the beginning of his troubles, and Dr. Pendleton.

A CONVERSATION between the Rev. Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS and Dr. PENDLETON.

AT the change of religion in this realm, and the beginning of queen Mary's reign, doctor Pendleton and Mr. Saunders, men known to the world, not only to be learned, but also earnest preachers of God's word in the time of blessed king Edward, met together in the country, where by occasion they were at that time, and as the case required (by reason of the persecution that was then at hand) fell to debate what was best for them to do in so dangerous a season. Whereunto Mr. Saunders, whether through very frailty of his weak flesh, that was loth to taste the bitter cup, though his spirit was ready thereunto: or whether it were upon the mistrust of his own strength, that he might receive the greater power from above; or whether it were not for any one of the said causes alone, but for both together, or such like; seemed so fearful and feeble-spirited, that he shewed himself in appearance, like either to fall quite from God and his word, which he had taught, or at least, to fly the land, rather than stick to his profession. Whereas Dr. Pendleton took upon him to comfort Mr. Saunders all that he might (who, on the contrary side, appeared not so big of body, but as bold in courage, nor so earnest before in the pulpit, but as ready now to seal the same with his blood), admonishing him, as he could do it very well, not to forsake cowardly his flock when he had most need to defend them from the wolf; neither having put his hand to God's plough, to start now aside, and give it over; nor yet (what is worst of all) having once forsaken Antichrist, to fall either himself, or suffer others by his example to return to their vomit again.

After which, and such like persuasions, bidding him be of good comfort, and to take a good heart unto him; What, man! (said he) there is a great deal more cause in me to be afraid than in you: forasmuch as you see, I carry a greater mass of flesh upon my back than you do; and being so laden with a heavier lump of the vile carcase, ought therefore of nature to be more frail than you: and yet, said he, I will see the last drop of this grease of mine melted away, and the last particle of this flesh consumed to ashes, before I will forsake God and his truth. Whereunto the other answered but little, wishing that God would give him more strength than he then felt in himself, acknowledging his own weakness; but consented notwithstanding, though it were somewhat faintly, to join with him in the profession of the gospel, and so to go up to London, and set forth the same; whereupon they gave each other their hands.

Now when they were come to London, behold, what a great change was there between these two persons! The poor, feeble, and faint-hearted Saunders, by the goodness of Almighty God, taking heart of grace to him, seeking the same in humility, boldly and stoutly confirmed his flock out of the pulpit, where his charge lay, mightily beating down Antichrist, and zealously preaching Christ his master, for which he afterwards suffered most willingly, as is before declared. Whereas, on the other side, Dr. Pendleton the proud (who, as it appeared by the sequel, had been more stout in words than constant in deeds, and a greater boaster than a good warrior) no sooner came to London, than he changed his mind, and played the apostate, preaching, instead of sound doctrine, nothing almost but errors and lies, advancing Antichrist, and overthrowing Christ with all his might: so his former boldness came to nothing, unless it were a contrary key, becoming of a faithful pastor, a false runagate; and of a true preacher, a sworn enemy to God's everlasting testament; to the great offence of his brethren, the hurt of his flock, and the utter undoing, without God's greater mercy, of his own soul. Wherein is especially to be considered the deep and marvellous judgement of God, who as he can and doth make strong whom he pleaseth, when he seeth his time, and most commonly such as appear most feeble; so on the other hand, he throweth down others, seem they ever so stout, stand they ever so much in their own conceits. Wherefore let him that standeth take heed he fall not; and let us pray continually to Almighty God, though we have faith, that he will help and increase our faith, that in him it may be made strong, which of itself is so weak, that it is soon overthrown.

While this good man was confined in prison, he did not pass all his time in unfruitful idleness, but still from time time to time did visit his friends, (as is said) and especially his wife, with many letters; particularly bishop Ferrar, Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Philpot, Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, and other friends.

C H A P. II.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of WORCESTER and GLOUCESTER, who was Burned for maintaining and defending the TRUE RELIGION, February 9th, 1555.

JOHAN HOOPER, student and graduate in the university of Oxford, after the study of the sciences, wherein he had abundantly profited and proceeded, was stirred with fervent desire to the love and knowledge of the scriptures. Growing more and more, by God's grace, in ripeness and spiritual understanding, and shewing withal some sparkles of his fervent spirit, being then about the beginning of the six articles, in the time of king Henry VIII. fell quickly into displeasure, and hatred of certain doctors in Oxford, who by and by began to stir coals against him, whereby, and especially by the procurement of Dr. Smith, he was compelled to quit the university; and removing from thence, was retained in the house of Sir Thomas Arundel, and there was his steward, till the time that Sir Thomas Arundel, having intelligence of his opinions and religion, which he in no case did favour, and yet exceedingly favouring the person and conditions of the man, found the means to send him with a message to the bishop of Winchester, writing his letter privily to the bishop, by conference or learning to do some good unto him, but in any case requiring him to send home his servant to him again.

Winchester, after long conference with Mr. Hooper, four or five days together, at length perceiving, that neither he could do that good which he thought to him, nor that he would take any good at his hand, according to Mr. Arundel's request, he sent home his servant again, right-well commending his learning and wit, but yet bearing in his breast a grudge against Mr. Hooper.

Not long after this, as malice is always working mischief, intelligence was given to Mr. Hooper to provide for himself, for danger was working against him: whereupon Mr. Hooper left Mr. Arundel's house, and borrowing a horse of a certain friend (whose life he had saved a little before from the gallows), took his journey to the sea-side to go to France, sending back the horse again by one, who indeed did not deliver him to the owner. Mr. Hooper being at Paris, tarried there not long, but in a short time returned into England again, and was retained by Mr. Sentlow, till the time that he was again molested and sought for; whereby he was compelled (under the pretence of being captain of a ship going to Ireland) to take to the seas, and so escaped (although not without extreme peril of drowning) through France, to the higher parts of Germany. Where, commencing acquaintance with learned men, he was by them friendly and lovingly entertained, both at Basil, and especially at Zurich, by Mr. Bullinger, being his singular friend. Where also he married his wife, who was a Burgonian, and applied very studiously to the Hebrew tongue.

At length, when God saw it good to stay the bloody time of the six articles, and to give us king Edward to reign over this realm, with some peace and rest unto the church, amongst many other English exiles, who then repaired homeward, Mr. Hooper also, moved in conscience, thought not to absent himself, but seeing such a time and occasion, offered to help forward the Lord's work, to the uttermost of his ability. And coming to Mr. Bullinger, and other of his acquaintance in Zurich, (as duty required) to give them thanks for their singular kindness and humanity towards him many ways declared, with like humanity again proposed to take his leave of them at his departing, and so he did. Unto whom Mr. Bullinger (who had always a special favour to Mr. Hooper) spake on this wise: "Mr. Hooper, (saith he) although we are sorry to part with your company for our own cause, yet much greater cause have we to rejoice, both for your sake, and especially for the cause of Christ's true religion, that you shall now return out of long banishment into your native country again, where not only you may enjoy your own private liberty, but also the cause and state of Christ's church by you may fare the better, as we doubt not but it will. Another cause moreover why we rejoice with you and for you, is this; that you shall remove not only out of exile into liberty, but you shall leave here a barren, a sour, and an unpleasant country, rude and savage, and shall go into a land flowing with milk and honey, replenished with all pleasure and fertility. Notwithstanding, with this our rejoicing one fear and care we have, lest you being absent, and so far distant from us, or else coming to such abundance of wealth and felicity, in your new welfare and plenty of all things, and in your flourishing honours, where you shall come peradventure to be a bishop, and where you shall find so many new friends, you will forget us your old acquaintance and well-wishers. Nevertheless, howsoever you shall forget and shake us off, yet this persuade yourself, that we will not forget our old friend and fellow Mr. Hooper. And if you will please not to forget us, then I pray you let us hear from you."

Whereunto Mr. Hooper answering again, first gave to Mr. Bullinger and the rest hearty thanks, for that their singular good will and undeserved affection, appearing not only now, but at all times towards him; declaring moreover, that as the principal cause of his removing to his country was the matter of religion; so touching the unpleasantness and barrenness of that country of their's, there was no cause therein why he could not find in his heart to continue his life there, as soon as in any place in the world, and rather than in his own native country, if there were nothing else in his conscience that moved him so to do. And as touching the forgetting of his old friends, although, said he, the remembrance of a man's country naturally doth delight him, neither could he deny but God had blessed his country of England with many great commodities; yet neither the nature of country, nor pleasure of commodities, nor newness of friends should ever induce him to the oblivion of such friends and benefactors, whom he was so intirely bound unto; and therefore you shall be sure, said he, from time to time to hear from me, and I will write unto you how it goeth with me. But the last news of all I shall not be able to write; for there, said he, (taking Mr. Bullinger by the hand) where I shall take most pains, there shall you hear of me to be burned to ashes; and that shall be the last news, which I shall not be able to write unto you, but you shall hear of me, &c.

When Mr. Hooper had taken his farewell of Mr. Bullinger, and his friends in Zurich, he repaired again into England in the reign of king Edward the sixth, and coming to London, used continually to preach, most times twice, at least once every day.

In his sermons, according to his accustomed manner, he corrected sin, and sharply inveighed against the iniquity of the world, and corrupt abuses of the church.

His life was so pure and good, that no kind of slander (although (although some went about to revile him) could fasten any fault upon him. He was of body strong, his health whole and sound, his wit very pregnant, his invincible patience able to sustain whatsoever sinister fortune and adversity could do. He was constant of judgment, spare of diet, sparer of words, and sparest of time. In house-keeping very liberal, and sometimes more free than his living would extend unto.

Once an honest citizen, having in himself a certain conflict of conscience, came to his door for counsel, but being abashed at his austere behaviour, durst not come in, but departed, seeking remedy for his troubled mind at other men's hands, which he afterwards, by the help of Almighty God, did find and obtain. Therefore, in my judgment, such as are appointed and made governors over the flock of Christ, to teach and instruct them, ought so to frame their life, manners, countenance, and external behaviour, as neither to shew themselves too familiar and light, whereby to be brought into contempt; nor on the other side again, that they appear more lofty and rigorous, than appertaineth to the edifying of the simple flock of Christ.

After he had practised himself in this popular and common kind of preaching; at length, and that not without the great profit of many, he was called to preach before the king's majesty, and soon after made bishop of Gloucester by the king's commandment. In that office he continued two years, and behaved himself so well, that his very enemies (except it were for his good doings and sharp correcting of sin) could find no fault with him, and after that he was made bishop of Worcester.

But I cannot tell what sinister and unlucky contention concerning the ordering and consecration of bishops, and of their apparel, with other such like trifles, began to disturb the good beginning of this bishop. For notwithstanding that godly reformation of religion that begun in the church of England, besides other ceremonies more ambitious than profitable, or tending to edification, they used to wear such garment and apparel as the popish bishops were wont to do: first a chymere, and under that a white rochet, then a mathematical cap with four angles, dividing the whole world into four parts. These trifles tending more to superstition than otherwise, as he could never abide, so in no wise could he be persuaded to wear them. For this cause he made supplication to the king's majesty, most humbly desiring his highness, either to discharge him of the bishopric, or else to dispense with him for such ceremonial orders. Whose petition the king granted immediately, writing his letter to the archbishop after this purport.

KING EDWARD VI. his LETTER to the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, and other BISHOPS.

RIGHT reverend father, and right trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas we, by the advice of our council, have called and chosen our right well-beloved and well worthy, Mr. John Hooper, professor of divinity, to be our bishop of Gloucester, as well for his great knowledge, deep judgment, and long study both in the scriptures, and prophane learning, as also for his good discretion, ready utterance, and honest life for that kind of vocation: to the intent all our loving subjects, which are in his said charge, and elsewhere, might by his sound and true doctrine learn the better their duty towards God, their obedience towards us, and love towards their neighbours; from consecrating of whom we understand you do stay, because he would have you omit and let pass certain rites and ceremonies offensive to his conscience, whereby ye think ye should fall in premunire of laws; we have thought good, by the advice aforesaid, to dispense and discharge you of all manner of dangers, penalties and forfeitures, you shall run and be in any manner of way, by omitting any of the same. And these our letters shall be your sufficient warrant and discharge therefore.

Given under our signet at our Castle of Windsor, the fifth of August, the 4th year of our reign.

A LETTER from the EARL of WARWICK, to the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, to this Effect, that Mr. HOOPER might not be burdened with the Oath, used commonly in the Consecration of Bishops.

AFTER my most hearty commendations to your grace, these may be to desire the same, that in such reasonable things, wherein this bearer, my lord elect of Gloucester, craveth to be borne withal at your hands, you would vouchsafe to shew him your grace's favour, the rather at this my instance: which thing partly I have taken in hand by the king's majesty's own motion. The matter is weighed by his highness, none other but that your grace may easily condescend unto. The principal cause is, that you would not charge this said bearer with an oath burdensome to his conscience. And so for lack of time I commit your grace to the tuition of Almighty God. From Westminster, July 23, 1550.

Your grace's most assured loving friend,
J. WARWICK.

But notwithstanding this grant of the king, and also the earl's letter aforesaid, the bishops still stood earnestly in the defence of the aforesaid ceremonies, saying, it was but a small matter, and that the fault was in the abuse of the things, and not in the things themselves; adding moreover, that he ought not to be so stubborn in so light a matter, and that his wilfulness therein was not to be suffered.

To be short, whilst both parties thus contended about this matter more than reason would, in the mean time occasion was given, as to the true christians to lament, so to the adversaries to rejoice. In conclusion, this theological contention came to this end, that, the bishops having the upper hand, Mr. Hooper was fain to agree to this condition, that sometimes he should in his sermons shew himself apparelled as the other bishops were. Wherefore being appointed to preach before the king, as a new player in a strange apparel, he cometh forth on the stage. His upper garment was a long scarlet chymere down to the foot, and under that a white linen rochet, that covered all his shoulders. Upon his head he had a geometrical, that is, a four-squared cap, albeit that his head was round. What cause of shame the strangeness hereof was that day to that good preacher, every man may easily judge. But this private injury and reproach, in respect of the public profit of the church, which he only sought, he bore and suffered patiently.

It now remaineth to record the godly reconciliation of these good men, in time of prosecution, as appeareth from the following letter, sent from bishop Ridley to the bishop of Gloucester, of which, as it was written in Latin, the following is a faithful translation into English.

A LETTER of RECONCILIATION from BISHOP RIDLEY, to JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER.

TO my dear brother, and reverend fellow elder in Christ, John Hooper, grace and peace. My dearly beloved brother and fellow elder, whom I reverence in the Lord, pardon me, I beseech you, that hitherto since your captivity and mine, I have not saluted you by my letters: whereas I do indeed confess, I have received from you (such was your gentleness) two letters at sundry times: but yet at such time as I could not be suffered suffered to write to you again; or if I might, yet was I in doubt how my letters might safely come into your hands. But now, my dear brother, so much as I understand by your works, which I have but superficially seen, that we thoroughly agree and wholly consent together in those things which are the grounds and substantial points of our religion, against which the world so furiously rageth in these our days, howsoever in time past by certain bye-matters and circumstances of religion, your wisdom and my simplicity (I grant) hath a little jarred, each of us following the abundance of his own sense and judgment; now, I say, be you assured, that even with my whole heart, God is my witness, in the bowels of Christ I love you in the truth and for the truth's sake, which abideth in us, and, as I am persuaded, shall, by the grace of God, abide in us for evermore.

And because the world, as I perceive, brother, ceaseth not to play his pageant, and busily conspireth against Christ our Saviour, with all possible force and power, exalting high things against the knowledge of God; let us join hands together in Christ, and, if we cannot overthrow, yet, to our power, and as much as in us lieth, let us shake these high altitudes, not with carnal, but with spiritual weapons: and withal, brother, let us prepare ourselves to the day of our dissolution, by the which, after the short time of this bodily affliction, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall triumph together with him in eternal glory.

I pray you, brother, salute in my name your reverend fellow prisoner, and venerable father, D. C. by whom, since the first day that I heard of his most godly and fatherly constancy, in confessing the truth of the gospel, I have conceived great consolation and joy in the Lord. For the integrity and uprightness of that man, his gravity and innocency, all England, I think, hath known long ago. Blessed be God therefore, which in such abundance of iniquity and decay of all godliness, hath given unto us, in this reverend old age, such a witness for the truth of his gospel. Miserable and hard-hearted is he, whom the godliness and constant confession of so worthy, so grave, and innocent a man, will not move to acknowledge and confess the truth of God.

I do not now, brother, require you to write any thing to me again: for I stand much in fear, lest your letters should be intercepted before they can come to my hands. Nevertheless know you, that it shall be to my great joy of your constancy and fortitude in the Lord's quarrel. And albeit I have not hitherto written unto you, yet have I twice, as I could, sent unto you my mind touching the matter which in your letters you required to know. Neither can I yet, brother, be otherwise persuaded: I see methinks so many perils, whereby I am earnestly moved to counsel you not to hasten the publishing of your works, especially under the title of your own name. For I fear greatly, lest by this occasion both your mouth should be stopped hereafter, and all things taken away from the rest of the prisoners, whereby otherwise, if it so please God, they may be able to do good to many. Farewel in the Lord, my most dear brother; and if there be any more in prison with you for Christ's sake, I beseech you, as you may, salute them in my name. To whose prayers I do most humbly and heartily commend myself and my fellow-prisoners and captives in the Lord, and yet once again, and for ever in Christ, my most dear brother, farewel.

N. RIDLEY.

After this discord, and not a little vexation about vestures, at length, Mr. Hooper entering into his diocese, did there employ his time which the Lord lent him under king Edward's reign, with such diligence, as may be a spectacle to all bishops who shall ever hereafter succeed him, not only in that place, but in whatsoever diocese through the whole realm of England: so careful was he in his cure, that he left neither pains untaken, nor ways unsought, how to train up the flock of Christ in the true word of salvation, continually labouring in the same. Other men are commonly wont, for lucre or promotion's sake, to aspire to bishoprics, some hunting for them, and some purchasing or buying them, as men use to purchase lordships; and when they have them, are loth to leave them, and thereupon also loth to commit that thing by worldly laws, whereby to lose them.

To this sort of men, Dr. Hooper was quite contrary, who abhorred nothing more than gain, labouring always to save and preserve the souls of his flock; who, being bishop of two dioceses, so ruled and guided either of them, and both together, as though he had in charge but one family. No father in his household, no gardener in his garden, nor husbandmen in his vineyard, was more or better occupied, than he in his diocese amongst his flock, going about his towns and villages in teaching and preaching to the people there. The time that he had to spare from preaching, he bestowed either in hearing public causes, or else in private study, prayer, and visiting of schools: with his continual doctrine he adjoined due and discreet correction, not so much severe to any, as to those who for abundance of riches and wealthy state, thought they might do what they pleased. And doubtless he spared no kind of people, but was indifferent to all, as well rich as poor, to the great shame of many men in these days; whereof we see so many addicted to the pleasing of the great and rich, that in the mean time they have no regard to the meaner sort whom Christ hath bought as dearly as the other. But to return to Dr. Hooper, whose life was such, that to the church and all churchmen, it might be a light and example, to the rest a perpetual lesson and sermon. Finally, how virtuous and good a bishop he was, you may conceive and know evidently by this, that even as he was hated by none but of them which were evil, yet the worst of them all could not reprove his life in any one particular. Nor was this good bishop less exemplary in his private, than in his public character. At home, in his domestic concerns, he exhibited an example of a worthy prelate's life; for he bestowed the most part of his care upon the public flock and congregation of Christ, for which also he spent his blood: yet nevertheless there was nothing wanting in him, to bring up his own children in learning and good manners; inasmuch that it is difficult to say, whether he deserved more praise for his fatherly usage at home, or his public conduct abroad. For everywhere he kept one religion in one uniform doctrine and integrity. So that if you entered into the bishop's palace, you would suppose yourself to have entered into some church or temple. In every corner thereof there was the beauty of virtue, good example, honest conversation, and reading of the holy scriptures. There was not to be seen in his house any courtly rioting or idleness; no pomp, no dishonest word, no swearing, could there be heard. As to the revenues of both his bishoprics, if any thing surmounted thereof, he saved nothing, but bestowed it in hospitality. Twice I was (says Mr. Fox) in his house at Worcester, where, in his common-hall, I saw a table spread with good store of meat, and beset full of beggars and poor people: and I asking his servants what this meant, they told me, that every day their lord and master's manner was, to have at dinner a certain number of the poor of the said city by course, who were served by four at a mess, with wholesome meats: and when they were served, (being before examined by him or his deputies, of the Lord's prayer, the articles of their faith, and ten commandments) than he himself sat down to dinner, and not before. In this manner Dr. Hooper executed the office of a most careful and vigilant pastor, for the space of two years and more, so long as the state of religion in king Edward's time did safely flourish and take place: and would to God, that all other bishops would use the like diligence, care, and observance in their function. After this, in the reign of queen Mary, religion being subverted and changed, this good bishop was one of the first who was sent for by a pursuivant to be at London; and that for two causes:

First, To answer to Dr. Heath, then appointed bishop of that diocese, who was deprived thereof in king Edward's days, for being a papist.

Secondly, To render an account to Dr. Bonner, bishop of London, for that he in king Edward's time was one of his accusers, in that he shewed himself not conformable to such ordinances as were prescribed to him by the king and his council, openly at St. Paul's Cross. And although the said bishop Hooper was not ignorant of the evils that should happen towards him, (for he was admonished by certain of his friends to get away, and shift for himself) yet he would not prevent them, but tarried still, saying, "Once did I flee, and take me to my feet; but now, because I am called to this place and vocation, I am thoroughly persuaded to tarry, and to live and die with my sheep."

When at the day of his appearance, the first of September, he was come to London, before he could see Dr. Heath and Dr. Bonner, he was intercepted, and commanded, violently, against his will, to appear before the queen and her council, to answer certain bonds and obligations, wherein he said he was bound unto her. And when he came before them, Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, received him very opprobriously, railing and rating of him, and accused him of his religion. He again freely and boldly answered, and cleared himself. But he was commanded to ward, (it being declared unto him at his departure, that the cause of his imprisonment was only for certain sums of money, for which he was indebted to the queen, and not for religion). This, how false and untrue it was, shall in it's place more plainly appear.

The next year, being March 19, 1554, he was called again to appear before Winchester, and others of the queen's commissioners: where, what for the bishop, and what for the unruly multitude, when he could not be permitted to plead his cause, he was deprived of his bishoprics.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of BISHOP HOOPER, before the BISHOPS of WINCHESTER, LONDON, DURHAM, LANDAFF, and CHICHESTER, who were appointed Commissioners.

AT Dr. Hooper's coming in, the lord chancellor asked whether he was married.

Hooper. Yes, my lord, and will not be unmarried, till death unmarry me.

Durham. That is matter enough to deprive you.

Hooper. It is not, my lord, except you do against the law.

The matter concerning marriage was no more talked of then for some time: but as well the commissioners, such as stood by, began to make such outcries, and laughed, and used such gestures as were unseemly for the place, and for such a matter. Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, called bishop Hooper hypocrite, with vehement words, and scornful countenance. Bishop Tonstall called him beast; so did Smith, one of the clerks of the council, and several others that stood by. At length the bishop of Winchester said, that all men might live chaste who would, and brought in this text, "There are those that have become eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven," Matt. xix. 12.

Bishop Hooper said, that text proved not that all men could live chaste, but such to whom it was given; and read the context that goeth before. But there was a clamour and cry, mocking and scorning, with calling him beast, that the text could not be examined. Then bishop Hooper said, that it did appear by the old canons, that marriage was not forbidden unto priests, and named the decrees. But the bishop of Winchester sent for another part, namely, the Clementines, or the Extravagants. But bishop Hooper said, that book was not it which he named.

The bishop of Winchester replied, You shall not have any other, until you be judged by this. And then began such a noise, tumult, and speaking together of a great many that favoured not the cause, that nothing was done or spoke orderly or charitably. Afterwards, judge Morgan began to rail at bishop Hooper a long time, with many opprobrious and foul words of his doing at Gloucester, in punishing of men, and said, there was never such a tyrant as he was. After that, Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, said, that the council of Ancyra, which was before the council of Nice, was against the marriage of priests.

Upon which the lord chancellor cried out, and many with him, that bishop Hooper had never read the councils.

Yes, my lord, said he, and my lord of Chichester, Dr. Day knoweth, that the great council of Nice, by the means of one Paphnutius, decreed, That no minister should be separated from his wife. But such clamours and cries were used, that the council of Nice was not attended to.

After long brutish talk, Tonstall, bishop of Durham, asked bishop Hooper, whether he believed the corporal presence of the sacrament? Who said plainly, that there was none such, neither did he believe any such thing.

Then the bishop of Durham would have read out of a book, (what book it was I cannot tell) but there was such a noise and confused talk on every side, that he did not read. Then the bishop of Winchester asked Dr. Hooper, What authority moved him not to believe the corporal presence? He said, the authority of God's word, and alledged this text, "Whom heaven must hold until the latter day." But the bishop of Winchester would have made that text to serve nothing for his purpose, and said, he might be in heaven, and in the sacrament also.

Dr. Hooper would have opened the text, but all those that stood next about the bishop prevented his speaking with clamours and cries, so that Dr. Hooper was not permitted to say any more against the bishop. Whereupon they bade the notaries write, That he was married, and said, that he would not go from his wife; and that he believed not the corporal presence in the sacrament; wherefore he was worthy to be deprived of his bishopric.

This is the truth of the matter (as far as I can remember) of the confused and troublesome conversation between them, and except hasty and uncharitable words, it is the whole of their discourse at that time.

THE first of September, 1553, I was committed unto the Fleet, from Richmond, to have the liberty of the prison; and within six days after I paid five pounds sterling to the warden for fees, for my liberty; who immediately upon payment thereof, complained unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and so I was committed to close prison one quarter of a year in the Tower-chamber of the Fleet, and used extremely ill. Then by the means of a good gentlewoman, I had liberty to come down to dinner and supper, not suffered to speak with any of my friends; but as soon as dinner and supper was done, to repair to my chamber again. Notwithstanding, whilst I came down thus to dinner and supper, the warden and his wife picked quarrels with me, and complained untruly of me to their great friend the bishop of Winchester.

After one quarter of a year and somewhat more, Babington the warden, and his wife, fell out with me for the wicked mas: and thereupon the warden resorted to the bishop of Winchester, and obtained to put me into the wards, where I have continued a long time, having nothing appointed to me for my bed, but a little pad of straw and a rotten covering, with a tick and a few feathers therein, the chamber being vile and stinking, until by God's means good people sent me bedding to lie on. On one side of which prison, is the sink and filth of the house, and on the other the town ditch, so that the stench of the house hath infected me with sundry diseases.

During

During which time I have been sick, and the doors, bars, hasps, and chains being all closed, and made fast upon me, I have mourned, called and cried for help; but the warden when he hath known me many times ready to die, and when the poor men of the wards have called to help me, hath commanded the doors to be kept fast, and charged that none of his men should come at me, saying, Let him alone, it were a good riddance of him. And, amongst many other times, he did thus October 18, 1553, as many can witness.

I paid always like a baron to the said warden, as well in fees, as for my board, which was twenty shillings a week, besides my man's table, until I was wrongfully deprived of my bishoprics, and since that time, I have paid him as the best gentleman doth in his house; yet hath he used me worse, and more vilely, than the veriest slave that ever came to the hall commons, (common side of the prison.)

The said warden hath also imprisoned my man, William Downton, and stripped him out of his clothes to search for letters, and could find none, but only a little remembrance of good people's names, that gave me their alms to relieve me in prison; and to undo them also, the warden delivered the same bill unto the said Stephen Gardiner, God's enemy and mine.

I have suffered imprisonment almost eighteen months, my goods, livings, friends, and comfort taken from me; the queen owing me, by just account, fourscore pounds or more. She hath put me in prison, and giveth nothing to keep me, neither is there suffered any one to come at me, whereby I might have relief. I am with a wicked man and woman, so that I see no remedy (saving God's help) but I shall be cast away in prison before I come to judgment. But I commit my just cause to God, whose will be done, whether it be by life or death.

SECOND EXAMINATION of Dr. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER, before the intolerant GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER.

THE twenty-second of January, 1555, Babington, the warden of the Fleet, was commanded to bring Mr. Hooper before the bishop of Winchester, with other bishops and commissioners at the said Winchester's house, at St. Mary Overy's: where the bishop of Winchester, in the name of himself and the rest, moved Mr. Hooper earnestly to forsake the evil and corrupt doctrine (as he termed it) preached in the days of king Edward the sixth, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, and to acknowledge the pope's holiness to be head of the same church, according to the determination of the whole parliament, promising, that as he himself, with other his brethren, had received the pope's blessing, and the queen's mercy; even so mercy was ready to be shewed to him and others, if he would arise with them, and condescend to the pope's holiness.

Bishop Hooper answered, That forasmuch as the pope taught doctrines altogether contrary to those of Christ, he was not worthy to be accounted as a member of his church, much less to be head thereof; wherefore he would in no wise condescend to any such usurped jurisdiction, neither esteemed he the church, whereof they call him head; to be the catholic church of Christ: for the church only heareth the voice of her spouse Christ, and flieeth strangers. Howbeit (saith he) if in any point to me unknown, I have offended the queen's majesty, I shall most humbly submit myself to her mercy, if mercy may be had with safety of conscience, and without the displeasure of God.

Answer was made, that the queen would shew no mercy to the pope's enemies. Whereupon Babington was commanded to carry him to the Fleet again: who did so, and shifted him from his former chamber into another, near to the warden's own chamber, where he remained six days: and in the mean time his former chamber was searched by Dr. Martin and others, for writings and books, which Dr. Hooper was thought to have wrote, but none was found.

THIRD EXAMINATION of BISHOP HOOPER, before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and other COMMISSIONERS.

JANUARY 28th, the bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners sat in judgment at St. Mary Overy's, where bishop Hooper appeared before them in the afternoon, and there, after much reasoning and disputation, he was commanded aside, till the Rev. Mr. Rogers (who was then come) had been likewise examined. Examinations being ended, the two sheriffs of London were commanded, about four o'clock, to carry them to the Compter in Southwark, there to remain till to-morrow at nine o'clock, to see whether they would relent and come home again to the catholic church. So bishop Hooper went before, with one of the sheriffs, and Mr. Rogers came after with the other; and being out of the church door, Dr. Hooper looked back, and stayed a little till Mr. Rogers drew near, unto whom he said, Come brother Rogers, must we two take this matter first in hand, and begin to fry these faggots? Yes, sir, said Mr. Rogers, by God's grace. Doubt not, said Dr. Hooper, but God will give strength. So going forwards, there was such a press of people in the streets, who rejoiced at their constancy, that they had much ado to pass.

By the way, the sheriff said to the bishop, I wonder you was so hasty and quick with my lord chancellor, and did use no more patience: he answered, Mr. Sheriff, I was nothing at all impatient, although I was earnest in my master's cause, and it standeth me so in hand, for it goeth upon life and death, not the life and death of this world only, but also of the world to come. Then they were committed to the keeper of the Compter, and appointed to several chambers, with command that they should not be suffered to speak one with another, neither any other permitted to come to them that night.

Upon the next day following, January 29, at the hour appointed, they were brought again by the sheriffs before the said bishop and commissioners in the church, where they were the day before. And after long and earnest talk, when they perceived that bishop Hooper would by no means condescend unto them, they condemned him to be degraded, and read unto him his condemnation. That done, the Rev. Mr. Rogers was brought before them, and treated in like manner; and both were delivered to the secular power, the two sheriffs of London, who were ordered to carry them to the Clink, a prison not far from the bishop of Winchester's house, and there to remain till night.

When it was dark, bishop Hooper was led by one of the sheriffs, with many bills and weapons, through the bishop of Winchester's house, and over London-bridge, through the city to Newgate, and by the way some of the serjeants were sent before, to put out the costermongers' candles, who used to set with lights in the streets: either fearing, that the people would have made some attempt to have him taken away from them by force, if they had seen him go to that prison; or else, being burdened with an evil conscience, they thought darkness to be most fit season for such a business.

But notwithstanding this device, the people having some foreknowledge of his coming, many of them came forth to their doors with lights, and saluted him, praising God for his constancy in the true doctrine which he had taught them, and desiring God to strengthen him in the same to the end. The bishop required the people to make their earnest prayers to God for him, and so went through Cheapside to the place appointed, and was delivered as close prisoner to the keeper of Newgate, where he remained six days, nobody being permitted to come to him, or talk with him, saving his keepers, and such as should be appointed thereto.

During this time, Bonner, bishop of London, and others at his appointment, as Fecknam, Chedsey, Harpsfield, &c. resorted several times unto him, to try if, if, by any means, they could persuade him to relent, and become a member of their antichristian church. All the ways they could devise, they attempted. For, besides the disputations and allegation of testimonies of the scriptures, and of ancient writers wrested to a wrong sense, according to their accustomed manner; they used also all outward gentleness and significations of friendship, with many great promises of worldly wealth; not omitting also most grievous threatenings, if with gentleness, they could not prevail; but they found him always the same man, steadfast and immovable. When they perceived that they could by no means reclaim him to their purpose, with such persuasions and offers as they used for his conversion, then went they by false rumours and reports of recantations (for it is well known that they and their servants did first spread it abroad) to bring him, and the doctrine of Christ which he professed, in discredit with the people. Which being thus spread abroad, and believed by some of the weaker sort, by reason of the often resort of the bishop of London and others, it increased more, and at last came to bishop Hooper's ears, who was greatly grieved thereat, that the people should give credit to such false rumours, having so simple a ground; as may appear by the following letter, which he wrote upon that occasion.

A L E T T E R

From BISHOP HOOPER, concerning certain false Rumours spread abroad of his RECANTATION.

THE grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all them, who unfeignedly look for the coming of our Saviour Christ. Amen.

Dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, and my fellow-prisoners for the cause of God's gospel, I do much rejoice and give thanks unto God for your constancy and perseverance in affliction, unto whom I with continuance unto the end. And as I do rejoice in your faith and constancy in afflictions that be in prison; even so do I mourn and lament to hear of our dear brethren that yet have not felt such dangers for God's truth, as we have and do feel, and are daily like to suffer more, yea, the very extreme and vile death of the fire: yet such is the report abroad, (as I am credibly informed) that I John Hooper, a condemned man for the cause of Christ, should now after sentence of death, (being prisoner in Newgate, and looking daily for execution) recant and abjure that which heretofore I have preached. And that talk ariseth from this, that the bishop of London and his chaplains resort unto me. Doubtless, if our brethren were as godly as I could wish them, they would think, that in case I did refuse to talk with them, they might have just occasion to say, that I was unlearned, and durst not speak with learned men, or else proud, and disdained to speak with them. Therefore to avoid just suspicion of both, I have, and do daily speak with them when they come, not doubting but they report that I am neither proud nor unlearned. And I would wish all men to do as I do in this point. For I fear not their arguments, neither is death terrible unto me, praying you to make true report of the same, as occasion shall serve; and that I am more confirmed in the truth which I have heretofore preached, by their coming.

Therefore, you that may send to the weak brethren, pray them that they trouble me not with such reports of recantations as they do. For I have hitherto left all things of the world, and suffered great pains and imprisonment, and I thank God I am as ready to suffer death as a mortal man can be. It were better for them to pray for us, than to credit or report such rumours that are untrue.

I have taught the truth with my tongue, and with my pen heretofore, and hereafter shortly shall confirm the same by God's grace with my blood. From Newgate, February 2, 1555.

Your brother in Christ, JOHN HOOPER.

Monday morning, Bonner, bishop of London, came to Newgate, and degraded bishop Hooper; the sentence of his degradation here followeth.

The DEGRADATION of BISHOP HOOPER.

IN the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Amen. Whereas by a definitive sentence from the reverend father in Christ, Stephen, by divine permission, lord bishop of Winchester, against you John Hooper, presbyter of his jurisdiction, on account of heresy and offence notoriously committed within his diocese of Winchester, and of late justly and legally proved; it plainly appears to us, Edmund, bishop of London, that you the aforesaid John Hooper have been and still continue to be an open, obstinate, and incorrigible heretic; and it also appears by the aforesaid sentence that you have been declared and pronounced an heretic of this sort, and have likewise incurred the sentence of the greater excommunication; and it plainly and fully appears that you are to be deposed and degraded from your order, and for these your demerits are to be delivered to the secular power, according to the tenor of the aforesaid sentence, to which we refer ourselves in this affair. We therefore, the aforesaid Edmund, bishop of London, as it concerns us and the university to do our alternate endeavours, in whose diocese you John Hooper have committed the same heresy then, and oftentimes both before and after; for these, I say, and the aforesaid considerations, and that we may execute the aforesaid sentence in a better and more efficacious manner, have thought fit to proceed to the actual degradation of you the aforesaid John Hooper, (your crime and justice so requiring) and so we do really proceed according to the direction of the law, and the laudable custom of former times, that we may rightly and legally deliver you to the secular power, who are unwilling to continue in the pale of the church; and that this ought to be done, we do, by these presents, declare and pronounce in this our sentence.

The same Monday, at night, February 4, his keeper gave the bishop a hint that he should be sent to Gloucester to suffer death, whereat he rejoiced very much, lifting up his eyes and hands unto heaven, and praising God that he saw it good to send him among the people, over whom he was pastor, there to confirm with his death the truth which he had before taught them; not doubting but the Lord would give him strength to perform the same to his glory: and immediately he sent to his servant's house for his boots, spurs, and cloak, that he might be in readiness to ride when he should be called.

The next day following, about four o'clock in the morning, before day, the keeper with others, came to him and searched him, and the bed wherein he lay, to see if he had written any thing, and then he was led by the sheriffs of London, and their officers, from Newgate to a place appointed, not far from St. Dunstan's church in Fleet-street, where six of the queen's guard were appointed to receive him, to carry him to Gloucester, there to be delivered unto the sheriff, who with the lord Shandois, Mr. Wick, and other commissioners, were appointed to see execution done. Which guard brought him to the Angel, where he brake his fast with them, eating his meat at that time more liberal than he had used to do a good while before. About break of day he leaped cheerfully on horseback, without help, having a hood upon his head, under his hat, that he should not be known, and so he took his journey joyfully towards Gloucester; and by the way the guard inquired of him, where he was accustomed to bait or lodge, but always carried him to another inn.

On the Thursday following, he came to a town in his diocese called Cirencester, fifteen miles from Gloucester, about eleven o'clock, and there dined at a woman's house who had always hated the truth, and spoken all the evil she could of bishop Hooper. This woman, perceiving the cause of his coming, shewed him all the friendship she could, and lamented his case with tears, confessing that she before had often reported, that if he were put to the trial, he would not stand to his doctrine.

After dinner he rode forwards, and came to Gloucester about five o'clock, and a mile without the town was much people assembled, who cried and lamented his his state; insomuch that one of the guard rode post into the town, to require aid of the mayor and sheriffs, fearing lest he should have been taken from them. The officers and their retinue repaired to the gate with weapons, and commanded the people to keep their houses, &c. but there was no man that once gave any signification of a rescue or violence. He lodged at one Ingram's house in Gloucester, and that night (as he had done all the way) he did eat his meat quietly, and slept his first sleep soundly, as it was reported by the guard and others. After his first sleep, he continued in prayer until morning; and all the day, except a little time at his meals, and when conversing with such as the guard permitted to speak to him, he spent in prayer.

Sir Anthony Kingston, at one time Dr. Hooper's good friend, was appointed by the queen's letters to attend at his execution. As soon as he saw the bishop, he burst into tears. At first sight, Dr. Hooper did not know him; the knight therefore addressing the bishop, said, "Why, my lord, do not you know me, an old friend of your's, Anthony Kingston?"

Yes, sir Anthony Kingston, I do know you well, and am glad to see you in health, and do praise God for the same.

But I am sorry to see you, my lord, in this case; for as I understand, you are come hither to die. But, alas! consider that life is sweet, and death is bitter. Therefore seeing life may be had, desire to live; for life hereafter may do good.

Indeed it is true, Mr. Kingston, I am come hither to end this life, and to suffer death here, because I will not gainsay the truth that I have heretofore taught amongst you in this diocese, and elsewhere; and I thank you for your friendly counsel, although it be not so friendly as I could have wished it.

After these, and many other words, they took leave of each other, Mr. Kingston with bitter tears, Dr. Hooper with tears also trickling down his cheeks. At his departure, bishop Hooper told him, that all the troubles he had sustained in prison, had not caused him to utter so much sorrow.

The same night the bishop was committed by the guard (their commission being then expired) into the custody of the sheriffs of Gloucester, Jenkins and Bond, who, with the mayor and aldermen, repaired to Dr. Hooper's lodging, and at the first meeting saluted him, and took him by the hand. Unto whom Dr. Hooper spake in this manner. "Mr. Mayor, I give most hearty thanks to you, and to the rest of your brethren, that you have vouchsafed to take me; a prisoner, and a condemned man, by the hand; whereby, to my rejoicing, it is very apparent that your old love and friendship towards me is not altogether extinguished: and I trust also that all the things I have taught you in times past, are not utterly forgotten; when I was your bishop and pastor. For which most true and sincere doctrine, because I will not now account it falsehood and heresy, as many other men do, I am sent hither, (as I am sure you know) by the queen's commands, to die; and am come where I taught it, to confirm it with my blood. And now, Mess. Sheriffs, I understand by these good men, and my good friends (meaning the guard) at whose hands I have found so much favour and gentleness on the road hither, as a prisoner could reasonably require; (for which also I most heartily thank them) that I am committed to your custody, as unto them that must see me brought to-morrow to the place of execution. My request therefore to you shall be only, that there may be a quick fire, shortly to make an end; and in the mean time I will be as obedient unto you, as you yourselves could wish. If you think I do amiss in any thing, hold up your finger, and I have done. For I am not come hither as one forced or compelled to die; for it is well known, I might have had my life with worldly gain; but as one willing to offer and give my life for the truth, rather than to consent to the wicked papistical religion of the bishop of Rome, received and set forth by the magistrates in England, to God's high displeasure and dishonour; and I trust, by God's grace, to-morrow to die a faithful subject of God, and a true obedient subject to the queen."

These, and such-like words in effect, bishop Hooper used to the mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen, whereat many mourned and lamented. Notwithstanding, the two sheriffs went aside to consult, and were determined to have lodged him in the common gaol of the town, called Northgate, if the guard had not made earnest intercession for him; who declared at large, how quietly, mildly, and patiently, he had behaved himself in the way, adding thereto, that any child might keep him well enough; and that they themselves would rather take pains to watch with him, than that he should be sent to the common prison. So it was determined at length he should still remain in Robert Ingram's house; and the sheriffs and the serjeants and other officers did appoint to watch with him that night themselves. His desire was, that he might go to bed that night betime, saying, that he had many things to remember: and so he did at five o'clock, and slept one sleep soundly; and spent the rest of the night in prayer. After he had got up in the morning, he desired that no man should be suffered to come into the chamber, that he might be solitary till the hour of execution.

About eight o'clock came sir John Bridges, lord Shandois, with a great band of men, sir Anthony Kingston, sir Edmund Bridges, and other commissioners appointed to see execution done. At nine, Dr. Hooper prepared himself to be in readiness, for the time was at hand. Immediately he was brought down from his chamber by the sheriffs, who were accompanied with bills, and other weapons. When he saw the multitude of weapons, he spake to the sheriffs on this wise; Mess. Sheriffs (said he) I am no traitor, neither needed you to have made such a business to bring me to the place where I must suffer: for if you had suffered me, I would have gone alone to the stake, and troubled none of you. Afterwards looking upon the multitude of people that were assembled, being by estimation to the number of 7000, (for it was market day, and many came to see his behaviour), he spake unto those that were about him, saying, "Alas! why are these people assembled and come together? Peradventure they think to hear something of me now, as they have in times past: but alas! speech is prohibited me. Notwithstanding, the cause of my death is well known unto them: When I was appointed here to be their pastor, I preached unto them true and sincere doctrine, and that out of the word of God: because I will not now account the same to be heresy and untruth; this kind of death is prepared for me." Having said this, he went forward, led between the two sheriffs, (as it were a lamb to the place of slaughter) in a gown of his host's, his hat upon his head, and a staff in his hand to stay himself withal; for the grief of the Sciatica, which he had taken in prison, caused him somewhat to halt. All the way, being straitly charged not to speak, he could not be perceived once to open his mouth; but beholding the people, who mourned bitterly for him, he would sometimes lift up his eyes towards heaven, and look very cheerfully upon such as he knew; and he was never known; during the time of his being amongst them, to look with so cheerful and ruddy a countenance as he did at that present. When he came to the place appointed where he should die, he smilingly beheld the stake and preparation made for him, which was near unto the great elm-tree over-against the college of priests, where he was wont to preach. The place round about the houses, and the boughs of the tree were filled with spectators; and in the chamber over the college-gate stood the priests of the college. Then he kneeled down (forasmuch as he could not be suffered to speak unto the people) to prayer, and beckoned six or seven times unto one whom he well knew, that he might hear his prayer, and report faithfully the same. When this person came to the bishop, he (pouring tears upon his shoulders and in his bosom) continued his prayer for half an hour; which prayer was drawn from the whole creed.

During prayer, a box was brought and laid before him upon a stool, with his pardon (or at least-wise it was feigned to be his pardon) from the queen; if he would turn. At the sight whereof he cried, If you love my soul, away with it. The box being taken away, the lord Shandois said, Seeing there is no remedy, dispatch him quickly. Dr. Hooper replied, Good my lord, I trust your lordship will give me leave to make an end of my prayers.

Prayer being done, bishop Hooper prepared himself for the stake, and put off his host's gown, and delivered it to the sheriffs, requiring them to see it restored unto the owner, and put off the rest of his apparel, unto his doublet and hose, wherein he would have burned. But the sheriffs would not permit that, (such was their greediness) unto whose pleasures (good man!) he very obediently submitted himself; and his doublet, hose, and waistcoat were taken off. Then being in his shirt, he took a point from his hose himself, and trussed his shirt between his legs, where he had a pound of gunpowder in a bladder, and under each arm the like quantity delivered him by the guard. So desiring the people to say the Lord's prayer with him, and to pray for him, (who performed it with tears, during the time of his pains) he went up to the stake; when he was at it, three irons, made to bind him thereto, were brought; one for his neck, another for his middle, and the third for his legs. But he refusing them, said, "You have no need thus to trouble yourselves. I doubt not, God will give me strength sufficient to abide the extremity of the fire, without bands: notwithstanding, suspecting the frailty and weakness of the flesh, but having assured confidence in God's strength, I am content you do as you shall think good."

Then the hoop of iron prepared for his middle was brought, which being made somewhat too short, (for his belly was swollen with imprisonment) he shrank and put in his belly with his hand, until it was fastened: but when they offered to have bound his neck and legs with the other two hoops of iron, he refused them, and would have none, saying, I am well assured I shall not trouble you.

Thus being ready, he looked upon the people, of whom he might be well seen, (for he was both tall, and stood also upon a high stool) and beheld round about him, that in every corner there was nothing to be seen but weeping and sorrowful people. Then lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, he prayed in silence. By and by, he that was appointed to make the fire, came to him, and did ask him forgiveness. Of whom he asked why he should forgive him, saying, that he never knew any offence he had committed against him. O sir, said the man, I am appointed to make the fire. Therein, said Mr. Hooper, thou dost nothing to offend me: God forgive thee thy sins, and do thine office I pray thee. Then the reeds were cast up, and he received two bundles of them in his own hands, embraced them, kissed them, put one of them under each arm, and shewed with his hand how the rest should be bestowed, and pointed to the place where any were wanting.

Command was now given that the fire should be kindled. But because there were not fewer green faggots, than two horses could carry, it kindled not speedily, and was sometime before it took the reeds upon the faggots. At length it burned about him, but the wind having full strength in that place (and being a lowring cold morning) it blew the flame from him, so that he was in a manner little more than touched by the fire.

The third fire was kindled within a while after, which was more extreme than the other two: and then the bladders of gunpowder brake, which did him little good, they were so placed, and the wind had such power. In this fire he prayed with a loud voice, Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus have mercy upon me! Lord Jesus receive my spirit! And these were the last words he was heard to utter. But when he was black in the mouth, and his tongue swollen, that he could not speak, yet his lips went till they were shrunk to the gums: and he knocked his breast with his hands, until one of his arms fell off, and then knocked still with the other, while the fat, water, and blood dropped out at his finger ends, until by renewing of the fire his strength was gone, and his hand did cleave fast in knocking to the iron upon his breast. So immediately, bowing forwards, he yielded up his spirit.

Thus was he three quarters of an hour or more in the fire; even as a lamb, patiently bearing the extremity thereof, neither moving forwards, backwards, nor to any side; but having his nether parts burned, and his bowels fallen out, he died as quietly as a child in his bed; and he now reigneth as a blessed martyr in the joys of heaven, prepared for the faithful in Christ before the foundations of the world: for whose constancy all christians are bound to praise God.

A POEM by CONRAD GEISNER, on the Martyrdom of Dr. JOHN HOOPER, BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and WORCESTER.

HOOPER, unvanquish'd by Rome's cruelties,
(Confessing Christ in his last moments) dies:
Whilst flames his body rack, his soul doth fly,
Inflam'd with faith, to immortality:
His constancy on earth has raised his name,
And gave him entrance at the gates of fame,
Which neither storms, nor the cold north-winds blast,
Nor all-devouring time shall ever waste:
For he whom God protects shall sure attain
That happiness, which worldlings seek in vain.
Example take by him, you who profess
Christ's holy doctrines; ne'er the world cares
In hopes of riches; or if fortune frown
With inauspicious looks, be not cast down;
For man ne'er saw, nor can his heart conceive,
What God bestows on them that righteous live.

A LETTER

From the BISHOP to his Wife ANNE HOOPER, whereby all the true Members of Christ may take Comfort and Courage to suffer Affliction for the Profession of his holy Gospel.

OUR Saviour Jesus Christ (dearly beloved, an my godly wife) in St. Matthew's gospel said to his disciples, that it was necessary scandals should come: and that they could not be avoided, he perceived as well by the condition of those that should perish and be lost for ever in the world to come, as also by their affliction that should be saved. For he saw the greatest part of the people would contemn and neglect whatsoever true doctrine or godly ways should be shewed unto them, or else receive and use it as they thought good to serve their pleasures, without any profit to their souls, nor caring whether they lived as they were commanded by God's word or not; but would think it sufficient to be counted to have the name of a christian man, with such works and fruits of his profession and christianity, as his fathers and elders, after their custom and manner, esteem and take to be good fruits and faithful works, and will not try them by the word of God. Those men, by the just judgment of God, be delivered unto the craft and subtlety of the devil, that they may be kept by one scandalous stumbling-block or other, that they never come unto Christ, who came to save those that were lost, as you may see how God delivereth wicked men up unto their own lusts, to do one mischief after another, careless, until they come into a reprobate mind, that forgetteth itself, and cannot know what is expedient to be done, or to be left undone, because they close their eyes, and will not see the light of God's word offered unto them: and being thus blinded, they prefer their own vanities before the truth of God's word. Where such corrupt minds be, there are also corrupt notions and choice of God's honour; so that the mind of man taketh falsehood for truth, superstition for true religion, death for life, damnation for salvation, hell for heaven, and persecution of Christ's members for God's service and honour. And as these men wilfully and voluntarily reject the word of God; even so God so most justly delivereth them up to blindness of mind and hardness of heart, that they cannot understand, nor yet consent to any thing that God would have preached, and set forth to his glory, after his own will and word: wherefore they hate it mortally, and of all things most detest God's holy word. And as the devil hath entered into their hearts, that they themselves cannot nor will come to Christ, to be instructed by his holy word; even so can they not abide any other man to be a christian man, and to lead his life after the word of God, but hate him, persecute him, rob him, imprison him, yea, and kill him, whether he be man or woman, if God suffer it. And so much are these wicked men blinded, that they regard no law, whether it be of God's or man's, but persecute such as never offended, yea, do evil to those that have prayed daily for them, and wish them God's grace.

In their blind fury they have no respect to nature. For the brother persecuteth the brother, and the father the son; and most dear friends, in devilish slander and offence, are become most mortal enemies. And no marvel; for when they have chosen sundry masters, the one the devil, the other God, the one shall agree with the other, as God and the devil agree between themselves. For this cause (that the more part of the world doth use to serve the devil under cloaked hypocrisy of God's title) Christ said, it is expedient and necessary, that scandals should come, and many may be advised to keep the little babes of Christ from the heavenly Father. But Christ saith, Wo be unto him by whom the offence cometh: yet is there no remedy, man being of such corruption and hatred towards God, but that the evil shall be deceived, and persecute the good; and the good shall understand the truth, and suffer persecution for it unto the world's end. For as he that was born after the flesh, persecuted in times past him that was born after the spirit, even so it is now. Therefore forasmuch as we live in this life amongst so many great perils and dangers, we must be well assured by God's word how to bear them, and how patiently to take them as they be sent to us from God. We must also assure ourselves, that there is no other remedy for christians in the time of trouble, than Christ himself hath appointed us. In St. Luke he giveth us this commandment, Ye shall possess your lives in patience, saith he. In which words he giveth us both commandment what to do, and also great comfort and consolation in all troubles.

That the spirit of man may feel these considerations, the giver of them, the heavenly Father, must be prayed unto for the merits of Christ's passion: for it is not the nature of man that can be contented, until it be regenerated and possessed with God's spirit, to bear patiently the troubles of the mind, or of the body. When the mind and heart of a man seeth on every side sorrow and heaviness, and the worldly eye beholding nothing but such things as be troubles, and wholly bent to rob the poor of what he hath, and also to take from him his life: except the man weigh these brittle and uncertain treasures that be taken from him, with the riches of the life to come, and this life of the body, with the life in Christ's blood, and so for the love and certainty of the heavenly joys condemn all things present, doubtless he shall never be able to bear the loss of goods, life, or any other thing of this world.

Therefore St. Paul giveth a godly and necessary lesson to all men in this short and transitory life, and therein sheweth how a man may best bear the iniquities and troubles of this world "If ye be risen again with Christ: (saith he) seek the things which are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father." Wherefore, the christian man's faith must be always upon the resurrection of Christ, when he is in trouble; and in that glorious resurrection he shall not only see continual and perpetual joys and consolation, but also the victory and triumph over all persecution, trouble, sin, death, hell, the devil, and other tyrants and persecutors of Christ, and of Christ's people, the tears and weeping of the faithful dried up, their wounds healed, their bodies made immortal in joy, their souls for ever praising the Lord, in conjunction and society everlasting with the blessed company of God's elect in perpetual joy. But the words of St. Paul in that place, if they be not marked, shall do little profit to the reader or hearer, and give him no patience at all in this impatient and cruel world.

When a man hath, by seeking the word of God, found out what the things above be, then must he (as St. Paul saith) set his affections upon them. And this commandment is more hard than the other. For man's knowledge many times seeth the best, and knoweth that there is a life to come, better than this life present, (as you may see how daily men and women can praise and commend, yea, and wish for heaven, and to be at rest there) yet they set not their affections upon it: they do more affect, and love indeed a trifle of nothing, in this that pleaseth their affection, than the treasure of all treasures in heaven, which their own judgment saith is better than all worldly things. "Wherefore we must set our affections on the things that be above," that is to say, when any thing worse than heaven, upon the earth, offereth itself to be our's, if we will give our good wills to it, and love it in our hearts, then ought we to see by the judgment of God's word, whether we may have the world without offence of God, and such things as be for this worldly life without his displeasure. If we cannot, St. Paul's commandment must take place, "Set your affections on things that are above." If the riches of this world may not be gotten nor kept by God's law, neither our lives be continued without the denial of his honour, we must set our affections upon the riches and life that is above, and not upon things that are on the earth. Therefore this second commandment of St. Paul requireth, that our minds judge heavenly things to be better than things upon the earth, and the life to come better than the life present; so we should chuse them before the other, and prefer them, and have such affection to the best, that in no case we set the worst before it, as the most part of the world doth and hath done, for they chuse the best and prove it, and yet follow the worst.

But these things, my godly wife, requireth rather thought, meditation, and prayer, than words or talk. They are easy to be spoken of, but not so easy to be used and practised. Wherefore seeing they be God's gifts, and none of our's, to have as our own when we would, we must seek them at our heavenly Father's hand, who seeth, and is privy how poor and wretched we be, and how naked, how spoiled, and destitute of all his blessed gifts we be by reason of sin. He did command therefore his disciples, when he shewed them that they should take patiently the state of this present life full of troubles and persecution, to pray that they might well escape those troubles that were to come, and be able to stand before the Son of man. When you find yourself too much oppressed, (as every man shall be sometimes with the fear of God's judgment) use the 77th Psalm that beginneth, "I will cry unto God with my voice, and he shall hearken unto me." In which Psalm is both godly doctrine and great consolation unto the man or woman that is in anguish of mind.

Use also in such trouble the 88th Psalm, wherein is contained the prayer of such a man, that was brought to extreme anguish and misery, and being vexed with adversaries and persecutions, saw nothing but death and hell. And although he felt in himself, that he had not only man, but also God angry towards him; yet he by prayer humbly resorted unto God.

We must not also murmur against God, but always say his judgments are right and just, and rejoice that it pleaseth him by troubles to use us as he used heretofore such as he most loved in this world. "Be glad, and rejoice, for your reward is great in heaven." His promises shall (by God's grace) work both consolation and patience in afflicted christians. And when our Saviour Christ hath willed men in trouble to be content and patient, because God in the end of trouble in Christ hath ordained eternal consolation; he useth also to take from us all shame and rebuke, as though it were not an honour to suffer for Christ, because the wicked world doth curse and abhor such poor troubled christians. Wherefore Christ placeth all his honourably, and saith, "Even so persecuted they the prophets that were before you."

We must therefore patiently suffer, and willingly attend upon God's doings, although they seem clean contrary, after our judgment, to our wealth and salvation: as Abraham did, when bid to offer his son Isaac, in whom God promised the blessing and multiplying of his seed.

And judge things indifferently, my good wife, the troubles be not yet generally, as they were in our good father's time, soon after the death and resurrection of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whereof he spake in St. Matthew. Of which place you and I have taken many times great consolation, and especially of the latter part of the chapter, wherein is contained the last day and end of all troubles (I doubt not) both for you and me, and for such as love the coming of our Saviour Christ to judgment. Remember therefore that place, and mark it again, and you shall in this time see this great consolation, and also learn much patience. Were there ever such troubles, as Christ threatened upon Jerusalem? Was there since the beginning of the world such affliction? Who was then best at ease? The apostles that suffered in body persecution, and gathered of it ease and quietness in the promises of God. And no marvel, for Christ saith, "Lift up your heads, for your redemption is at hand;" that is, your eternal rest approacheth and draweth near. The world is stark blind, and more foolish than foolishness itself, and so are the people of the world. For when God saith, trouble shall come, they will have ease. And when God saith, be merry and rejoice in trouble, we lament and mourn, as though we were cast-aways. But this our flesh (which is never merry with virtue, nor sorry with vice; never laugheth with grace, nor ever weepeth with sin) holdeth fast with the world, and letteth God slip. But, my dearly beloved wife, you know how to perceive and to beware of the vanity and crafts of the devil well enough in Christ. And that you may the better have patience in the Spirit of God, read again the 24th of St. Matthew, and mark what difference is between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the whole world, and you shall see, that then there were left alive many offenders to repent: but at the latter day there shall be absolute judgment, and sentence (never to be revoked) of eternal life and eternal death upon all men: and yet towards the end of the world we have nothing so much extremity as they had then, but even as we are able to bear. So doth the merciful Father lay upon us now imprisonment, (and as I suppose for my part shortly, death) now spoil of goods, loss of friends, and the greatest loss of all, the knowledge of God's word. God's will be done. I wish in Christ Jesus our only Mediator and Saviour, your constancy and consolation, that you may live for ever and ever, whereof in Christ I doubt not; to whom, for his most blessed and painful passion, I commit you, Amen. Octob. 13, 1553.

From the learned HENRY BULLINGER, chief Superintendant in the City of ZURICH, in SWITZERLAND, to BISHOP HOOPER.

TO the most Rev. Father, Dr. John Hooper, Bishop of Worcester and Gloucester, and now a prisoner for the gospel of Jesus Christ, my fellow elder, and most dear brother in England. The heavenly Father grant unto you, and to all those which are in bonds and captivity for his name's sake, grace and peace through Jesus Christ our Lord, with wisdom, patience, and fortitude of the Holy Ghost.

I have received from you two letters, my most dear brother, the former in the month of September of the year past, the latter in the month of May in this present year, both written out of prison. But I doubting lest I should make answer to you in vain, whilst I feared that my letters should never come into your hands, or else increase and double your sorrow, did refrain from the duty of writing. In which thing I doubt not but you will have me excused, especially seeing you did not vouchsafe, no not once in a whole year, to answer to my whole volumes, rather than letters, whereas I continued still, notwithstanding, in writing unto you: as also at this present, after I heard you were cast in prison, I did not refrain from continual prayer, beseeching our heavenly Father, through our only mediator, Jesus Christ, to grant unto you and to your fellow-prisoners, faith and constancy unto the end. Now is that thing happened unto you, (my brother) the which we did oftentimes prophecy unto ourselves, at your being with us, should come to pass, especially when we did talk of the power of Antichrist, and of his felicity and victories. For you know the saying of Daniel, his power shall be mighty, but not in his strength, and he shall wonderfully destroy and make havock of all things, and shall prosper and practise, and he shall destroy the mighty and the holy people after his own will. You know what the Lord warned us of before-hand by Matthew, in the 10th chapter, by John in the 15th chapter, and the 16th, and also what that chosen vessel St. Paul hath written in the second of Timothy, and the third chapter. Wherefore I do nothing doubt (by God's grace) of your faith and patience, whilst you know that those things which you suffer are not looked for, or come by chance; but that you suffer them in the best, truest, and most holy quarrel: for what can be more true and holy than our doctrine, which the papists, these worshippers of Antichrist, do persecute?

Go forwards therefore constantly to confess Christ, and to defy Antichrist, being mindful of this most holy and most true saying of our Lord Jesus Christ: He that overcometh shall possess all things, and I will be his God, and he shall be my son; but the fearful, and the unbelieving, and the murderers, and whoremongers, and forcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death. The first death is soon overcome, although a man must burn for the Lord's sake: for they say well that do affirm this our fire to be scarcely a shadow of that which is prepared for unbelievers, and them that fall from the truth. Moreover, the Lord granteth unto us, that we may easily overcome by his power the first death, the which he himself did taste and overcome; promising withal such joys as shall never have end, unspeakable, and passing all understanding, the which we shall possess as soon as ever we depart hence. For so again saith the angel of the Lord; If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wrath of God; yea, of the wine which is poured into the cup of his wrath, and he shall be tormented in fire and brimstone before the holy angels, and before the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment shall ascend evermore, and they shall have no rest day nor night, which worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the print of his name. Here is the patience of saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus. To this he addeth by and by: I heard a voice saying to me, Write, blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, from henceforth, or speedily, they are blessed, John v. even so saith the Spirit; for they rest from their labours, but their works follow them: for our labour shall not be frustrate or in vain.

Concerning the state of the church, it remaineth even as it was when you departed from us into your country. God grant we may be thankful to him, and that we do not only profess the faith with words, but also express the same effectually with good works, to the praise of our Lord. The word of God increaseth daily in that part of Italy that is near unto us, and in France.

In the mean while the godly sustaine grievous persecutions, and with great constancy and glory, through torments they go unto the Lord. The Lord Jesus shew pity upon the realm of England, and illuminate the same with his Holy Spirit, to the glory of his name, and the salvation of souls. The Lord Jesus preserve and deliver you from all evil, with all them that call upon his name. Farewel, and farewel eternally. The 10th of October, anno 1554, from Zurich. You know the hand, H. B.

C H A P. III.

The LIFE, MARTYRDOM, &c. of the REV. DR. ROWLAND TAYLOR, VICAR of HADLEY, in SUFFOLK, under the cruel TYRANNY of STEPHEN GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER, in the BLOODY REIGN of MARY I. who was burned at ALDHAM-COMMON, February 9, 1555.

THE town of Hadley was one of the first that received the word of God, at the preaching of the Rev. Thomas Bilney; by whose industry the gospel of Christ took such root there, that a great number became exceeding well learned in the holy scriptures, as well women as men.

In this parish, Dr. Rowland Taylor was a vicar, a man of eminent learning, and who had been admitted to the degree of doctor of the civil and common law.

His attachment to the pure and uncorrupted principles of christianity recommended him to the favour and friendship of Dr. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, with whom he lived a comfortable time, till through his interest he obtained the living of Hadley. This charge he attended with the utmost diligence and assiduity, recommending and enforcing the doctrines of the gospel not only by his judicious discourses from the pulpit, but also by the whole tenor of his life and conversation.

Thus continued Dr. Taylor promoting the interest of the great Redeemer, and the souls of mankind, both by his preaching and example during the reign of king Edward VI. but on his demise and the succession of queen Mary to the throne, he escaped not the cloud that burst on so many beside; for two of his parishioners, Foster, an attorney, and Clark, a tradesman, out of blind zeal, resolved that mass should be celebrated in all its superstitious forms, in the parish church at Hadley, on Monday before Easter; nay, they had even caused an altar to be built in the chancel for that purpose, which being pulled down by the protestant inhabitants, they erected another, and prevailed with the minister of an adjacent parish to celebrate mass in the passion-week.

The doctor being employed in his study, was alarmed at the ringing of bells at an unusual time, but went to the church to inquire the cause. He found the great doors fast, but lifting up the latch of the chancel-door, he entered, and was not a little surprised to see a priest in his habit prepared to celebrate mass, guarded by a party of men under arms, to prevent interruption.

Dr. Taylor being vicar of the parish, demanded of the priest the cause of such proceeding without his knowledge or consent; and how he dared profane the temple of God with abominable idolatries. Foster, the lawyer, insolently replied, "Thou traitor, how dar'st thou to intercept the execution of the queen's orders;" but the doctor undauntedly denied the charge of traitor, and asserted his mission as a minister of Christ, and delegation to that part of his flock, commanding the priest, as a wolf in sheep's clothing, to depart, nor infect the pure church of God with popish idolatry. A very violent altercation then ensued, between Foster the lawyer, and Dr. Taylor, the former asserting the queen's prerogative, and the other the authority of the canon law, which commanded that no mass be said, but at a consecrated altar.

The priest, intimidated by the intrepid behaviour of the protestant minister, would have departed without saying mass, but Clark said to him, Fear not, you have a super altare, (which is a consecrated stone, commonly about a foot square, which the popish priests carry instead of an altar, when they say mass in gentlemen's houses) proceed and do your duty.

Then they forced the doctor out of the church, celebrated mass, and immediately informed the lord chancellor, bishop of Winchester, of his behaviour, who summoned him to appear before him, and answer the complaints that were alledged against him.

The doctor upon receipt of the summons, cheerfully prepared to obey the same; and on some of his friends advising him to fly beyond sea, in order to avoid the cruelty of his inneterate enemies, he told them that he was determined to go to the bishop, and he repaired to London, and waited on the bishop.

Now when bishop Gardiner saw Dr. Taylor, he, according to his common custom, reviled him, calling him knave, traitor, heretic, with many other villainous reproaches, which Dr. Taylor heard patiently, and at last said unto him:

My lord, I am neither traitor nor heretic, but a true subject, and a faithful christian man, and am come, according to your commandment, to know what is the cause that your lordship hath sent for me.

Then, said the bishop, art thou come, thou villain? How dar'st thou to look me in the face for shame? Knowest thou not who I am?

Yes, said Dr. Taylor, I know who you are, Dr. Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, and lord chancellor, and yet but a mortal man. But if I should be afraid of your lordly looks, why fear you not God, the lord of us all? How dare you for shame look any christian man in the face, seeing you have forsaken the truth, denied our Saviour Christ and his word, and done contrary to your own oath and writing? With what countenance will you appear before the judgment seat of Christ, and answer to your oath made first unto king Henry the eighth, and afterwards unto king Edward the sixth, his son.

The bishop answered, that was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore worthy to be broken: I have done well in breaking it; and I thank God, I am come home again to our mother, the catholic church of Rome; and so I would thou shouldest do.

Dr. Taylor answered, Should I forsake the church of Christ? God forbid. You wrote truly against him, and were sworn against him.

I tell thee, said the bishop of Winchester, it was Herod's oath, unlawful; and therefore ought to be broken, and not kept: and our holy father the pope hath discharged me of it.

Then said Dr. Taylor, But you shall not be so discharged before Christ, who doubtless will require it at your hands, as a lawful oath made to our liege and sovereign lord the king, from whose obedience no man can quit you.

I see, said the bishop, thou art an arrogant knave, and a very fool.

My lord, Dr. Taylor replied, "He that faith to his brother, Racha, is in danger of a council; and he that faith, Thou fool, is in danger of hell fire."

The bishop answered, You are false, and liars all the sort of you.

Nay, said Dr. Taylor, we are true men, and know that it is written, "The mouth that lieth, slayeth the soul;" and again, "Lord God, thou shalt destroy all that speak lies." And therefore we abide by the truth of God's word, which you, contrary to your own consciences, deny and forsake.

Then said the bishop, Thou hast resisted the queen's proceeding, and would not suffer the minister of Aldam, Mr. John Averth, a very virtuous and devout priest, to say mass in Hadley. Dr. Taylor answered, My lord, I am vicar of Hadley, and it is against all right, conscience, and laws, that any man should come into my charge, and presume to infect the flock committed unto me, with the venom of the popish idolatrous mass.

With that the bishop waxed very angry, and said, Thou art a blasphemous heretic indeed, that blasphemest the blessed sacrament, (and put off his cap) and speakest against the holy mass, which is made a sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

Then answered Dr. Taylor, Christ gave himself to die for our redemption upon the cross, whose body there offered was the propitiatory sacrifice full, perfect, and sufficient unto salvation for all them that believe in him. Then the bishop called his men, and said, Have this fellow hence, and carry him to the King's Bench, and charge the keeper he be straitly kept.

Dr. Taylor kneeling down, held up both his hands and said, "Good Lord, I thank thee; and from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable errors, idolatries, and abominations, good Lord deliver us: and God be praised for good king Edward." So they carried him to prison to the King's-Bench, where he lay prisoner almost two years.

This is the sum of their first discourse, as mentioned in a letter that Dr. Taylor wrote to a friend of his, thanking God for his grace, that he had confessed his truth, and was found worthy for truth to suffer prison and bonds, beseeching his friends to pray for him, that he might persevere constant unto the end.

The FOURTH and LAST EXAMINATION of Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, who with Mr. BRADFORD and Mr. SAUNDERS were brought before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER, and other Prelates.

IN January, 1555, the Rev. Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, were again called to appear before the bishop of Winchester, the bishops of Norwich, London, Salisbury, and Durham, and there were again charged with heresy and schism, and therefore a determinate answer was required, whether they would submit themselves to the Roman bishop, and abjure their errors, or else they would according to their laws proceed to their condemnation.

When Dr. Taylor, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Saunders, heard this, they answered boldly, that they would not depart from the truth which they had preached in king Edward's days; neither would they submit themselves to the Romish Antichrist; but they thanked God for so great mercy; that he would call them to be worthy to suffer for his word and truth.

When the bishops saw them so bold, and immovably fixed in the truth, they read the sentence of death upon them; which when they had heard, they most joyfully gave God thanks, and said unto the bishops, "We doubt not but God the righteous judge will require our blood at your hands; and the proudest of you all shall repent this receiving again of Antichrist, and your tyranny that you now shew against the flock of Christ."

When Dr. Taylor had lain in the Poultry Compter about a week, on the fourth of February, 1555, Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, with others, came to degrade him, bringing with them such ornaments as do appertain to their massing-mummery. Now being come, he called for the said Dr. Taylor to be brought unto him; the bishop being then in the chamber where the keeper of the Compter and his wife lay. So Dr. Taylor was brought down from the chamber above that to the said Bonner. And at his coming the bishop said, Doctor, I wish you would remember yourself, and turn to your mother holy church, so may you do well enough, and I will sue for your pardon. Whereunto Dr. Taylor answered, I wish you and your fellows would turn to Christ. As for me, I will not turn to Antichrist. Well, said the bishop, I am come to degrade you: wherefore put on these vestures. No, said Dr. Taylor, I will not. Wilt thou not, said the bishop? I shall make thee, ere I go. Said Dr. Taylor, you shall not; by the grace of God. Then he charged him upon his obedience to do it, but he would not.

So he ordered another to put them upon his back, and being thoroughly furnished therewith, he set his hands to his side, walking up and down, and said; How say you; my lord, am not I a goodly fool? How say you, my masters? If I were in Cheapside, should I not have boys to laugh at these apish toys, and trumpery? Then the bishop scraped his fingers, thumbs, and the crown of his head.

At last, when he would have given Dr. Taylor a stroke on the breast with his crozier-staff, the bishop's chaplain said, My lord, strike him not; for he will certainly strike again. Yes, by St. Peter will I, said Dr. Taylor. The cause is Christ's, and I were no good christian, if I would not fight in my master's quarrel. The bishop then laid his curse upon him, but struck him not. Dr. Taylor said, Though you do curse me, yet God doth bless me.

The night after he was degraded, his wife, his son Thomas, and his servant John Hull came to him, and were by the gentleness of the keepers permitted to sup with him: at their coming, they kneeled down and prayed, saying the litany.

After supper walking up and down, he gave God thanks for his grace, that had so called him, and given him strength to abide by his holy word: and turning to his son Thomas, "My dear son, said he, Almighty God bless thee, and give thee his Holy Spirit, to be a true servant of Christ, to learn his word, and constantly to stand by his truth all thy life long. And, my son, see that thou fear God always. Flee from all sin, and wicked living: be virtuous, serve God with daily prayer, and apply thy book. In any wise see thou be obedient to thy mother, love her and serve her: be ruled by her now in thy youth, and follow her good counsel in all things. Beware of lewd company, of young men that fear not God, but follow their lewd lusts and vain appetites. Fly from whoredom, and hate all filthy living, remembering that I thy father do die in the defence of holy marriage.

Then turning to his wife, "My dear wife, said he, continue steadfast in the fear and love of God; keep yourself undefiled from your popish idolatries and superstition. I have been unto you a faithful yoke-fellow, and so have you been unto me, for which I pray God to reward you, and doubt not, dear wife, but God will reward it. Now the time is come that I shall be taken from you, and you discharged of the wedlock bond towards me: therefore I will give you my counsel what I think most expedient for you. You are yet a child-bearing woman, and therefore it will be most convenient for you to marry.

On the morning after Dr. Taylor had supped with his wife in the Compter, which was the fifth day of February, the sheriff of London with his officers came by two o'clock, and brought forth Dr. Taylor, and without any light led him to the Woolpack, an inn without Aldgate. Dr. Taylor's wife, suspecting that her husband would that night be carried away, watched all night in St. Botolph's church-porch without Aldgate, having with her two children, the one named Elizabeth, of thirteen years of age, (who, being left without father or mother, Dr. Taylor had charitably brought up from three years old) the other named Mary, Dr. Taylor's own daughter.

When the sheriff and his company came against St. Botolph's church, Elizabeth cried, saying, O my dear father! mother, mother, here is my father led away. Then his wife said, Rowland, Rowland, where art thou? For it was a very dark morning, that the one could not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, Dear wife, I am here, and stopped. The sheriff's men would have led him forth; but the sheriff said, Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife, and so they staid.

Then she came to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms; and he, his wife, and Elizabeth, kneeled down and said the Lord's prayer. At which sight the sheriff wept much, and so did several others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand, and said, Farewel, my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children. And then he kissed his daughter Mary, and said, God bless thee, and make thee his servant: and kissing Elizabeth, he said, God bless thee. I pray you all stand strong and stedfast unto Christ and his word, and beware of idolatry. Then said his wife, God be with thee, dear Rowland, I will with God's grace meet thee at Hadley.

And so he was led forth to the Woolpack, and his wife followed him. As soon as they came to the Woolpack, he was put into a chamber, wherein he was kept with four yeomen of the guard, and the sheriff's men. Dr. Taylor, as soon as he was come into the chamber, fell down on his knees, and gave himself wholly to prayer. The sheriff then seeing Dr. Taylor's wife there, would in no case grant her to speak any more with her husband, but gently desired her to go to his house and take it as her own, and promised her she should lack nothing, and sent two officers to conduct her thither. Notwithstanding, she desired to go to her mother's, whither the officers led her, and charged her mother to keep her there till they came again.

Dr. Taylor remained at the Woolpack, kept by the sheriff and his company, till eleven of the clock; at which time the sheriff of Essex was ready to receive him: and they set him on horseback within the inn, the gates being shut.

At coming out of the gates, John Hull stood at the rails with Thomas, Dr. Taylor's son. When Dr. Taylor saw them, he called them, saying, come hither, my son Thomas. And John Hull lifted the child up, and set him on the horse before his father: and Dr. Taylor put off his hat, and said to the people that stood there looking on him, Good people, this is mine own son, begotten of my body in lawful matrimony; and God be blessed for lawful matrimony. Then he lifted up his eyes towards heaven and prayed for his son, laid his hat upon his head and blessed him, and so delivered the child to John Hull, whom he took by the hand and said, Farewell John Hull, the faithfulest servant ever man had. And so they rode forth, the sheriff of Essex, with four yeoman of the guard, and the sheriff's men leading them.

When they were come almost to Burntwood, one Arthur Fayfy, a man of Hadley, who formerly had been Dr. Taylor's servant, met with him, and he, supposing him to have been at liberty, said, Master, I am glad to see you again at liberty, and came to him and took him by the hand. Sir, returned the sheriff, he is a prisoner; what hast thou to do with him? I cry you mercy, said Arthur, I knew not so much, and I thought it no offence to talk to a true man. The sheriff was very angry with this, threatened to carry Arthur with him to prison; notwithstanding he bid him get quickly away, and so they rode forth to Burntwood; where they caused to be made for Dr. Taylor a close hood, with two holes for his eyes to look out at, and a slit for his mouth to breathe at. This they did, that no man should know him, nor he speak to any man. Which practice they used also with others. Their own consciences told them, that they led innocent lambs to the slaughter. Wherefore they feared, lest if the people should have heard them speak, or have seen them, they might have been much more strengthened by their pious exhortations to stand stedfast in God's word, and to fly the superstitions and idolatries of the papacy.

All the way Dr. Taylor was joyful and merry, as one that accounted himself going to a most pleasant banquet or marriage. He spoke many notable things to the sheriff and yeomen of the guard that conducted him, and often moved them to weep through his much earnest calling upon them to repent, and to amend their evil and wicked living. Oftentimes also he caused them to wonder and rejoice, to see him so constant and stedfast, void of all fear, joyful in heart, and glad to die. Of these yeomen of the guard, three used him very friendly, but the fourth (whose name was Homes) used him very unkindly, and churlishly.

At Chelmsford the sheriff of Suffolk met them, there to receive him, and to carry him into Suffolk. Being at supper, the sheriff of Essex very earnestly besought him to return to the popish religion, thinking with fair words to persuade him. and said, Good Doctor, we are right sorry for you, considering what the loss is of such a man as you might be. God hath given you great learning and wisdom; wherefore you have been in great favour and reputation in times past with the council and highest of this realm. Besides this, you are a man of goodly personage, in your best strength, and by nature like to live many years, and without doubt, you would in time to come be in as good reputation as ever you were, or rather better. For you are well beloved of all men, as well for your virtues as for your learning: and it were great pity you should cast away yourself willingly, and so come to such a painful and shameful death. You would do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the catholic universal church of Rome, acknowledge the pope's holiness to be the supreme head of the church, and reconcile yourself to him. You may do well yet if you will: doubt you not but you shall find favour at the queen's hands. I and all these your friends, will be suitors for your pardon, which, no doubt, you will obtain; this counsel I give you, good Doctor, of a good heart, and good will towards you: and thereupon I drink to you. In like manner said all the yeoman of the guard, Upon that condition, Doctor, we will all drink to you.

When they had all drank to him; and the cup was come to him, he staid a little, as one studying what answer he might give. At the last thus he answered and said, Mr. Sheriff, and my masters all, I heartily thank you for your good-will; I have hearkened to your words, and marked well your counsels. And to be plain with you, I do perceive that I have been deceived myself, and am likely to deceive a great many of Hadley of their expectation. With that word they all rejoiced. Yes, Doctor, said the sheriff, God's blessing on your heart; hold you there still. It is the most comfortable word that we heard you speak yet. What? should you cast away yourself in vain? Play a wise man's part, and I dare warrant you will find favour. Thus they rejoiced very much at the word, and were very merry.

At last, Good Doctor, said the sheriff, what meant you by this, that you say you have been deceived yourself, and think you shall deceive many in Hadley? Would you know my meaning plainly, said he? Yes, said the sheriff, tell it us plainly.

Then said Dr. Taylor, I will tell you how I have been deceived, and, as I think, I shall deceive a great many. I am, as you see, a man that hath a very great carcass, which I should have been buried in Hadley church-yard, and died in my bed; as I well hoped I should have done; but herein I see I was deceived; and there are a great number of worms in Hadley church-yard, which should have had jolly feeding upon this carrion, which they have looked for many a day. But now I know we be deceived, both I and they; for this carcass must be burned to ashes, and so they shall lose their bait and feeding, that they looked to have had of it.

When the sheriff and his company heard him say so, they were amazed and looked one on another, marveling at the man's constant mind, that thus without all fear made but a jest at the cruel torment, and death now at hand prepared for him. Thus was their expectation clean disappointed. And in this appeareth what was his meditation in wealth and prosperity; namely, that he should shortly die, and feed worms in his grave; which not see the other. Dr. Taylor answered, Dear wife, I am here, and stopped. The sheriff's men would have led him forth; but the sheriff said, Stay a little, masters, I pray you, and let him speak to his wife; and so they staid.

Then she came to him, and he took his daughter Mary in his arms; and he, his wife, and Elizabeth, kneeled down and said the Lord's prayer. At which sight the sheriff wept much, and so did several others of the company. After they had prayed, he rose up and kissed his wife, and shook her by the hand, and said, Farewel, my dear wife, be of good comfort, for I am quiet in my conscience. God shall stir up a father for my children. And then he kissed his daughter Mary, and said, God bless thee, and make thee his servant: and kissing Elizabeth, he said, God bless thee. I pray you all stand strong and stedfast unto Christ and his word, and beware of idolatry. Then said his wife, God be with thee, dear Rowland, I will with God's grace meet thee at Hadley.

And so he was led forth to the Woolpack, and his wife followed him. As soon as they came to the Woolpack, he was put into a chamber, wherein he was kept with four yeomen of the guard, and the sheriff's men. Dr. Taylor, as soon as he was come into the chamber, fell down on his knees, and gave himself wholly to prayer. The sheriff then seeing Dr. Taylor's wife there, would in no case grant her to speak any more with her husband, but gently desired her to go to his house and take it as her own, and promised her she should lack nothing, and sent two officers to conduct her thither. Notwithstanding, she desired to go to her mother's, whither the officers led her, and charged her mother to keep her there till they came again.

Dr. Taylor remained at the Woolpack, kept by the sheriff and his company, till eleven of the clock; at which time the sheriff of Essex was ready to receive him: and they set him on horseback within the inn, the gates being shut.

At coming out of the gates, John Hull stood at the rails with Thomas, Dr. Taylor's son. When Dr. Taylor saw them, he called them, saying, come hither, my son Thomas. And John Hull lifted the child up, and set him on the horse before his father: and Dr. Taylor put off his hat, and said to the people that stood there looking on him, Good people, this is mine own son, begotten of my body in lawful matrimony; and God be blessed for lawful matrimony. Then he lifted up his eyes towards heaven and prayed for his son, laid his hat upon his head and blessed him, and so delivered the child to John Hull, whom he took by the hand and said, Farewell John Hull, the faithfullest servant ever man had. And so they rode forth, the sheriff of Essex, with four yeoman of the guard, and the sheriff's men leading them.

When they were come almost to Burntwood, one Arthur Fayfy, a man of Hadley, who formerly had been Dr. Taylor's servant, met with him, and he, supposing him to have been at liberty, said, Master, I am glad to see you again at liberty, and came to him and took him by the hand. Sir, returned the sheriff, he is a prisoner; what hast thou to do with him? I cry you mercy, said Arthur, I knew not so much, and I thought it no offence to talk to a true man. The sheriff was very angry with this, threatened to carry Arthur with him to prison; notwithstanding he bid him get quickly away, and so they rode forth to Burntwood; where they caused to be made for Dr. Taylor a close hood, with two holes for his eyes to look out at, and a slit for his mouth to breathe at. This they did, that no man should know him, nor he speak to any man. Which practice they used also with others. Their own consciences told them, that they led innocent lambs to the slaughter. Wherefore they feared, lest if the people should have heard them speak, or have seen them, they might have been much more strengthened by their pious exhortations to stand stedfast in God's word, and to fly the superstitions and idolatries of the papacy. All the way Dr. Taylor was joyful and merry, as one that accounted himself going to a most pleasant banquet.

or marriage. He spoke many notable things to the sheriff and yeomen of the guard that conducted him, and often moved them to weep through his much earnest calling upon them to repent, and to amend their evil and wicked living. Oftentimes also he caused them to wonder and rejoice, to see him so constant and stedfast, void of all fear, joyful in heart, and glad to die. Of these yeomen of the guard, three used him very friendly, but the fourth (whose name was Homes) used him very unkindly, and churlishly.

At Chelmsford the sheriff of Suffolk met them, there to receive him, and to carry him into Suffolk. Being at supper, the sheriff of Essex very earnestly besought him to return to the popish religion, thinking with fair words to persuade him. and said, Good Doctor, we are right sorry for you, considering what the loss is of such a man as you might be. God hath given you great learning and wisdom; wherefore you have been in great favour and reputation in times past with the council and highest of this realm. Besides this, you are a man of goodly personage, in your best strength; and by nature like to live many years, and without doubt, you would in time to come be in as good reputation as ever you were, or rather better. For you are well beloved of all men, as well for your virtues as for your learning: and it were great pity you should cast away yourself willingly, and so come to such a painful and shameful death. You would do much better to revoke your opinions, and return to the catholic universal church of Rome, acknowledge the pope's holiness to be the supreme head of the church, and reconcile yourself to him. You may do well yet if you will: doubt you not but you shall find favour at the queen's hands. I and all these your friends, will be suitors for your pardon, which, no doubt, you will obtain; this counsel I give you, good Doctor, of a good heart, and good will towards you: and thereupon I drink to you. meditation meditation if all our bishops, and spiritual men had used, they had not for worldly glory forsaken the world of God and truth, which they in king Edward's days had preached and set forth, nor yet, to maintain the bishop of Rome's authority, have committed so many to the fire as they did.

But let us return to Dr. Taylor, who at Chelmsford was delivered to the sheriff of Suffolk, and by him conducted to Hadley, where he suffered. When they were come to Lanham, the sheriff stayed there two days; and thither came to him a great number of gentlemen and justices, who were appointed to aid the sheriff. These gentlemen endeavoured very much to reduce Dr. Taylor to the Romish religion, promising him his pardon, which, said they, we have here for you. They promised him great promotions, even a bishopric if he would take it: but all their labour and flattering words were in vain. For he had not built his house upon the sand in peril of falling at every puff of wind, but upon the sure and immovable rock, Christ. Wherefore he abode constant and immovable to the end.

After two days, the sheriff and his company led Dr. Taylor towards Hadley, and coming within two miles of the town, he desired to light off his horse to make water: which done, he leapt, as men commonly do in dancing. Why, Doctor, said the sheriff, how do you now? He answered, Well, God be praised, good sheriff, never better: for now I know I am almost at home. I lack not past two stiles to go over, and I am even at my father's House. But Mr. Sheriff, said he, shall we not go through Hadley? Yes, said the sheriff. Then said he, O good Lord, I thank thee, I shall yet once ere I die see my flock, whom thou Lord knowest I have most heartily loved, and truly taught: good Lord bless them, and keep them steadfast in thy word and truth.

When they were come to Hadley, and riding over the bridge, at the bridge-foot waited a poor man with five small children: who when he saw Doctor Taylor he and his children fell down upon their knees, and held up their hands, and cried with a loud voice, and said, O dear father and good shepherd, Doctor Taylor, God help and succour thee, as thou hast many a time succoured me and my poor children. Such witness had the servant of God of his virtuous and charitable alms given in his lifetime. For God would now the poor should testify of his good deeds to his singular comfort; to the example of others, and confusion of his persecutors and adversaries. For the sheriff and others that led him to death, were wonderfully astonished, and rebuked the poor man for so crying. The streets of Hadley were beset on both sides the way with men and women of the town and country, who waited to see him: whom when they beheld so led to death, with weeping eyes and lamentable voices they cried, saying one to another, Ah good Lord! there goeth our good shepherd from us, that so faithfully hath taught us, so fatherly hath cared for us, and so godly hath governed us! O merciful God! what shall we poor scattered lambs do? What shall come of this most wicked world? Good Lord strengthen him, and comfort him: with such other most lamentable and piteous voices. Wherefore the people were rebuked by the sheriff and his men, that led him. And Dr. Taylor repeatedly said to the people, I have preached to you God's word and truth, and for this day to seal it with my blood.

Coming against the alms-houses, which he well knew, he cast to the poor people money, which remained out of what had been given him in the time of his imprisonment. As for his living, they took it from him at his first going to prison, so that he was sustained all the time of his imprisonment by the charitable alms of good people that visited him.

Therefore the money that now remained he put into a glove, ready for the same purpose, and gave it to the poor alms-men standing at their doors to see him. And coming to the last of the alms-houses, and not seeing the poor that dwelt there, ready at their doors, as the others were, he asked, is the blind-man and blind-woman that dwelt here alive? It was answered, Yes, they are within. Then he threw the glove and all in at the window, and rode on.

Thus this good father and provider for the poor now took his leave of those, for whom all his life he had a singular care and love. For this was his custom, once in a fortnight at least, to call upon sir Anthony Doyl, and others of the rich cloth-makers, to go with him to the alms-houses, and there to see how the poor lived; what they lacked in meat, drink, clothing, bedding, or any other necessities. The like did he also to other poor men that had many children, or were sick. Then would he exhort and comfort them, and where he found cause, rebuke the unruly, and what they wanted, that gave he after his power: and what he was not able, he caused the rich and wealthy men to minister unto them. Thus shewed he himself in all things an example to his flock, worthy to be followed; and taught by his deeds, what a great treasure alms is to all such as cheerfully for Christ's sake do bestow them.

When Dr. Taylor was arrived at Aldham-Common, the place where he should suffer, seeing a great multitude of people, he asked, What place is this, and what meaneth it that so much people are gathered hither? It was answered, It is Aldham-Common, the place where you must suffer; and the people are come to look upon you. Then, said he, Thanked be God, I am even at home, and so alighted from his horse, and with both his hands rent the hood from his head.

Now was his head notched and clipped much like as a man would clip a fool's; which cost the good bishop Bonner had bestowed upon him, when he degraded him. But when the people saw his reverend and ancient face, with a long white beard, they burst out with weeping tears, and cried, saying, God save thee, good Dr. Taylor! Jesus Christ strengthen thee, and help thee! the Holy Ghost comfort thee! with such other like good wishes. Then would he have spoken to the people, but the yeomen of the guard were so busy about him, that as soon as he opened his mouth, one or other thrust a tipstaff into his mouth, and would in no wise permit him to speak.

Then he desired licence of the sheriff to speak; but the sheriff denied it to him, and bade him remember his promise to the council.

Well, said Dr. Taylor, promise must be kept. What this promise was, is unknown: but common fame was, that after he and others were condemned, the council sent for them, and threatened they would cut their tongues out of their heads, except they would promise, that at their deaths they would keep silence, and not speak to the people. Wherefore they, desirous to have the use of their tongues, to call upon God as long as they might live, promised silence. For the papists feared much, lest this change of religion, from truth to lies, from Christ's ordinance to the popish traditions, should not so quietly have been received as it was, especially this burning of the preachers: but they measuring others' minds by their own, feared lest any tumult or uproar might have been stirred, the people having so just a cause not to be contented with their doings, or else (as they most feared) that the people should more have been confirmed, by their pious exhortations, to stand steadfast against their vain popish doctrine and idolatry. But thanks be to God, who gave to his witnesses, faith and patience, with stout and manly hearts to dispise all torments: neither was there so much as any one man that shewed any sign of disobedience towards the magistrates. They shed their blood gladly in defence of the truth, so leaving example unto all men of true and perfect obedience; which is to obey God more than men, and if need require it, to shed their own blood rather than depart from God's truth.

Dr. Taylor perceiving that he could not be suffered to speak, sat down, and seeing one named Soyce, he called him, and said, Soyce, I pray thee come and pull off my boots, and take them for thy labour: thou hast long looked for them, now take them. Then he rose up, and put off his clothes unto his shirt, and gave them away. Which done, he said with a loud voice, Good people people, I have taught you nothing but God's holy word, and those lessons that I have taken out of God's blessed book, the Holy bible: and I am come hither this day to seal it with my blood. With that word, Homes, yeoman of the guard, who used Dr. Taylor very cruelly all the way, gave him a great stroke upon the head, and said, is that the keeping of thy promise, thou heretic? Then he, seeing they would not permit him to speak, kneeled down and prayed, and a poor woman that was among the people stepped in and prayed with him; but her they thrust away, and threatened to tread her down with their horses: notwithstanding, she would not remove, but abode and prayed with him. When he had prayed, he went to the stake and kissed it, and set himself into a pitch-barrel, which they had set for him to stand in, and so stood with his back upright against the stake, with his hands folded together, and his eyes towards heaven, and continually prayed.

Then they bound him with chains, and the sheriff called one Richard Donningham a butcher, and commanded him to set up the faggots: but he refused to do it, and said, I am lame, sir, and not able to lift a faggot. The sheriff threatened to send him to prison: notwithstanding, he would not do it.

Then he appointed one Mulleine of Carsey, a man for his virtues fit to be a hangman, and Soyce a very drunkard, and Warwick, who, in king Edward's days, lost one of his ears for his seditious talk, amongst whom was also one Robert King, a deviser of interludes, who was there present, and had doings there with the gunpowder; what he meant and did therein (he himself said he did it for the best and for quick dispatch) the Lord knoweth, who shall judge all. More of this I have not to say.

These four were appointed to set up the faggots, and to make the fire, which they most diligently did; and this Warwick cruelly cast a faggot at him, which struck him on his head, and cut his face, that the blood ran down. Then said Dr. Taylor, O friend, I have harm enough, what needeth that?

Sir John Shelton standing by, as Dr. Taylor was speaking, and saying the Psalm Miserere in English, struck him on the lips; You knave, said he, speak Latin, I will make thee. At last they kindled the fire; and Dr. Taylor, holding up both his hands, called upon God, and said, Merciful Father of heaven, for Jesus Christ my Saviour's sake, receive my soul into thy hands. So he stood still without either crying or moving, with his hands folded together, till Soyce with an halbert struck him on the head that his brains fell out, and the corps fell down into the fire.

Thus rendered this man of God his blessed soul into the hands of his merciful Father, and to his most dear Saviour Jesus Christ; whom he most intirely loved, faithfully and earnestly preached, obediently followed in living, and constantly glorified in death.

They that were present and familiarly conversant with Dr. Taylor, reported of him, that they never did see in him any fear of death, but especially, and above all the rest who besides him suffered at the same time, always shewed himself merry and chearful in the time of his imprisonment, as well before his condemnation, as after: he kept one countenance and like behaviour. Whereunto he was the rather confirmed by the company and presence of Mr. John Bradford, who was in the same prison and chamber with him.

The morning when he was called up by the sheriff to go to his burning, being suddenly awaked out of his sound sleep, he sat up in his bed, and, putting on his shirt, had these words, speaking somewhat thick after his accustomed manner; Ah vile thieves, ah vile thieves, rob God of his honour, rob God of his honour? Afterwards being risen and tying his points, he cast his arms about a great beam which was in the chamber between Mr. Bradford's bed and his; and there hanging by the hands, said to Mr. Bradford; O Mr. Bradford, what a notable sway I should give if I were hanged! meaning for that he was a corpulent and big man. These things I thought good here to note, to set forth and declare to those who shall read this history, what a notable and singular gift of spirit and courage God had given to this blessed martyr.

About the time Dr. Taylor was deprived of his benefice of Hadley, Sir Robert Bracher, a pretended protestant in king Edward's days, and afterwards a deadly enemy to the same religion, was one of them that so unmercifully thrust Dr. Taylor's wife and children out of the doors, as she herself hath testified: and notwithstanding the same, since became a protestant again.

A L E T T E R,

From the Rev. Dr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, to his WIFE.

DEAR WIFE, I pray God to be ever with us, through Christ, our only Mediator, Amen.

I am glad that Hadley has skill in judging of such packing ware as was brought thither, the first of May last. The preacher or rather packer, said, as I hear, that the scripture is full of dark sentences; but it is called of David a candle to our feet, and a light to our paths. Our Saviour calleth his word, the light which evil doers do flee from and hate, lest their deeds should be reproved thereby. St. Paul would have us walk as children of light; and not, in any wise, to continue in ignorance or darkness.

Now as to the packs of this preacher, I fear they were, as all other wares be, changed into stocks, even his very finest packing stuff against justification by faith only, and for the corporal presence of Christ's body, for praying for souls departed, and for auricular confession. Abraham's justification by faith, by grace, by promise, and not by works, is plainly set forth in the epistle to the Romans, chap. iv. and to the Galatians, chap. iii. and Abraham's works of obedience, in offering up his son so long after his justification, must needs be taken as a fruit of a good tree justifying before men, and not of justification before God; for then had man to glory in, then did Christ die in vain.

And whereas, chap. vi. of St. John, was alledged to prove, that Christ did give his body corporally in his supper, even as he had promised in the same chapter, it is most untrue, for he only gave his body sacramentally, spiritually, and effectually, in his supper to the faithful apostles, and corporally he gave it in a bloody sacrifice for the life of the world upon the cross once for all. There in his own person, in his own natural body, he bore all our sins. By whose stripes we are healed, as St. Peter sheweth, 1 Peter ii. and Isai. liii. Indeed receiving Christ's sacrament accordingly as it was instituted, we receive Christ's body and Christ's blood, even as I said before the apostles did.

But the popish mass is another matter. The mass, as it is now, is but one of Antichrist's youngest daughters, in which the devil is rather present and received, than our Saviour, the second person in Trinity, God and Man. O Lord God, heavenly Father, for Christ's sake, we beseech thee to turn again England to the right way it was in, in king Edward's time.

But to return again to the packer, rather than preacher, he bringeth St. Chrysostom, where he maketh a comparison between Christ's flesh and Elias's cloak cast down to Elizeus, when Elias was taken up in the fiery chariot; at length he saith, that Christ, ascended up to heaven, took his flesh with him, and also left his flesh behind him on earth.

The meaning is, he did ascend with his flesh, and left a memorial cloak of the same body and flesh, which he calleth his flesh, as he in the sacramental phrase calleth bread his body, because it representeth his body: and as in like manner of sacramental speech, a lamb was called the passover, the circumcision, God's covenant. He took up his flesh corporally, and left his flesh in mystery and sacrament spiritually. Or it may be said, that he left his flesh upon earth, that is, his mystical body, his faithful people; whom St. Paul calleth the members of his body, of his flesh, of his bones, Ephes. v. In the xlix. chapter of Genesis, there is no word of Christ's sacrament, but there is a prophecy of Christ's passion. And where he speaketh there of grapes and wine, it is as what is spoken of Christ in another place, where he saith, "I alone did tread the wine-press," meaning thereby, that Christ alone suffered painful passion for the redemption of sins, and for the consolation of his faithful soldiers.

It is not true, as the packer said, that Christ's infinite power may make his body to be in a thousand places at once, as a loaf in a thousand bellies: for then may Christ divide the parts of his body, as a loaf is divided, and so consumed, and then might scripture be false, appointing Christ's body to be but in one place, Acts iii. Phil. iii. Heb. iii. The articles of our faith tell us sufficiently where Christ's body is. It was never in two places at once, neither ever shall be, neither ever can be corporally and naturally, neither ever was, is, can, or shall be eaten so with any corporal mouths, as the Capernaïtes and the papists most erroneously and heretically do judge. If our Saviour Jesus Christ hath no other body natural than is made of the substance of bread, and is in a thousand places at once, as I have often said in Hadley, we are not yet redeemed, neither shall our bodies rise again, and be made like unto his glorious body. We are sure that our Saviour Christ's body is made of none other substance than of his mother the blessed virgin Mary's substance.

stance. We are sure that he taketh not the nature of angels, much less of bread. He only taketh on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. ii. In all things like unto us, sin only excepted. And this is a comfortable doctrine to us christians, believing stedfastly, as the true catholic faith is, that Christ hath but two natures, perfect God, and perfect man. Upon this rock Christ's church is built, and the gates of hell shall never prevail against it, Matt. xvi.

I speak nothing now of auricular confession, and praying for souls departed, because I do not hear what authors the packer brought in for this purpose. Sure I am, that he can bring no authentical and canonical warrant for such his pack-ware. He may say what he will of Hebricians and Grecians, and the flesh under forms, and not above forms, or above the board. He may conjure and convey, pass and repass, even what he will in such clouds and mists. He reproved the scriptures as full of darkness, and yet is full of darkness himself. He did wittily, to bring proofs out of Jewry, Turkey, and other strange places, for his round white cake, for that such his pedlary pelf-pack is contrary to the same simplicity of Christ's supper. He glanced at priests' marriage. He might against that have brought as ancient a doctor as any alledged out of Hebrew, for his mass and wafer cake, that is Dr. Devil. i. Tim. 4.

I wonder that he did not confute and confound St. Paul for the sentences written above the altar, of which he made mention in the pulpit. For he and his fellows are so profound, so excellent, so glorious, and triumphant clerks, that they can easily prove a man an ass, and writers in the bible, ignorant, simple, full of errors, full of heresies, and beggarly fools. Yet they will be called loving, faithful, and true christian people, defenders of the holy mother the church: but truly they take part with the prince of darkness, with Antichrist, with Jezebel, Apoc. ii. They will not be called Papists, Pharisees, Jews, Turks, Heretics, and so forth: but whatsoever they will be called, God's religion had never more evident adversaries, and that in all the chief points of it; no not then, when our Saviour Christ whipt such merchants out of the temple, calling them a company of thieves, Matt. xxi. God give them grace to repent. God be thanked that the nobility something of late hath spied and stopped their tyranny. O unhappy England! O more ungrateful people! sooner bewitched than the foolish Galatians. We have now no excuse.

We have undoubtedly seen the true trace of the prophetic, apostolical, primitive catholic church. We are warned to beware, lest we are led out of that way, society, and rule of religion. Now we shall shew what countrymen we are, whether spiritual and heavenly, or carnal and worldly. We had as true knowledge as ever was in any country, or at any time, since the beginning of the world, God be praised therefore. If Hadley, being so many years persuaded in such truth, will now forsake the same, and defile itself with the cake-god, idolatry, and other antichristianity thereunto belonging, let it surely look for many and wonderful plagues of God shortly. Though another have the benefice, yet, as God knoweth, I cannot but be careful for my dear Hadley. And therefore as I could not but speak, after the first abominable mass begun there, I being present no more, cannot but write now being absent, hearing of the wicked prophanation of my late pulpit by such a wiley wolf. God's love, mercy, goodness, and favour, hath been unspeakable, in teaching us the right way of salvation and justification: let us all have some zeal, some care how to serve him according to his good will written. The God of love and peace be ever in Hadley, through Christ our only advocate. Amen.

C H A P. IV.

An AFFECTING NARRATIVE, and HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of several PROTESTANTS, namely, Judge HALES, THOMAS TOMKINS, WILLIAM HUNTER, THOMAS CAUSTON, THOMAS HIGBED, WILLIAM PYGOT, STEPHEN KNIGHT, and JOHN LAURENCE; who were persecuted, tormented, and most of them burned, under the bloody Tyranny of BONNER, Bishop of LONDON.

STEPHEN GARDINER, having condemned and burned several great and learned men, he presumed that these examples would deter any one from speaking against; and opposing the popish religion, and his tyrannical proceedings; but in this imagination he found himself deceived; for within eight or nine days after sentence had passed against bishop Hooper and others, being the 8th of February, six other good christians were likewise brought before the bishops, to be examined for the same cause of religion. Stephen Gardiner seeing this became discouraged; and from that day meddled no more in such kind of condemnations; but referred the whole of this cruel business to Bonner, bishop of London; who supplied that part, as in the further process of this history will evidently appear. Bishop Bonner having taken the matter in hand, called before him in his consistory at St. Paul's (the lord mayor, and several aldermen sitting with him) the six persons, upon the 8th day of February, and on the next day, being the 9th, read the sentence of condemnation upon them, as appeareth in Bp. Bonner's own registers: such quick speed these men could make in dispatching their business at once. But because the death of these condemned martyrs did not follow before the next month of March, we will defer the prosecuting of them, till we come to the time and day of their burning.

What was the cause that their execution was so long deferred after their condemnation, we cannot precisely say, unless peradventure the sermon of Alphonsus, the Spanish friar, and the king's confessor, did some good; for when those six persons were cast upon Saturday the 9th of February, upon the day following, the 10th of February, the said Alphonsus preached before the king; in which sermon he did earnestly inveigh against the bishops for burning of men, saying plainly that they learned it not in scripture, to burn any for his conscience: but the contrary, that they should live and be converted: with many other things more to the same purport.

February 14, Dr. Robert Ferrar, bishop of St. David's, was sent towards St. David's, there to be condemned and executed. Touching whose martyrdom, forasmuch as it fell not before the month of March, we will defer the history thereof till we come to the day and time of his sufferings.

On the 14th day of February, the lord chancellor, and other bishops, caused the image of Thomas Becket to be set up over the mercer's chapel door, in Cheapside, London, in the form and shape of a bishop, with mitre and cross. But within two days after his erection, his two blessing fingers were first broken away, and on the next day (being the 17th of February) his head also was taken off: whereupon arose great trouble, and many were suspected: among whom one Mr. John Burnes, mercer, dwelling over-against the said chapel, was vehemently by the lord chancellor charged withal, as the doer thereof, and the rather for that he was a professor of the truth. Wherefore he and three of his servants were committed to prison; and at his delivery (although it could not be proved upon him) he was bound in a great sum of money, as well to build it up again as often as it should be broke down, as also to watch and keep the same. And therefore the image was again set up the 2d day of March ensuing; but the 14th day of the same month, in the night, the head was again the second time broke off: which thing was so heinously taken, that the next day, being the 15th, there was a proclamation made in London, that whosoever would tell who did strike off his head; (though he were of counsel, and not the principal doer (he should have not only his pardon, but also one hundred crowns or gold, with hearty thanks. But it was not known who did it.

February 18th, queen Mary at length, after long delay, made full answer to the king of Denmark's letters, who had written before two letters to the queen, in the behalf of Mr. Coverdale, for his deliverance, who at that time went under sureties, and was in great danger, had he ~~was~~ not been rescued by the suit and letters of the said king of Denmark.

On February 19th, there was a certain intimation set forth, and printed in the name of bishop Bonner, wherein was contained a general monition, and strict charge given to every man and woman within his diocese, to prepare themselves against Lent, then near approaching, to receive the glad tidings of peace and reconciliation sent from the pope, Julius III. by Poole, his cardinal and legate.

A remarkable and affecting Account of JUDGE HALES, whom the CRUELTY of GARDINER drove to an ACT of DESPERATION.

IN a former part of this work, mention was made of judge Hales, of whom we shall more particularly speak in this place; beginning with the conference between Stephen Gardiner, the bishop of Winchester, and him, he being in Westminster Hall with other judges to take his oath, October 6, 1553, declaring withal how false the excuse is of the papists, who so precisely by the law defend themselves, and say, that in all their doings they did nothing but by the law, to bear them out.

Lord Chancellor. MR. Hales, you are to understand, that as the queen's highness hath heretofore conceived a good opinion of you, especially for that you stood both faithfully and lawfully in her cause of just succession, refusing to set your hand to the book among others that were against her grace in that behalf; so now, through your own late defects against some of her highness's proceedings, you stand not well in her grace's favour; and therefore before you take any oath, it will be necessary for you to clear yourself.

Judge Hales. I pray you, my Lord, for what cause?

Lord Chancellor. Information is given, that you have indicted several priests in Kent for saying mass.

Judge Hales. My lord, it is not so: I indicted none; but indeed certain indictments of the like nature were brought before me at the last assizes there held, and I gave order therein as the law required. For I have professed the law, against which, in cases of justice, I will never, God willing, proceed, nor in any wise dissemble, but with the same shew forth my conscience; and if it were to do again, I would do no less than I did.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, Mr. Hales, your conscience is known well enough; I know you want not conscience.

Judge Hales. My lord, you may do well to search your own conscience, for mine is better known to myself than to you: and to be plain, I did as well use justice in your said mass-case by my conscience, as by law, wherein I am fully bent to stand in trial to the uttermost that can be objected. And if I have herein done any injury or wrong, let me be judged by the law; for I will seek no better defence, considering chiefly that it is my profession.

Lord Chancellor. Why, Mr. Hales, although you had the rigour of the law on your side, yet you might have had regard to the queen's highness's present doings in that case. And further, although you seem to be more than precise in the law, yet I think you would be very loth to yield to the extremity of such advantage as might be gathered against your proceedings in the law, as you have sometimes taken upon you in place of justice; and if it were well tried, I believe you should not well be able to stand honestly thereto.

Judge Hales. My lord, I am not so perfect, but I may err for want of knowledge. But both in conscience, and such knowledge of the law as God hath given me, I will do nothing but I will maintain it, and abide in it: and if my goods and all that I have be not able to counterpoise the case, my body shall be ready to serve the turn; for they be all at the queen's highness's pleasure.

Lord Chancellor. Ah, sir, you be very quick and stout in your answers. But as it should seem, that which you did was more of favouring the opinion of your religion against the service now used, than for any occasion or zeal for justice, seeing the queen's highness doth set it forth as yet, wishing all her faithful subjects to embrace it accordingly: and where you offer both body and goods in your trial, there is no such matter required at your hands, and yet you shall not have your own will neither.

Judge Hales. My lord, I desire not an obstinate will, but to shew myself as I am bound in love to God, and obedience to the queen's majesty, in whose cause willingly for justice sake, all other respects set apart, I did of late, as your lordship knoweth, adventure as much as I had. And as for my religion, I trust it be such as pleaseth God, wherein I am ready to adventure as well my life as my substance, if I be called thereunto. And so instead of my own power and will, the Lord's will, the Lord's will be fulfilled.

Lord Chancellor. Seeing you be at this point, Mr. Hales, I will presently make an end with you. The queen's highness shall be informed of your opinion and declaration. And as her grace shall thereunto determine, you shall have knowledge. Until such time you may depart as you came, without your oath: for as it appeareth, you are scarce worthy the place appointed.

Judge Hales. I thank your lordship: and as for my vocation, being both a burden and a charge more than ever I desired to take upon me: whensoever it shall please the queen's highness to ease me thereof, I shall most humbly with due content obey the same; and so he departed from the bar.

A few days after, Mr. Hales, at the command of the bishop, was committed to the King's-Bench, where he remained constant until Lent; then he was removed to the Compter in Bread-street, and from thence to the Fleet.

Being in the Fleet, what it was that he had granted the bishops, by their fraudulent assaults and persuasions; (namely, of Dr. Day, bishop of Chester, and of judge Portman, as it is thought, overcome at last) I have not to say. This is certain, that shortly after, he was brought to great repentance and terror of conscience: inasmuch, that for very anguish of heart he was ready to kill himself with his penknife when he was in prison.

It happened when supper time came that he should be called down, but he having little or no stomach to eat or drink, went immediately to bed, where he lay all night sobbing and groaning, and took little rest or sleep. At length when morning came, about six o'clock, he sent his servant for a cup of beer, under pretence as though he was thirsty and desirous to drink: whether this cause were true or feigned, is unknown; but his man was scarce got out of the chamber, when he with his penknife had wounded himself in divers places of his body, and, no doubt, intended to destroy himself; but his man meeting the butler, just when he had passed the chamber door, the latter was desired to fill the drink, and he, taking the cup, the other returned again unto his master, at the very time when he was working his own destruction; whereby Mr. Hales was hindered of his purpose. When the bishop of Winchester had knowledge of it, he straightway took occasion thereby to blaspheme the doctrine of the gospel, which he openly in the star-chamber called the doctrine of desperation. Mr. Hales being within a while after recovered of those wounds, and delivered out of prison, returned home to his house; where he either for the greatness of his sorrow, or want of counsel, or for that he would avoid the necessity of wearing mass, having all things set in order, a good while before that, pertaining to his last will and testament, casting himself into a shallow river, was drowned therein.

The unhappy end of this worthy judge was the cause of great sorrow and grief to all good men, and it likewise gave occasion to some divines to doubt with themselves, whether he was damned or saved. But notwithstanding God's judgments be secret, and we likewise in doubt upon what intent he did thus punish himself; neither again is any man certain, whether he did repent or not before the last breath went out of his body; I think (saith Mr. Fox) their opinion is more indifferent therein, who do rather disallow the example of the deed, than despair of his salvation.

O herwise,

Otherwise, if we will judge all those to hell that have departed the world after this sort, how many examples have we, in the first persecutions of the church, of those men and women, who being registered in the works of worthy writers, have notwithstanding their praise and commendation? Or what shall we think of those young men, who being sought for to do sacrifice to idols, did cast themselves down headlong, and break their own necks, to avoid such horrible pollutions of themselves? What shall we say of those virgins of Antioch, who, to the end they might not defile themselves with uncleanness and idolatry, through the persuasion of their mother, casting themselves headlong into a river together with their mother, did destroy themselves, although not in the same water, yet after the same manner of drowning as this Mr. Hales did? What shall we say of the other two sisters, who for the same reason did violently throw themselves into the sea, as Eusebius doth record? In whom though perchance there was no less confidence to bear out the pains which should be ministered unto them by the wicked, yet, their good desire to keep their faith and religion unspotted was commended and praised.

We mention these examples neither to excuse nor to defend the heinous fact of Judge Hales, which we could wish might be drowned in oblivion: and because we do not know, nor are able to comprehend the bottomless depth of the graces and mercies which are in Christ Jesus our Saviour, we will leave therefore his final judgment to the determination of him who is appointed judge both of the quick and dead.

The MARTYRDOM of the SIX PRISONERS before-mentioned, namely, TOMKINS, PYGOT, KNIGHT, LAURENCE, HUNTER, and HIGBED.

I.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of THOMAS TOMKINS, a Weaver in Shoreditch, who, having first his Hand burned by the bloody Bishop of LONDON, was afterwards burnt in Smithfield, March 16th, 1555.

THIS plain honest christian was by trade a weaver, and lived in the parish of Shoreditch, till he was summoned before the inhuman Bonner, and confined with many others, who renounced the errors of popery, in a prison in that tyrant's house at Fulham.

Under his confinement, he was treated by the bishop, not only unbecoming a prelate, but even a man: for the savage, because Tomkins would not assent to the doctrine of transubstantiation, had bruised him in the face, and plucked off the greatest part of the hair of his beard.

On another occasion, this scandal to humanity, because our martyr remained inflexible, nor would deviate in the least point from the pure and uncorrupted truths of the gospel, in the presence of several who came to visit him at his seat at Fulham, took this poor honest man by the fingers, and held his hand directly over the flame of a wax candle, having three or four wicks, supposing that, being terrified by the smart and pain of the fire, he would leave off the defence of the doctrine which he had received.

Tomkins thinking not otherwise, but there presently to die, began to commend himself unto the Lord, saying, O Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit, &c. In the time that his hand was burning, the same Tomkins afterwards reported to one James Hulse, that his spirit was so wrapt, that he felt no pain. In which burning he never shrunk, till the veins shrunk, and the sinews burst, and the water did spurt in Mr. Harpsfield's face: insomuch that Mr. Harpsfield, moved with pity, desired the bishop to stay, saying, that he had tried him enough.

The first EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

AFTER that Thomas Tomkins had been half a year in prison, about the 8th of February he was brought with several others before bishop Bonner sitting in his confistory, to be examined. To whom first was brought forth a certain bill or schedule subscribed (as appeareth) with his own hand, the 5th day of the same month, containing these words following:

"Thomas Tomkins, of Shoreditch, and of the diocese of London, hath believed and doth believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, but only a token and remembrance thereof, the very body and blood of Christ being only in heaven, and no where else.

"By me, THOMAS TOMKINS."

Whereupon he was asked, whether he did acknowledge the same subscription to be of his own hand. To which he granted, confessing it so to be. This being done, the bishop went about to persuade him with fair words, rather than with reasons, to relinquish his opinions, and to return again to the unity of the catholic church, promising if he would do so, to remit all that was past. But he constantly refused so to do. When the bishop saw he could not so convince him, he brought forth and read to him another writing, containing articles and interrogatories, whereunto he should come the next day and answer; in the mean time he should deliberate with himself what to do: and so the next day, being the 9th day of March, at eight o'clock in the morning to be present in the same place again, to give his determinate answer what he would do in the premises, and then either to revoke and reclaim himself, or else in the afternoon of the same day to come again and have justice (as he called it) administered unto him. The copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and administered the 8th Day of February, against THOMAS TOMKINS, with his own Hand subscribing to the same.

THOU dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word, really, truly, and in very deed, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as touching the substance thereof, which was conceived in the womb of the virgin Mary, and hanged upon the cross, suffering death there for the life of the world.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that after the consecration of the bread and wine prepared for the use of the sacrament of the altar, there doth remain the substance of material bread and material wine, not changed nor altered in substance by the power of Almighty God, but remaining as it did before.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe, that it is an untrue doctrine, and a false belief, to think or say, that in the sacrament of the altar there is, after consecration of the bread and wine, the substance of Christ's natural body and blood, by the omnipotent power of Almighty God, and his holy word.

I do so believe.

Thou dost believe that thy parents, kinsfolks, friends, and acquaintance, and also thy godfathers and godmothers, and all people did err, and were deceived, if they did believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there was, after consecration, the body and blood of Christ, and that there did not remain the substance of material bread and wine.

I do so believe.

By me THOMAS TOMKINS.

The second EXAMINATION of THOMAS TOMKINS.

THE next day being the 9th of February, at eight o'clock before noon, Thomas Tomkins was brought again before the bishop and his other assistants, where the afore said articles were propounded unto him: whereunto he answered as followeth:

To the first he said, that he did so believe, as in the same is contained.

The Burning of W<sup>m</sup> HUNTER, at Brentwood in Essex.

in Smithfield.*

The Papish party assembled in the morning of 1649, in London, at the house of C<sup>o</sup> Vane, and the Gallows, that had like a Monk with a black cross on his chest, of Q. Mary, the Papists were brought into the world against the will of the Parliament of London.

The Hanging of M<sup>r</sup> Muntie, a Protestant gentleman of 1649, on the rope-breaker, he was, who was to prevent his escape rather to die than to live, longer, dishonouring God.

To the second he said, that it was only bread and a participation of Christ's death and passion, and so do the scriptures teach.

To the third he said, he did believe it was a false doctrine, to believe and think as is contained in this article.

To the fourth, he did also believe the same.

After this answer, he did also subscribe his name to the said articles. Whereupon, the bishop drawing out of his bosom another confession subscribed with Tomkins's own hand, and also that article that was the first day objected against him, caused the same to be openly read, and then willed him to revoke and deny his said opinions, which he utterly refused to do; and therefore he was commanded to appear before the bishop again in the same place at two in the afternoon.

Agreeable to this mandate, being brought before the bloody tribunal of bishops, and pressed to recant his errors and return to the mother-church; he maintained his fidelity, nor would swerve in the least from the articles he had signed with his own hand. Having therefore declared him an obstinate and damnable heretic, they delivered him up to the secular power, and he was burned in Smithfield, March 6th, 1555, triumphing in the midst of the flames, and adding to the noble company of martyrs, who had preceded him, through the path of the fiery trial to the realms of immortal glory.

II.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HUNTER, an Apprentice in LONDON, aged Nineteen Years, who was pursued to Death by JUSTICE BROWN, and burned March 27th, 1555.

THIS adherent to the cause of Christ had been trained to the doctrines of the reformation from his earliest youth.

On queen Mary's succeeding to the crown, the priests were ordered to summon all their parishioners to receive the communion at mass the following Easter; and Hunter, who was then nineteen years of age, refusing to obey the summons, was threatened to be brought before the bishop.

His master fearful of incurring ecclesiastical censure, desired him to leave him for a time; upon which he quitted his service, went down to Brentwood, and resided with his father about six weeks.

One day finding the chapel open, he entered and began to read in the English bible, which lay upon the desk, but was severely reprimanded by an officer of the bishop's court, who said to him, William, why meddlest thou with the bible? Understandest thou what thou readeest? Canst thou expound scripture? He replied, I presume not to expound scripture; but finding the bible here, I read for my comfort and edification.

The officer then informed a neighbouring priest of the liberty the young man had taken in reading the bible; the priest therefore severely chid him, saying, Sirrah, who gave thee leave to read the bible and expound it?

He answered as he had done to the officer, and on the priest's telling him, that it became him not to meddle with the scriptures, he frankly declared his resolution to read them as long as he lived, as well as reproved the vicar for discouraging persons from that practice, which the scriptures so strongly enjoined.

On being declared an heretic by the vicar of his parish, and threatened with an information to the bishop of London, which was soon known to justice Brown, that unfeeling magistrate ordered the youth's father to search for him and produce him, on pain of being himself imprisoned; and, to prevent his father from incurring any danger, on meeting by accident, the young man accompanied him home, and was next day taken by the constable, and kept in the stocks forty-eight hours, before he was brought to the justice. He was there examined respecting his opinion of the sacrament of the altar, and, on being again charged with heresy, was sent to the bishop of London, where he persevered in the same sentiments he had before asserted; from which neither promises nor threatenings could move him. On this he was put in the stocks in the bishop's gate-house, for two days and nights, only with a crust of brown bread and a cup of water; and, at the end of this time, finding him still firm, he sent him to the convict prison, and ordered him to be heavily ironed, allowing him only a halfpenny a day to live on in bread and drink, where he remained for three quarters of a year, in which time he had been brought five times before the bishop, before the time of his condemnation on the 9th of February, in the consistory court of St. Paul's. At this time also the bishop took great pains to induce him to recant, particularly on the subject of the sacrament of the altar; but, on his still remaining immovable, he pronounced sentence, that he should go from that place to Newgate for a time, and from thence to Burntwood, there to be burned. Other persons also were condemned at the same time.

After this he made various tempting offers to this young man to recant, but to no purpose; and, after remaining in Newgate more than a month, he was sent to Burntwood for execution. Here he arrived on the Saturday before the annunciation of the blessed virgin Mary, and continued there until Tuesday, the 26th of March; on which morning Mr. Sheriff Brocket gave orders to prepare for his burning; but his son encouraged him to persevere in his integrity, and not to be afraid of the men which surrounded with bills and weapons. On this he assured him, that he was not afraid, having already reckoned what it would cost him.

As he had been confined at the Swan inn at Burntwood, many people of the country came to visit him and the others who were with him; and in particular his father and mother both encouraged him to continue to the end in that good way which he had begun. And he farther acknowledged to his father that, after a month, he had meat and clothing enough, with money, wood, and coals, and all things necessary. The night before his execution also, he dreamed of his being at the place, and of every thing which occurred there, as it actually happened, and as he had told those who attended him, after their having awaked him, in consequence of his making a noise to himself in his dream, to know if he wanted any thing.

The sheriff's son, after the conversation, could speak no more to him for weeping.

Hunter then plucked up his gown, and went forward cheerfully, the sheriff's servant taking him by one arm, and his brother by another; and going along he met with his father according to his dream, and he said to his son weeping, God be with thee, son William. And William said, God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort.

The justice who had apprehended him, and William Tyrill of the Braches, shewed much malignity, to embitter his closing moments; and the sheriff stated that he had a letter from the queen, with a promise of pardon; if he would recant. But all these were equally unavailing. A priest, with a popish book, also presented himself, just as he had seen in his dream, which he spurned at, and despised, saying, Away thou false prophet, beware of them, good people, and come away from their abominations, lest you be partakers of their plagues. Then the priest said, Look how thou burnest here, so shalt thou burn in hell. William answered, Thou liest thou false prophet; away thou false prophet, away.

There was a gentleman present which said, I pray God have mercy upon his soul. The people said, Amen, Amen. Immediately the fire was made.

Then William cast his psalter into his brother's hand, who said, William, think on the holy passion of Christ, and be not afraid of death.

And William answered, I am not afraid. Then lift he up his hands to heaven, and said, Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit; and calling down his head again into the smothering smoke, he yielded up his life for the truth, sealing it with his blood to the praise of God.

III.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOMS of WILLIAM PYGOT, STEPHEN KNIGHT, and the Rev. JOHN LAWRENCE: the two former were burned March 28th, the one at BRAINTREE, the other at MALDEN in ESSEX; and the latter at COLCHESTER, March 29th, 1555.

THESE two pious laymen, and one protestant divine, having been pointed out by the emissaries of Bonner and Gardiner, as maintaining religious opinions contrary to the doctrine and practice of the holy mother church. In consequence of this they were all three summoned to appear before bishop Bonner, at his consistory court at London, where they were severally questioned concerning their faith of the corporal presence in the sacrament.

Having respectively answered and subscribed that they were not substantially, but figuratively, the body and blood of Christ in that holy ordinance, they were severely reprimanded by the court, and admonished to recant their heretical opinions. After various unavailing endeavours to induce them to change their sentiments, bishop Bonner proceeded to pass sentence on them as irreclaimable heretics; and then degraded Mr. Lawrence with the usual ceremonies. After which, they were all three delivered to the sheriff, who conducted them to Newgate, where they remained until they were carried down into Essex, and there the 28th day of March, the said William Pygot was burned at Braintree, and Stephen Knight at Malden, who at the stake, kneeling upon the ground, said an appropriate prayer.

The next day, being the 29th of March, the said John Lawrence was brought to Colchester, and there being not able to go, (for his legs were much worn with heavy irons in prison, and also his body weakened with low keeping) was taken to the fire in a chair, and so sitting, was in his constant faith consumed with fire.

When he was burning, the young children came about the fire, and cried, as well as young children could speak, saying, Lord, strengthen thy servant, and keep thy promise: which thing, as it is rare, so it is no small manifestation of the glory of God, which wrought this in the hearts of these little ones; nor yet a little commendation to their parents, who from their youth brought them up in the knowledge of God and his truth.

IV.

The HISTORY of the FAITH, CONFESSION, and MARTYRDOM, of Mr. THOMAS CAUSTON, and Mr. THOMAS HIGBED, two worthy Gentlemen of ESSEX, who were burned, under the Tyranny of the bloody BONNER, the first at RAYLY, and the last at HORN-DEN-ON-THE-HILL, both in the County of ESSEX, March 26th, 1555.

MR. HIGBED and Mr. CAUSTON, two gentlemen in the county of Essex, the one at Horn-den on the Hill, the other of the parish of Thundurst, being zealous and religious in the true service of God; as they could not dissemble with the Lord, nor flatter with the world, so in time of blind superstition and wretched idolatry, they could not long lie hid and obscure in such a number of malignant adversaries, accusers, and servants of this world; but at length were discovered to Edmund Bonner, bishop of London, by whose command they were committed to the officers of Colchester, to be safely kept, and also a servant of Thomas Causton, who was nothing inferior to his master in true piety.

From their property and estimation, bishop Bonner came to Colchester, to prevent tumult, on whom all his flattering promises and alarming threatenings were unavailing; when, with other prisoners, they were removed to London, and brought before the consistory in St. Paul's, February 17, 1555, where they were demanded as well by the said bishop, as also by the bishop of Bath and others, whether they would recant their errors and perverse doctrine, and come to the unity of the popish church. But on their refusing so to do, the bishop assigned them to appear again the next day, being the 18th of February.

On which day, he read unto them several certain articles, and gave them respite until the next day to answer unto the same, and so committed them again to prison. The copy of which articles here followeth.

ARTICLES objected and ministered by Bishop BONNER, against THOMAS CAUSTON and THOMAS HIGBED.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Causton (or Thomas Higbed) hast been and art of the diocese of London, and also of the jurisdiction now of me Edmund, bishop of London.

Item, That thou wast in time past, according to the order of the church of England, baptized and christened.

Item, That thou hast godfathers and godmother, according to the said estate.

Item, That the said godfathers and godmother did then promise for thee, and in thy name, the faith and religion that then was used in the realm of England.

Item, That that faith and religion which they did profess and make for thee, was accounted and taken to be the faith and religion of the church, and of the christian people: and so it was in very deed.

Item, Thou coming to the age of discretion, that is to say, to the age of 14 years, didst not mislike nor disallow that faith, that religion, or promise then used and approved, and promised by the said godfathers and godmother, but for a time didst continue in it.

Item, That at that time, and also before, it was taken for a doctrine of the church, catholic and true, and every-where in Christendom then allowed for catholic and true, and to be the profession of christian men, to believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, after the consecration, there was and is by the omnipotent power and will of Almighty God, and his word, without any substance of bread and wine there remaining, the true and natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ in substance, which was born of the virgin Mary, and suffered upon the cross, really, truly, and in very deed.

Item, That at that time thy father and mother, all thine ancestors, all thy kindred, acquaintance and friends, and thy said godfathers and godmother did then so believe.

Item, That thyself hast had no just cause or lawful ground to depart or swerve from the said religion or faith, nor any occasion at all, except thou wilt follow and believe the erroneous opinion or notion, that hath been against the common order of the church.

Item, That thou dost know, or credibly hast heard, and dost believe, that John Hooper, late bishop of Gloucester, Laurence Saunders, priest, John Rogers, priest, Rowland Taylor, priest, John Lawrence, priest, William Pygot, Stephen Knight, William Hunter, and Thomas Tomkins, have been heretofore reputed, taken, and accounted as heretics, and also condemned as heretics, and so pronounced openly and manifestly; especially in holding and believing certain damnable opinions, against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and all have suffered death.

Item, That thou dost know, or credibly hast heard, and dost believe, that Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and Nicholas Ridley, naming himself bishop of London, Robert Ferrar, late bishop of St. David's, and Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, have been, and are at this present reputed, accounted, and taken as heretics and misbelievers, in maintaining and holding certain damnable opinions against the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar.

Item, That thou hast commended and praised all the said persons so erring and believing (or at leastwise some of them) secretly, and also openly, taking and believing them to be faithful and catholic people, and their said opinions to be good and true, and the same to the best

Item, That thou having heard, known, and understood all the premises thus to be as is aforesaid, hast not regarded all or any part thereof, but contrary to the same and every part thereof, hast attempted and done, condemning, transgressing, and breaking the promise, faith, religion, order, and custom aforesaid, and hast become, and art an heretic and misbeliever in the premises, denying the verity of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, and obstinately affirming, that the substance of the material bread and wine are there remaining, and that the substance of Christ's body and blood, taken of the virgin Mary, are not there in the said sacrament really and truly.

Item, That all the premises be true, notorious, famous, and manifest, and that upon all the same, there have and be amongst the said good people of the city of London, and diocese of the same, in great multitude, commonly and publicly, a common and public fame and opinion, and also in all places where thou hast been, within the said diocese of London.

These articles being given to them in writing by the bishop, the next day was assigned to them to give up and exhibit their answers unto the same.

On the 1st of March, the said Thomas Causton and Thomas Higbed, being brought before the bishop in the consistory, they there exhibited their answers to the articles, in which they declared the true faith.

Then the bishop, reading their former articles and answers to the same, asked them if they would recant; which when they denied, they were again dismissed and commanded to appear the Wednesday after, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 8th of March, the said Thomas Causton was first called to a second examination before the bishop, Mr. Fecknam and Dr. Stempe being in his palace, and there had read unto him his foresaid articles with his answers. The bishop now exhorted and persuaded him to recant, but he answered, No, I will not abjure. You said that the bishops that were lately burned are heretics, but I pray God make me such a heretic as they were.

Then leaving Mr. Causton, the bishop called for Mr. Higbed, using with him the like persuasions, but to no purpose: I have been, (said Higbed,) of this mind and opinion that I am now, these sixteen years, and do what you can, you shall do no more than God will permit you to do, and with what measure you measure us, look for the same again at God's hands.

They were again commanded to depart for that time, and to appear the next day in the consistory at St. Paul's, between the hours of one and three o'clock in the afternoon.

On the 9th of March, their third examination took place but with similar effect. Mr. Causton delivered in writing to the bishop (as well in his own name, as also in Mr. Thomas Higbed's) a confession of their faith, to which they would stand; and required leave to read the same, which, (after great suit,) being obtained, he read it openly in the hearing of the people. This confession proved them to be of the same faith with their late fellow sufferers.

The bishop then pronounced sentence, first against Thomas Causton, and then against Thomas Higbed. They were both delivered to the sheriffs, and by them sent to Newgate, where they remained 14 days. On the 23d of March they were taken from Newgate, at four o'clock in the morning, and led through the city to Aldgate, where they were delivered unto the sheriff of Essex, and there being fast bound in a cart, were shortly after brought to their several appointed places of burning; Thomas Higbed to Hornden on the Hill, and Thomas Causton to Rayly, (both in the county of Essex), where they did most constantly, the 26th day of the same month, seal their faith with their blood. Justice Brown and divers gentlemen in the shire were commanded to be present, for fear they should be taken from them. And thus much touching the apprehension, examination, confession, condemnation, and burning of these two godly and constant martyrs of God.

The EXAMINATIONS, CONDEMNATION, and MARTYRDOM, of Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's in WALFS; who gave his Life for the Truth, and was Burned in the Market-Place of the TOWN of CAERMARTHEN, March 30th, 1555.

THIS worthy and learned prelate having in the former reign, as well as since the accession of Mary, been remarkably zealous in promoting the reformed doctrines, and exploding the errors of popish idolatry; was summonsed, among others, before the popish and persecuting bishop of Winchester, (who was then likewise lord chancellor), and other commissioners set apart for the abominable work of devastation and massacre.

His principal accusers and persecutors were, George Constantine Walter, his servant; Thomas Young, chaunter of the cathedral, afterwards archbishop of York; Dr. Rowland Merrick, afterwards bishop of Bangor; Thomas Lee, and Hugh Rawlins, &c. at whose instance, Hugh Rawlins, a priest, and Thomas Lee, brother-in-law to the said George Constantine, did exhibit to the king's most honourable council, the following articles and informations, which, with the bishop's answer to the same, we here think good to insert.

A TRUE COPY of ARTICLES and INFORMATIONS exhibited by HUGH RAWLINS, and THOMAS LEE, against Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID's.

1. IMPRIMIS, When the said bishop first came to his diocese, he appointed his chancellor by his letters of commission, omitting the king's majesty's stile and authority, and grounded his said commission upon foreign usurped laws and authority, by force of which authority his said chancellor did visit certain deaneries of his said diocese, and admonished the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's aforesaid, against a certain day and place, for like intent and purpose, contrary to the king's highness's laws and statutes, and in derogation of his highness's supremacy.

2. Item, that the said chaunter and chapter, perceiving the fault of the said commission, took the same from the register into their custody, refusing to appear by virtue thereof, and by secret and charitable ways and means, did admonish the said bishop of the unlawfulness and faults of the said commission, and of the danger he had incurred for granting and executing the same; opening also unto him the effect of the statute made in the 28th year of our late sovereign lord Henry VIII. Which admonitions notwithstanding, the said Bishop neglecting the same, and continuing in his malicious doing, or inexcusable ignorance; about the 20th day of August, in the fourth year of the reign of our Sovereign lord that now is, did confer unto one John Evans, the vicarage of Pembrin, instituting him by authority of the old foreign usurped law, making no mention of the king's highness's authority, in contempt and derogation of the same.

3. Item, Whereas the chancellor and vicar general to the said bishop, did upon a lawful title, and by the king's highness's supreme authority, admit and institute one John Gough into the rectory of Haskard with the appurtenances, and gave out in the king's name under his highness's seal ecclesiastical, appointed for that office, with the test of the said bishop, and subscription of the said Chancellor, a mandate to induct accordingly, by virtue whereof the said John Gough was inducted by the official there into the real possession of the same rectory, with the rights and appurtenances to the same belonging; whereupon the register of the said diocese, at the request of the aforesaid chancellor, did signify the premises, with all the circumstances, before divers persons to the forenamed bishop: who notwithstanding did institute and cause to be inducted, one Harry Goddard, unto the same parsonage, making no mention of the king's majesty's authority nor supremacy; in contempt and derogation of the same his highness's crown and dignity, and in extolling the foreign usurped authority, contrary to the form of the statute, &c.

4. Item, The said bishop immediately after the unlawful institution and induction of Goddard, molested the said John Gough, lawfully instituted and inducted as before, citing him from place to place, objecting no matter unto him of long season, till at length he articulated: so taking upon him the cognition of the title of the whole fruits and patronage, in contempt of the king's highness's regal crown and dignity, and in derogation of the laws and statutes of this realm.

5. Item, He hath commonly made his collations and institutions, as he did his first commission, in his own name and authority, without expressing the king's supremacy.

6. Item, He made under his seal one collation, two institutions, three mandates to induct, in one vocation of one benefice, three several persons without order of law, or revocation of any of them, giving to every one like authority, title, and right. Whereby except good foresight, as well of justices of the peace, as of the friends, had not been there had ensued much inconvenience amongst the partakers of the entitled incumbents in that behalf.

7. Item, The same bishop decreeing caveats to be made in benefices, thereby knowing the titles litigious, instituted and caused to be inducted without trial of any title or due order of law.

8. Item, he directeth his mandates of induction unto private men, and not to the archdeacon nor his officials: contrary to the law and custom used in that behalf. Notwithstanding he hath been counselled to the contrary by learned men.

9. Item, Having no manner of knowledge nor practice in the law, he sitteth every day in harvest, and other times, upon causes, without the assistance of the learned in the law, having with him only an unlearned boy, who is no notary, to his scribe, neither observing the law, nor yet reasonable order: and therefore doth no good, but triflith the time, as may appear by his acts, if he have them to shew.

10. Item, He and his officers, by his knowledge, used to dispense with marriages, to be solemnized without banns, contrary to the laws and ordinances in that behalf.

11. Item, Whereas one Thomas Prichard, a chaplain of his, solemnized matrimony in a private house without banns, and that between a priest and a sister of her's that was appointed to be married with the said priest that day; he also being a parson, and leaving his cure unserved that day being Sunday: and notwithstanding that one of the king's council in the marches of Wales informed the said bishop of some misdemeanors, requiring due reformation thereof, he hath done nothing therein, but put the same chaplain in office, and made him commissary general since that time, bearing a special favor to the rest of the offenders.

12. Item, Whereas one Meredith ap Thomas his household-servant, was accused by one Sage Hughes, to have been father of her child; the said bishop, without acquittal of his servant, caused him to sue the parents of the said Sage of infamy, first in his principal consistory, and from thence before a commissary of his, being his household chaplain; and at last took the matter before himself, railing against all his officers, because they proceeded not after his partial affection, and against the law, that honest men of Caermarthen, where he sat upon the cause, judged him to be, or at the least to have been distracted of his wit; and by this partial handling, the cause remaineth unfinished, and the child without a father.

13. Item, Whereas one Jenkin Ph. accused William Chambers, a servant of the bishop's that found this Williams in an adulterous manner with his wife, by reason whereof the bishop expelled the wife out of his house, the said infamy not purged, the said parties have been both again in the bishop's house and service since that time, to the evil example of others.

14. Item, By this unlawful sequestration of the fruits of the benefices of Langattock and Lanvihangel, by the indiscreet handling of the same, there were raised the number of four hundred people or more, who made much disturbance, to the great danger of the inhabitants thereabout, had it not been pacified by the discreet means of sir John Vaughan, knight.

15. Item, By this unlawful collation of the prebend of Lanbister to one Stephen Green, a chaplain of his, by covenant and promise to maintain the suit, by whose crafty and indiscreet handling of the same, there was raised in the county of Radnor, the 19th day of August last past, about three or four hundred men to like danger, but that the matter was stayed by John Bradshaw, Rice ap Glin, and Stephen ap Rice; justices of the same county; who with great danger to themselves and their's, pacified the matter, committing an hundred of the offenders to ward.

16. Item, Such as he owes displeasure unto, he citeth from place to place, and day to day, only for their vexation, laying no matter against them; and being divers times required the copy of his proceedings against them to the intent they might answer accordingly, and be at their lawful defence; he denied to all such persons the copies of his proceedings.

17. Item, He and his officers wink at the manifest and open crimes of his favourers and adherents, to the evil example of the whole diocese, and abuse the censure of excommunication and suspension, making it an instrument of revenge against such as they do not favor.

18. Item, Having received payment of the king's majesty's subsidy, due in Oct. the fourth year of his grace's reign, of the aforesaid chaunter of the cathedral church of St. David's, and Rowland Meyrike, two of the residentiaries there, before Christmas last, he unjustly, of a premeditated mind and purpose, afterwards certified them for recusants, to their ruin, if they had not been admonished of his cruel purpose, and provided lawful defence for the same.

19. Item, The said bishop celebrating matrimony in his own person, dispensed, contrary to the book of ordinance, with the parties married, for not receiving the holy communion; the parties both being young and lusty persons, having no reasonable cause wherefore they should abstain. At which celebration the bishop communicated not himself. And further, the communion was celebrated by a chaplain of his, with superstitious bowings, kneelings, and knockings both by the chaplain that ministered, and by all the company; only one other priest communicating for the manner.

20. Item,

20. Item, Where the official of the archdeacon of Caermarthen, in his visitation within Caermarthen, found, contrary unto the said ordinance, an altar-set up in the body of the church, for the celebration of the communion, and caused the said altar to be taken away, and a table to be set in the middle of the church; the bishop after the same commanded the vicar of Caermarthen to set the table without the chancel again for the ministration of the communion.

21. Item, He being often in Caermarthen, and other places in the chancel at the time of the holy communion, not only tarried there himself, neither communicating nor ministering bare-headed and uncovered, reverently kneeling; but also permitting the people there to continue, the chancel and choir full, kneeling and knocking their breasts. Which manner is yet used in all the diocese, without any reformation or gainsay of him or any of his officers.

22. Item, Whereas superstitious praying upon beads is not only ungodly, but reproved in the king's majesty's injunctions; the said bishop meeting many with beads in their hands never rebuked any of them.

23. Item, The said bishop being in the pulpit, and seeing divers corpses within the church, with a great number of lights upon them, never spoke against any of them.

24. Item, Whereas the ordinance willeth, that no children be baptized but upon the Sunday, or holy-day, (only cases of necessity excepted) he, having two children himself born without danger, caused one of them to be baptized on the week-day. And by his example, without any contradiction or motion of reformation, it is used, as it hath been accustomed, in all the diocese commonly, contrary to the book of ordinance in that behalf.

25. Item, From his first coming into the diocese, he hath had, and yet hath his only study, labour, and practice, to survey land, and to look for mines, &c. neglecting his own bounden duty to apply to his book and preaching.

26. Item, He keepeth no manner of hospitality, but hath his servants' table in one parlour with him, left any strangers should approach his servants being at their meat.

27. Item, He is commonly talking not of godliness, but of worldly matters, as baking, brewing, inclosing, ploughing, mining of mill-stones, discharging of tenants, and such like, not only at his table, but also most commonly at other places.

28. Item, He hath warned divers tenants out of their lands, which they and their ancestors have enjoyed for their rents, these hundred years and more, and occupied with tillage; which he said he would inclose, and being sued to by poor men, because of quietness, he answered, The crows shall eat the corn, rather than ye shall have any profit thereof.

29. Item, When the vicars choral of St. David's, for relief of their hospitality, had an island of his called the Bishop's-isle, for 40s. rent, which he let to a chaplain of his for 5l. by the year; and where, at the suit of the said vicars it was granted by the bishop in the whole chapter, that the vicars should have it for years at 40s. rent, and pay 20l. entry; he now covetously, and against his promise openly made, denieth the same, except the vicars would give 50l.

30. Item, He caused the curate of St. David's to warn their tenants out of their said lands in the pulpit, to the great offence of the people, who were wont to have God's word preached there; and so they said to the curate at that time.

31. Item, To the ploughing of a pasture not above ten days work, in lent, anno 1549, he had 32 ploughs in one day, and those ploughs the priest bade in the church, contrary to the statute of Gomortha in that behalf provided, and to the evil example of gentlemen in that country.

32. Item, Where the king's majesty, of godly remembrance, Henry VIII. appointed at Brecknock a school-master, usher, reader of divinity, a minister, and certain scholars, and for the maintenance thereof appointed 40l. and 12l. of the pensions and revenues of Brecknock; the bishop finding it so furnished, has neither reader nor minister there, covetously converting their stipends to his own use.

33. Item, The bishop was twice in one day presented in the great court, held in the court of Caermarthen, for inclosing and covetously incroaching on the king's high-way.

34. Item, He covetously continueth purchasing of lands, buying of cattle, merchandise, and other things, being indebted a notable sum to the king's majesty, as may appear by his accounts in the court of tenths, and first fruits.

35. Item, Whereas one Lewis John Tho. Bool, putting from him his lawful wedded wife, upon Christmas-eve last, without banns, had marriage solemnized with a concubine of his in a church within three miles of the bishop's abode at that time: the bishop since knowing the premises, has not only of a covetous mind entered into a familiarity with the said Lewis, and bought a piece of land of him, but also ever since has (to have his lands cheap) left both the parties and priest unpunished, using him so familiarly, that whereas a sumner cited the parties to appear among other criminals for the same fact, the bishop commanded the said sumner to let him alone, and so they all remain unpunished.

36. Item, Whereas the whole chapter of St. David's, (as it was thought) was in assured amity with the bishop, they all being his officers or chaplains, he procured them to be impleaded with a writ of quo warranto in the King's-bench, keeping the writ with him secretly, at least three months, not delivering it but only ten days before the day of their appearance, the parties being seven days journey from London.

37. Item, He is a wilful wrong doer, and troubler of men in their rights, entering upon their lawful possessions, stirring thereby much contention, and so notably known to the offence of the country.

38. Item, Whereas the bishop aforesaid was appointed in August, 1547, and consecrated in September following, he never came into the diocese himself, nor sent or appointed any officer there before the month of April, 1548, to the great disorder of the king's majesty's subjects, lack of reformation, and administration of justice.

39. Item, During his visitation, the said bishop did not endeavour himself to see reformation, but rode surveying of lands, appointing vain inclosures, and such other things. Which are no parts of the office to him committed, nor yet proper at that time.

40. Item, The visitation finished, he neither appointed his officers to examine the clergy of the places of scripture to them appointed to be studied in the same visitation, nor has hitherto effectually gone about any good reformation, according to the ordinances of this realm.

41. Item, The bishop since his coming to the diocese never administered the communion, saving only twice that he ordained certain deacons; but in every thing (save that he sometimes preaches) ordereth himself like no minister, nor man of his vocation.

42. He hath so alienated himself from study, that he preaches indiscreetly, discrediting the office, not only untruly reporting the scriptures, but also preaching the ten commandments in one place in declaration of the eighth of them, for lack of stuff, the pith of his matter was matrimony of priests.

43. Item, The 13th day of September last, he ordained certain deacons, and making his exhortation, he taught that a man was not bound to forgive, but him that asketh forgiveness: and being admonished by a letter better to declare the same, because that divers were offended with that doctrine; he hath hitherto deferred so to do, to the maintenance of malicious hearts in these parts.

44. Item, Since the 1st day of August, 1549, unto the feast of Candlemas last, he hath preached but two or three sermons, of which one was preached at Aberguilly upon St. Stephen's day last, to a great audience that understood no English, being but a mile from Caermarthen, an English town, and chief of his diocese.

45. Item, Since his ordinary visitation which was finished in July 1548, he hath neither preached, nor caused to be preached in the towns of Tinby, Pembroke, nor Haverford, being English towns, not much distant from the place of his abode.

46. Item, The churches appropriated to the bishop have no paraphrases in English, and few of them bibles.

47. Item, The churches of the diocese for the most part, and the clergy almost every one, lack paraphrases, notwithstanding there hath been these two years, and yet be a great number of them to be sold in the diocese.

48. Item, To declare his folly in riding, he useth a bridle with white studs and snaffle, white Scottish stirrups, with spurs, a Scottish pad, with a little staff of three quarters long, which he hath not only used superstitiously these four or five years, in conversation oftentimes boasting what countries he has compassed and measured with the same staff.

49. Item, He hath made a vow, that he will never wear a cap; for he says, it is comely wearing of a hat, and so cometh in his long gown and hat, both into the cathedral church, and to the best town of his diocese, sitting in that sort in the king's great sessions, and in his consistories, making himself a mock to the people.

50. Item, He said that he would go to the parliament on foot: and to his friends that dissuaded him, alledging that it is not meet for a man in his place; he answered, I care not for that, it is no sin.

51. Item, Having a son, he went before the midwife to the church, presenting the child to the priest, and giving his name Samuel, with a solemn interpretation of the name, appointing also two godfathers and two godmothers, contrary to the ordinances, making his son a monster, and himself a laughing-stock throughout all the country.

52. Item, He daily useth whistling to his child, and says that he understood his whistle, when he was but three days old. And being advertised by his friends, that men laughed at his folly, he answered, They whistle their horses and dogs, and I am contented: they might also be contented that I whistle my child, and so whistled him daily, all friendly admonition neglected.

53. Item, In his ordinary visitation, among other his surveys, he surveyed Milford Haven, where he espied a seal-fish tumbling. And he crept down to the water side, and continued whistling there the space of an hour, persuading the company that laughed at him, that by his whistling he made the fish to tarry there.

54. Item, Speaking of scarcity of herrings, he laid the fault to the covetousness of fishers, who in the time of plenty took so many, that they destroyed the breeders.

55. Item, Speaking of the alteration of the coin, he wished that what metal soever it was of, the penny should be in weight worth a penny of the same metal.

56. For a conclusion, The said bishop in all his doings, since he came to his diocese, hath behaved himself most unmeet for a man of his vocation, being for a minister of justice, an abuser of the authority to him committed; for a teacher of the truth, and reformer of superstition, a maintainer of superstition without any doctrine of reformation; for a liberal and hospitable, an insatiable covetous man; for a diligent overseer, wilful and negligent; for an example of godly wisdom, given wholly to folly; for merciful, a cruel revenger; and further, for a peacemaker, a sower of discord. And so in all his behaviour a discrediter and slanderer of his vocation, and a deceiver of all men, that had hope he should do any reformation. For he yet hath neither brought into his diocese, nor hath belonging unto him, any learned preacher. But such learned preachers as he found in the diocese at his entry, he so vexeth and disquieteth, that they cannot attend to apply their preaching for the defence of their livings, against his quarrellous inventions, and unjust pretensions.

After these wrangling articles and informations were given up, then the bishop was called for to answer, the hearing whereof was committed unto Dr. Wotton, and sir John Mason, knight, who likewise received the bishop's answers to the aforesaid articles, the copy and effect of which answers hereafter follow.

The ANSWER of Dr. ROBERT FARRAR, Bishop of St. DAVID'S, to the ARTICLES ministered against him.

TO the 1st article he says, That after lawful admonition in the king's majesty's name and authority, from the said bishop (being then at London) given to the chaunter and chapter of St. David's, for visitation at a certain day there to be entered; the said bishop himself for such purpose coming into the diocese, knowing also that the chaunter, and one of the canons of that church, and late before commissaries in that diocese, had not only by their own evil examples and winking at the faults of others, or neglecting to correct the same, left there among priests and others much detestable whoredom; but had also spoiled the cathedral church of crosses, chalices, and censers, with other plate, jewels, and ornaments of the church, to the value of four or five hundred marks or more, for their own private lucre (the church remaining even yet very vile, and in great decay), and had also made further under their chapter seal many blanks, to the number of twelve or more, vacant seats, without the king's majesty's licence or knowledge; therefore he brought with him one Edmund Farlee, batchelor of law, commended by Dr. Young and Dr. Nevison to him, as a man sufficient in faithful truth, and learning, to be his chancellor. To whom he granted and sealed a commission for that purpose, giving credit to him in his faculty, concerning the draught and form thereof. But the king's majesty's stile of supremacy was fully set forth in the same commission. Whether there were any default of formal words in setting forth of the king's authority therein, he is not certain; for he committed the doing thereof to his chancellor, who was commended to him for a learned man. And the bishop says, that he never did ground the commission upon any foreign usurped laws or authority: neither did his said chancellor by force of such authority visit any deanry of the said diocese, nor gave any admonition to the chaunter and chapter there, by force of that commission, for any like intent or purpose, but only offered in the king's majesty's name and authority (to the said bishop committed) to enter visitation of the chaunter and chapter of the cathedral church, at another day to be executed by the bishop himself, for the reformation of the chapter church, and ministers there, according to the king's gracious ordinances and injunctions in that behalf. But the aforesaid chaunter and canon of the church, before the sight of any commission, stubbornly answered the said chancellor, that they would not receive him, nor any other to visit them, except he were of their chapter. And further, desiring to see his commission, he delivered the same into their hands, who would not deliver it him again. And so it may appear that he did nothing by force of that commission.

2. To the 2d article he says, That they opened not unto him the danger of any statute, to his knowledge and remembrance. Nevertheless, he not knowing any default in the said commission, and certainly minding with all diligence the faithful execution of his office of preaching, and visiting the whole diocese in his own person, by the king's majesty's authority, for the conservation of God's peace and the king's, in that dangerous time of rebellion, then beginning to arise in other places, did neglect and laid aside the stubborn behaviour and wicked doings of the said chaunter and canon, and agreed with them, omitting all contempts and reproaches towards him and his said chancellor, and all manner of contention by them done, fearing else that through their unquietness some tumult might have risen among the people there; and did also make the said chaunter his chancellor, and canon his commissary, according to their ambitious desires, to appease their malice in that dangerous time. And further he says, that he made collation to sir John Evans of the vicarage of Penbrin, what day or time he remembereth not, by any old foreign usurped authority, but by the king's authority only, making ing full mention of the king's stile and authority in the same collation.

3. and 4. To the 3d and 4th he says, That whereas he had granted to George Constantine the office of a register, who brought unto him a commission for the chancellorship, to be sealed and delivered to the aforesaid chaunter of St. David's, desiring the said bishop to seal it, he utterly refused so to do, because the said George had put therein a clause of admitting clerks into benefices; which authority the said bishop would not in any wise grant, reserving the examination and admission of clerks only to himself, for the avoiding of wicked bribery and partiality. Whereupon the said George and the chaunter promised the said bishop by their faith and truth, before three or four honest witnesses, not to execute that clause of institution into benefices, but only to those clerks whom the bishop did first examine and admit, and send unto them to be instituted and inducted; upon which promise the bishop sealed the said commission, and after that time the parsonage of Haskard being void, and by reason of lapse devolved to the bishop's gift for that time, he conferred it on one Henry Goddard, with a collation of institution by the king's authority, not extolling any foreign usurped authority. In which collation or institution is fully mentioned the renunciation of the bishop of Rome, and all foreign power and authority, with the full stile of his majesty's supremacy. And this collation of the church of Haskard he gave, before he understood or knew that his chancellor had given out the like, and he surely thinketh his collation was the first. That notwithstanding, the said George Constantine, and the said chaunter having a vowson determined by reason of lapse, admitted and instituted one John Gough, to the said parsonage of Haskard, by virtue of their expired vowson, and sealed his institution with a wrong seal, (because they had not the right seal of office to that purpose) contrary to their former earnest promise, and the bishop's right, and without any manner of warning or fore-knowledge thereof to him given; which thing by them untruly done, the said George Constantine nevertheless came to the bishop's house and there did write with his own hand the letters of induction for the said Henry Goddard, priest, comprising in the same the whole sum of the institution or collation which the said bishop had made, and the same George did seal the said letters of induction with his own hand, finding no manner of fault therein, nor making any word or mention of his and the chaunter's former wrong doing, but so departed for that time. And afterwards he came again, and shewed the bishop what they had done before concerning the parsonage aforesaid. And further, the said defendant saith, that he did not molest the said John Gough, but lawfully did call him in the king's majesty's name, not for any title of patronage, but to know whether he was parson to Haskard, and how he was there-to admitted, instituted, and inducted, and by what authority he presumed to preach there, without the king's majesty's licence, with other like lawful demands; whereunto he sturdily refused to give answer, and saith, that the article contained in his accusation, namely, "Item, He is interrogated under what title he holds the rectory of Haskard," was not ministered unto the party in that sort, so far as he knoweth, but in these words or like, "How did he get admission into the rectory," &c.

5. To the 5th he saith, That albeit George Constantine, register, did wilfully withdraw his bounden service due to the king's highness, and to the said defendant in the king's name, refusing to attend either by himself, or his sufficient deputy for writing of records and other instruments, yet the said defendant made his collations and institutions in his own name, not by his own authority, nor by another, save only the king's authority, according as he hath declared in his answer to the first article, expressing in them the king's supremacy with the bishop's own name and seal of office, as he ought to do, according to the provision of the king's statute in such a case.

6. To the 6th he saith, That the vicarage of Penbrin being void, he, as right patron thereof to his knowledge, conferred it to John Evans, clerk, with letters of institution and induction; and after, when the king's presentation came to him for one David Jenkin, clerk, he desired fourteen days respite at that time, either to shew ancient record for his right, and then the matter to stand to the determination of the law, or else if he shewed not, both he and his clerk to give place to the king's clerk, which condition was by sir Thomas Jones, knight, Dr. Meyrick, and the said David Jenkin, received; and an institution with an induction was made conditionally to be put in the hands of sir Thomas Jones, knight, for safe custody of the king's clerks' behalf, after the fourteen days to be executed at the hands of the said defendant, if he failed to shew. Within which time the said defendant did shew an old ancient record, declaring the full right of patronage on the said defendant's behalf, and so that institution and induction was never by the said defendant put in execution. Nevertheless, the said David Jenkin (contrary to his promise and oath, giving thereupon his right hand to the said sir Thomas Jones, knight) took advantage by the said writing, without knowledge of the said defendant. After which time the lord chancellor, by his letters written to the said defendant, advertised him, to admit one John ap Powell, clerk, presented by virtue of the vowson which the lord chancellor judged to be good, and so to be admitted notwithstanding his former presentation, whereby he would not bar the other man's right. And so this defendant made one collation, two institutions, and three mandates, doing no wrong thereby to his knowledge. And further (he saith) that there was no business nor unquietness about the said possession of the vicarage, but this defendant giving place, was content to lose his right for that time.

7. To the 7th he saith, That as he now remembereth, he never decreed any caveats to be made in benefices, neither did institute nor cause to be inducted any into benefices, being known to him litigious.

8. To the 8th he saith, That because the archdeacons be absent from their offices, and have not had faithful diligent officials, he hath directed his mandates to them or their officials, or to other lawful persons in that behalf, so far as he knoweth.

9 and 10. The 9th and 10th articles he denieth as very untrue.

11. To the 11th he saith, that whereas sir Thomas Jones, knight, advertised him, that Thomas Prichard had celebrated matrimony in a private house, betwixt a certain priest and woman, whose sister had refused the same, the said Prichard leaving his own cure unserved on that Sunday, this defendant did put the same Thomas Prichard to penance for so doing, marrying them without banns. And whereas he made the said Thomas Prichard, who is a bachelor of law, his commissary; it was for the respect of learning in the law, thereby faithfully to execute his office according to justice. And the said defendant did never favour nor bear with any man wittingly in his wrong doings. He confesseth that the matrimony was solemnized in a private church, and that the cure was that day unserved.

12. To the 12th he saith, That it is slanderous and utterly untrue. And that one John Hughes, priest, made Sage Hughes (daughter to his step-mother) a harlot at eleven years of age, and after married openly to another man, being minister thereof himself. After which doing he took her away from her husband again, and kept her, alledging a former contract. And when the said John Hughes was lawfully convicted before the said bishop, in open court at Caermarthen, of that his abominable adultery, claiming the king's pardon thereof, yet the said Sage confessed, that he had to do with her the night before that day of appearance. Which later crime he denied. Nevertheless she proved with child, affirming, both before the birth and after, the child to be his, the midwife and others being witnesses thereof. Yet notwithstanding, George Constantine, as a wicked encourager of the said priest in his naughty doings, with the help of the aforesaid chaunter, first uttered that Meridith Thomas was the father of the said child: which matter was ordered in the ecclesiastical court according to justice, without any partial affection of the said bishop, or of any other to his knowledge.

13. To the 13th he saith, It is utterly false so far as he knoweth.

14. To the 14th he saith, That by lawful sequestration in the king's majesty's name, he committed the custody of the fruits of Langatnoke and Lanvihangel to two honest men, for the behoof of the king's first fruits and tenths, and of the next incumbent, and further he did not meddle nor minister any cause of unquietness in that behalf.

15. To the 15th he saith, That he made a collation, (lawful, as he supposeth) of the prebend of Lanbister, to Stephen Greene, his chaplain, without any covenant or colour, and further he did not meddle in that behalf.

16. To the 16th he saith, All is untrue as far as he knoweth.

17. To the 17th he saith, It is untrue for his own part, and his officers, as far as he knoweth.

18. To the 18th he saith, It is untrue as far as he knoweth, and that he did certify the recusants justly, as he thinketh, because they refused wilfully to pay the king's whole subsidy of their whole dividends, as it standeth in the king's book, pertaining to the canons resident.

19. To the 19th he saith, That after a travel of fourteen miles, being not able fasting to celebrate the communion, in a chapel within the house of sir Thomas Jones, knight, one of the king's majesty's honourable council of the marches of Wales, this defendant celebrated matrimony without receiving the communion for the causes above said, betwixt Mr. Griffith Rice, and the daughter of the said sir Thomas Jones, according to the king's ordinances. And Thomas Prichard, priest, administered the holy communion there without any superstition, to this defendant's knowledge: and the married persons not disposed to receive the holy communion, he could not compel them against their consciences, and saith, that he did not dispense with them, as it is contained in the article.

To the slanderous and untrue CHARGE of maintenance of SUPERSTITION, &c. he saith, that he did not maintain any SUPERSTITION, contrary to the King's Ordinances and Injunctions, but abhorring in his Heart all SUPERSTITION, hath travelled and doth travel to abolish the same by True Doctrine, and doing as much as he can, with the King's Peace, among his People there.

20. TO the 20th he saith, That George Constantine, in the third year of his majesty's reign, not regarding the dangerous time of rebellion in other places, rashly caused to be pulled down, without any authority known to this defendant, the communion altar in Caermarthen church, by his own presumptuous mind, appointing the use thereof in another place of the church, not without grudge of the people. Wherefore the Bishop fearing tumult, commanded the vicar to set up the communion table (for the time) near to the place where it was before.

21. To the 21st he saith, That he has been divers times in the quire of Caermarthen, and hath tarried there in the communion time, not communicating himself, and that in every church where he cometh on the holy-day to preach, or to pray, he kneeleth in the quire bare-headed, as well at matins before the communion, as at evening song after, without any superstition: he thinketh it not necessary for the communion's sake to leave kneeling to Christ. But he hath diligently taught the people not to kneel nor knock to the visible shew or external shew of the sacrament. And the choirs of Caermarthen and other places there, are not close at the sides, so that the people may come in and go out at their pleasure. Moreover the king's ordinances do not authorize him to rebuke the people for knocking on their breasts, in token of repentance of their sins; nor for kneeling, in token of submission to God for mercy in Christ.

22. To the 22d he saith, That in the time of the rebellion in Devonshire and Cornwall, threatening to come into Wales, he taught the people the true form of prayer, according to God's holy word, and declaring the prayer upon beads to be vain and superstitious, yet durst not for fear of tumult forcibly take from any man his beads, without authority. And touching the not reproving of such as he should meet, wearing beads, he remembereth not that he hath so done, unless it were in the rebellion time, at which time he durst not rebuke such offenders.

23. To the 23d he saith, That he being in the pilpit, his face towards the people, did not see the lights, if any were set about the corpse behind his back till after that he came down to the pulpit. But he with George Constantine and the aforesaid chaunter, sitting in the church, in Caermarthen, to hear causes, and seeing the vicar with other priests, with song and lights bringing a corpse up to the church, called forthwith the vicar and priests, and rebuked them in open court, as cormorants and ravens, flying about the dead carcasses for lucre sake.

24. To the 24th he saith, That he caused the one child being born with great peril of death to the mother, and itself lying for dead a certain space after, to be christened on the working day: the other child was christened on the working day, because both father and mother, and all other people there were in peril of death by reason of the sudden sweat, which all men feared at that time. And touching the rest of the accusation, which is, that by that example, it is used after the old accustomed fashion, he knoweth no such thing.

To the CHARGE of CROUOUSNESS he saith, His doings prove the contrary, as his Neighbours know.

25. AND the 25th article he utterly denieth.

26. To the 26th he saith, That his hall at Aberguilly being ruinous, he useth for his hall a great chamber adjoining, for himself and his servants, and all manner of strangers, and besides twenty persons in house daily. What other hospitality he keepeth, honest neighbours can testify.

27. To the 27th he saith, That his talk is according to his hearers, that is to say, reverently and truly of faith, love, and honest life, according to scripture to like auditors; and to other irreverent and rash tumulters of scriptures and holy doctrine, he doth talk of honest worldly things with godly intent; and that he doth not most commonly talk of such things as are expressed in this article, but when he hath honest occasion so to do.

28. The 28th he saith, is untrue, and that he hath warned no man out of his lands; but where he is destitute of necessary provision, and would have part of his own demain from certain freeholders, having it only from year to year at pleasure, he cannot obtain it without brawling. Wherefore he suffereth them to keep it even yet still, against right and reason. And touching the rest, that he had rather the crows should eat it, &c. he never spake any such word.

29. To the 29th he saith, That whereas his predecessor bishop Barloe, did let to farm the isle of Ramsey to one William Brown, after whose hands this defendant received it into his own possession, the vicars of St. David's being dispossessed of it long before; he did let it over to Stephen Green, for 40s. the ground, as it was before, and 3l. more for seals, coney, and fowls there; and he knoweth of no right the vicar's choral had therein, who did refuse when this defendant did diligently upon reasonable conditions offer the same unto them: and this defendant made no promise unto them, as is contained in the article.

30. To the 30th he saith, He knoweth not but that he advertised his bailiff to warn the freeholders, and others having his demain in rent, during pleasure, to leave it at a lawful day to this defendant's necessary use; but did not cause the curate to do as is contained in the article to his remembrance.

31. To the 31st he saith, That he knoweth not what the priest bade in the church, nor how many ploughs there came, undesired of this defendant. But he knoweth certainly, that he desired no man's labour but for his money.

32. To

32. To the 32d he saith, That he knoweth not any such appointment of schools and revenues there, but he found there (after the departing of bishop Barloe) a schoolmaster, an usher being a priest, and twenty scholars, which he hath hitherto maintained better than he found it, to his knowledge: he did never convert any penny thereof to his own use, albeit he might lawfully have done the same.

33. The 33d, he saith, is all untrue, so far as he knoweth.

34. To the 34th article he saith, He never purchased more than three parcels, whereof one was 2s. 8d. by the year; the second, 3s. 4d. and the third, 1l. 6s. 8d. or thereabout, by the year; the rest he denieth.

35. To the 35th he saith, That he never bought of Lewis John Thomas, his land good cheap, but after 40 years purchase, not knowing at that time any such thing as is contained in the articles against the said Lewes John Thomas. Neither bade he the sumner to let him alone, but as soon as he heard any thing of it, commanded the sumner to cite him; and so he was cited in this defendant's house, occasioning him to break his bargain; to which Lewes, the defendant said these words, If you would give me your land with a house full of gold, I cannot, nor will I suffer you to keep a woman. Then the said Lewes affirming the latter woman to be his wife, and the first unknown to this defendant, he brought the said Lewes to the consistory for trial, where it hangeth yet: and also by lawful process excommunicated the first woman, for that she would not by any means appear in the court to claim or to confess marriage with the said Lewes, and so she standeth this day at the point of Significavit.

36. To the 36th he saith, That whereas the chaunter, and R. M. with other canons there, would not obey the king's godly injunctions, concerning the finding of a school for poor men's children, a lecture of divinity sermons on the Sundays, repairing of their church and mansion houses, decent order and ministration there; but stubbornly counted themselves (with the chaunter) to be a body politic, without regard of the bishop and his lawful motions, being himself named in their shire statutes a deacon, having also their dean-stall in the choir with a prebend thereunto annexed, and the chief place in the chapter-house, with a key of their chapter-seal, being also by the king's majesty's commission appointed their ordinary: yet would they not in any wise deliver unto him a book of their statutes, for the better knowledge of his and their duties, now shew unto him their records and monuments, for declaring of the king's right and his. For which cause this defendant, by writ of quo warranto, lawfully called them to answer, which yet lieth asleep, to the loss of the king's majesty's right. The time of delivery of the said writ, he remembereth not.

37. The 37th, he saith, is also false, as far as he knoweth.

To the CHARGE of WILFUL NEGLIGENCE he saith, that he hath used to his power Willing Diligence.

38. TO the 38th he saith, That he being attendant (according to his bounden duty) to serve the king's highness during the time of the parliament, from the first unto the last day; then immediately after repaired into his diocese, and he might not trust R. M. the chaunter, and George Constantine to execute faithfully the jurisdiction, because they had before (through their slanderous life, and not punishing misdoers) left the country in great enormity of filthy whoredom. And saith further, that one cause why he appointed not an officer, &c. was for that he lacked his letters of authority of jurisdiction.

39 and 40. The 39th and 40th, he saith, are untrue.

41. To the 41st he saith, That how often he did minister the communion he doth not remember; but in all other things, so far as he knoweth, he hath studied to order himself according to his vocation, and as far as he believeth acted like a minister.

No. 12.

42. To the 42d he saith, That he hath not alienated himself from study, neither preached indiscreetly, nor reported the scriptures untruly to his knowledge; (but he hath been very much hindered both from study and preaching, by the malicious, crafty, and covetous behaviour of the forenamed persons.) And that he did set forth the doctrine of honest marriage, as well of all other men as of priests, even as the scripture then rehearsed did minister occasion.

43. To the 43d he saith, That reciting the words of Luke, "If thy brother have offended against thee, blame him, and if he repent, forgive him, and if he have offended against thee seven times in one day, and seven times in the day he be converted unto thee, saying, I am sorry, forgive him;" he said farther these words in effect, It appeareth by this place of scripture, that we are not bound (except he repent) to forgive him; but we are bound to pray God to forgive him, and to give him grace to repent, that he may forgive him.

44. To the 44th he saith, That he hath preached right often at Caermarthen, as well as at other places; and he saith that a great number at Aberguilly do understand English very well.

45. To the 45th he saith, That after he had preached first at Brecknock, Caermarthen, Swansey, Laugharne, Tinby, Pembroke, Hereford, St. David's, Cardigan, with other notable towns; he hath since that time preached to a great many other poor churches, but not in Tinby nor Pembroke: but for Hereford he standeth in doubt. And whereas he brought with him at the first a learned preacher, of godly life, the ungodly stubborn behaviour of the persons before named, wearied him away. And whereas he had engaged another learned man to come into his diocese to preach, George Constantine by his discouragement advised him from this defendant.

46. To the 46th he saith, That in all his churches appropriated, there is both bible and paraphrases, so far as he knoweth: and if the priests there would not shew him the lack thereof, yet should the officials declare it unto him, that it might be amended (by his will) without delay.

47. To the 47th he saith, That George Constantine covetously ingrossed into his hands a great number of paraphrases: and this defendant hath admonished the clergy to buy every one, for his discharge; and if the said George being official of two archdeacons, and other officials in their office would declare unto him what churches do lack bibles and paraphrases, he would cause it to be amended as much as in him lieth.

To the CHARGE of FOLLY he saith, That his Desire is in true simple Manner of his Words, Deeds, and Honest Behaviour, through GOD's GRACE, to shew GODLY WISDOM.

48. TO the 48th he saith, That he thinketh no folly in the decent colour or fashion with honest use of saddle, bridle, stirrups, staff, and other like necessary or convenient things; and saith, that he used a saddle made after the Scottish fashion, with stirrups of iron unvarnished, and like spurs; and black bridle without studs, the bit and snaffle white as other men's are.

49. To the 49th he saith, That when he goeth abroad in winter, he weareth a hat to bear off rain and snow, and in summer to shadow him from the sun, without any vow of superstition or offence to the people.

50. To the 50th he saith, That all is one to him, to ride or walk, as cause requireth; and whether he said as is contained in the article or not, he remembereth not. Howbeit he doth use to go on foot.

51. To the 51st he saith, That after lawful prayer it pleased God to give him a son begotten and born in honest marriage; whom he therefore caused to be named Samuel, presenting him to the minister to be received into Christ's church as a poor member of Christ: by the holy sacrament of baptism was this done openly in the cathedral church, with earnest gravity, and without offending any man; and also two wives, being before at variance, desired both to be godmothers, which were both received to make unity between them, not knowing any law to the contrary, nor any offence thereby conceived of the people.

52. To the 52d he saith, That he doth use with gravity all honest loving entertainment of his child, to encourage him hereafter willingly at his father's mouth, to receive wholesome doctrine of the true fear and love of God; and saith, that he hath whistled to his child, but said not that the child understood it, and that he answered to one that found fault with it, as is contained in the article.

53. To the 53d he saith, That he never was surveyor, but went to see Milford-Haven for honest purpose, and not to survey it; and for that he at the sight of a seal whistled in his fist, such as meant folly might turn it to their purpose. But it is not true that he stood whistling an hour to the fish, nor that any fault was found with it, nor any such answer made by him to his knowledge.

54. To the 54th he saith, That if he did say, the destroying of the fry hindereth plenty of fish, he thinketh the same not against reason: but he remembereth not to have said, as is contained in the article.

55. To the 55th he saith, That he remembereth not that ever he said as they alledge.

56. To the slanderous, untrue, and ungodly conclusion he saith, That George Constantine, with other his adversaries before-named, and their adherents, not regarding the fear of God, and their bounden duty of loving obedience towards God and the king, and his true ministers, have with false tongues, contumelious words, and spiteful deeds, laboured by all means to discredit and deface the king's gracious authority to him committed; who, ever since he came to the diocese hath endeavoured himself to shew his faithful ministry by his true honest doing, and to use his authority according to his vocation, to God's glory and the king's honour. And this deponent brought into his diocese both learned men in the law, to his very great charges, which men George Constantine with his adherents hath wearied out.

The whole process was long and tedious, and during the whole time of the examination of witnesses, the bishop was obliged to continue in London upon the allegation of his adversaries, which was, that if the bishop should depart into his diocese, he would hinder them of their proofs. About three weeks after the return of their commission, 127 witnesses having been examined, publication of their witnesses was granted: after which it was a fortnight before the bishop could obtain a copy of their depositions, the whole thereof being so voluminous.

This good man was detained in prison till the death of king Edward, and the coming in of queen Mary and the popish religion; new trouble now began, being accused and examined for his faith and doctrine, he was called before the bishop of Winchester, with bishop Hooper, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Saunde, and others, the 4th of February. On which day he should also with them have been condemned; but his condemnation was deferred, and he sent to prison again, where he continued till February 14.

He now was examined before Stephen Gardiner and others.—His second examination took place, February 28, before Henry Morgan, the pretended bishop of St. David's, and George Constantine, his notary; Morgan's words having no effect, he pronounced him obstinate, and for the punishment of this his contumacy to be counted pro confesso, and did so pronounce him in writing. Which being done, he committed the said bishop to the custody of Owen Jones, until Monday next, being the 4th of March, then to be brought again into the same place, between one and two. The third examination being attended with the same effect, he was committed again to custody till the following Thursday, March 7, when the pretended bishop delivered unto him a copy of the articles, assigning him Monday next following to answer and subscribe to the same, either affirmatively or negatively.

March 11, appearing again before the bishop, and George Constantine, he exhibited in a written paper his mind and answer. Upon that the bishop assigned the next Wednesday in the forenoon to hear his final and definitive sentence.

Dr. Farrar personally appearing the appointed time, and refusing still to renounce his faith, the bishop in a rage pronounced the definitive sentence, and he was given up forthwith to the secular power, namely, to Mr. Leyson, sheriff of the town of Caermarthen.

The good bishop being condemned and degraded, was not long after brought to the place of execution in the town of Caermarthen, where he in the market place, in the south side of the market-cross, the 30th day of March, being Saturday next before Passion-Sunday, most constantly sustained the torments of the fire.

Concerning whose constancy, this is moreover to be added, that one Richard Jones, a knight's son, coming to Dr. Farrar a little before his death, seemed to lament the painfulness of the death he had to suffer; unto whom the bishop answered again to this effect, saying, That if he saw him once stir in the pains of his burning, he should then give no credit to his doctrine. And as he said, so he right well performed the same; for so patiently he stood, that he never moved; till one Richard Gravell, with a staff struck him down.

C H A P. VI.

The HISTORY and MARTYRDOM of RAWLINS WHITE, aged 60, a Fisherman in WALES, who was burned at CARDIFF, in the same Month as was Bishop FARRAR: reported by J. DANE, who was almost continually with him during his Troubles and Sufferings, unto his DEATH. Also a LETTER from Bishop GARDINER to Bishop BONNER, concerning celebrating the POPE's FUNERAL; with other Public Occurrences in the Months of March and April, 1555.

RAWLINS WHITE was by his calling and occupation a fisherman, living and continuing in the said trade for the space of twenty years at least, in the town of Cardiff, being one of a very good name amongst his neighbours. As touching his religion at first, it cannot otherwise be known, but that he was a great partaker of the superstition and idolatry that then was used in the reign of Henry VIII. But after that God of his mercy had raised up the light of his gospel, through the blessed government of king Edward the VI. Rawlins White began partly to dislike that which before he had embraced, and to have some good opinion of that which before by the iniquity of the times had been concealed from him; and the rather to bring this good purpose and intent of his to pass, he began to be a diligent hearer, and a great searcher, out of the truth.

Because the good man was altogether unlearned, and withal very simple, he knew no ready way how he might satisfy satisfy his great desire. At length it came into his mind to take a special remedy to supply his necessity, which was this: He had a little boy, his own son, which child he sent to school, to learn to read English; now after the little boy could read indifferently well, his father every night after supper, summer and winter, would have the boy to read part of the holy scripture, and now and then of some other good book. In which kind of virtuous exercise the old man had such delight and pleasure, that as it seemed; he rather practised himself in the study of the scripture, than in the trade or science which before-time he had used: so that within few years in the time of king Edward; through the help of his little son, and through much conserence besides, he profited and went forward in such sort, that he was able not only to resolve himself touching his own former blindness and ignorance, but also to admonish and instruct others: and therefore when occasion served, he would go from one place to another, visiting such as he had best hope in.

When he had thus continued in his profession the space of five years, king Edward died, upon whose decease queen Mary succeeded, and with her came persecution. The extremity and force whereof at last so pursued this good man, that he looked every hour to go to prison; whereupon many who had received comfort by his instructions, began to persuade him to shift for himself, and dispose of his goods by some reasonable order to the use of his wife and children.

Howbeit he continued still in his good purposes, till at last he was taken by the officers of the town, as a man suspected of heresy, upon which apprehension he was convened before the bishop of Landaff, then at his house near Chepstow: by whom, after divers combats and conflicts with him and his chaplains, this good father Rawlins White was committed to prison in Chepstow.

At last he was removed from Chepstow to the castle of Cardiff, where he continued for the space of one whole year; during which time, this reporter resorted to him very often, with money and other relief from this reporter's mother, (who was a great favourer of those that were in affliction in those days,) and others of his friends; which he received not without great thanks and praises to God.

When he had continued in Cardiff castle for the space of one whole year, the time of his further trial was at hand. Whereupon the bishop of Landaff caused him to be brought again from the castle of Cardiff unto his own house near Chepstow; and while he continued there, the bishop endeavoured by various means to reduce him to some conformity. But when they found their threatening words and flattering promises ineffectual, the bishop desired him to advise and determine with himself, either to recant his opinions, or else to suffer the rigour of the law, and thereupon gave him a day of determination: which day being come, the bishop with his chaplains went into his chapel, with a great number of the neighbours that had the curiosity to see their proceedings. When the bishop and his retinue were placed in order, poor Rawlins White was brought before them. The bishop made a long discourse, declaring the cause of his being sent for, was his being well known to hold heretical opinions, and that by his instructions many were led into blind error. In the end, he exhorted him to consider his own state wherein he stood, offering favour if he recanted.

When the bishop had made an end, this good father Rawlins boldly said, My lord, I thank God I am a christian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God; and if I do, I desire to be reformed out of the word of God, as a christian man ought to be. The bishop then told him plainly, that he must proceed against him by the law, and condemn him as an heretic.

Proceed in your law in God's name, said Rawlins; but for an heretic you shall never condemn me while the world stands. But (said the bishop to his company) before we proceed any further with him, let us pray to God that he would send some spark of grace upon him, and it may so chance, that God through our prayers will here turn his heart.

Having prayed, the bishop said, Now Rawlins, wilt thou revoke thy opinions, or no? Surely, my lord, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me, and by God's grace, Rawlins I will continue. When he perceived his hypocrisy took no effect, with sharp words he reproved him, and forthwith was ready to read the sentence; but upon some advice given to him by his chaplains, he thought best first to have a mass, thinking, that by so doing some wonderful change would have been wrought in Rawlins.

In the mean time poor Rawlins betook himself to prayer in a secret place; until the priest came to the sacring, as they term it; which is a principal part of their idolatry. When Rawlins heard the sacring-bell ring, he rose out of his place; and came to the choir door, and there standing a while, turning himself to the people, speaking these words; Good people, if there be any brethren amongst you, or at least, if there be but one brother amongst you, the same one bear witness at the day of judgment, that I bow not to this idol (meaning the host that the priest held over his head.)

Mass being ended, Rawlins was called for again; to whom the bishop used many persuasions: but the blessed man continued so steadfast in his former profession, that the bishop's discourse was altogether in vain. Whereupon the bishop caused the definitive sentence to be read. Which being ended, Rawlins was dismissed, and from thence he was by the bishop's commandment carried again to Cardiff, there to be put into the prison of the town, called Cockmarel, a very dark, loathsome, and most vile dungeon.

Having continued a prisoner in Cockmarel prison at Cardiff, some time, about three weeks before the day wherein he suffered, the head officers of the town that had the charge of his execution, were determined to burn him because they would be sooner rid of him; although they had no writ of execution awarded, as by the law they should have; but by the advice of one H. Lewes, the recorder of the town, they sent to London for the writ above-named: upon the receipt whereof they made speed to the execution. The day being at hand, wherein the good father should perform and accomplish the last act of this his worthy conflict, he was the night before engaged in preparing himself.

Now when Mr. Rawlins perceived his time was no less near than it was reported, he sent forthwith to his wife, and desired her by the messenger, that in any wise she should make ready and send unto him his wedding garment, meaning a shirt, which afterwards he was burned in. This request, or rather commandment of his, his wife with grief of heart did perform, and early in the morning did send it to him, which he received most gladly and joyfully.

The hour of his execution being come, this good and constant martyr was brought out of prison, having on his body the long shirt, which he called his wedding garment, and an old russet-coat which he was wont to wear. Besides this, he had upon his legs an old pair of leather buskins. And thus being brought out of prison, he was accompanied, or rather guarded with a great number of bills and weapons. Which sight when he beheld, Alas! (said he) what meaneth all this? By God's grace I will not run away: with all my heart and mind I give God most hearty thanks that he hath made me worthy to abide all this for his holy name's sake.

He now came to a place, where his poor wife and children stood weeping, and making great lamentation, the sudden sight of whom so pierced his heart, that the very tears trickled down his face. But he soon after, as though he had misliked this infirmity of his flesh, began to be as it were altogether angry with himself: inso-much, that striking his breast with his hand, he used these words, Ah flesh, hinderest thou me so? Well, I tell thee, do what thou canst, thou shalt not, by God's grace, have the victory.

By this time he approached a stake ready set up, with some wood towards the making of the fire; which when he beheld, he set forward very boldly: but in going towards the stake, he fell down upon his knees and kissed the ground; and in rising again, a little earth sticking on his nose, he said these words, Earth unto earth, and dust unto dust; thou art my mother, and unto thee I shall return.

Then went he cheerfully and set his back close unto the stake. A smith came with a great chain of iron, whom when he saw, he cast up his hand, and with a loud voice, gave God great thanks.

Now when the smith had made him fast to the stake the officers began to lay on more wood, with a little straw and reeds: wherein the good old man was no less occupied than the best; for as far as he could reach his hands, he would pluck the straw and reeds, and lay it about him in places most convenient for his speedy dispatch.

When all things were ready, directly over-against the stake, in the face of Rawlins White, there was a standing erected, whereon stepped up a priest, addressing himself to the people, which were many in number, because it was market day. When Rawlins perceived him, and considered the cause of his coming, he reaching a little straw unto himself, made two little stays, and set them under his elbows. Then went the priest forward in his sermon, wherein he spake of many things touching the authority of the church of Rome. At last, he came to the sacrament of the altar, and there he began to inveigh against Rawlins's opinions: in which harangue he cited the common place of scripture. When Rawlins perceived, that he went about not only to preach and teach the people false doctrine, but also to confirm it by scripture, he suddenly started up, and beckoned his hands to the people, saying twice, Come hither good people, and hear not a false prophet preaching: and then said unto the preacher, ah! thou wicked hypocrite, dost thou presume to prove thy false doctrine by scripture?

Hereupon some that stood by cried out, Put fire; set to fire; which being done, the straw and reeds cast up a great and sudden flame. In which flame this good man bathed his hands so long, until such time as the sinews shrunk; and the fat dropped away, saying that once he did, as it were, wipe his face with one of them. All this while, which was somewhat long, he cried with a loud voice, O Lord, receive my spirit, until he could not open his mouth. At last, the extremity of the fire was so vehement against his legs, that they were consumed almost before the rest of his body was hurt, which made the whole body fall over the chain in the fire sooner than it would have done. He was, at the time of his death, about sixty years of age.

TRANSACTIONS in the PRIVY COUNCIL, and PUBLIC OCCURRENCES, in the Months of March and April, 1555.

MARCH 28th, the queen summonsed into her presence four of her privy council, namely, William, lord marquis of Winchester, high-treasurer of England; sir Robert Rochester, knight, the queen's comptroller; sir William Peter, knight, secretary; and sir Francis Inglesfield, knight, master of the wards: to whom she thus spoke:

"You are here of our council, and we have ordered you to be called unto us, to the intent you might hear of me my conscience, and the resolution of my mind, concerning the lands and possessions, as well of monasteries as of other churches whatsoever, being now presently in my possession.

"First, I do consider, that the said lands were taken away from the churches aforesaid in the time of schism, and that by unlawful means, such as are contrary both to the law of God, and of the church; for which cause my conscience doth not suffer me to detain them; and therefore I here expressly refuse either to claim or retain the same lands for mine, but with all my heart freely and willingly, without any covenant or condition, here and before God I do surrender and relinquish the said lands and possessions, or inheritances whatsoever, and do renounce the same with this mind and purpose, that order and disposition thereof may be taken as shall seem best to our most holy lord the pope, or else his legate the lord cardinal, to the honour of God, and wealth of this our realm.

"You may object to me, that considering the state of my kingdom, and the dignity thereof, my crown imperial cannot be honourably maintained and furnished without the possessions aforesaid; yet notwithstanding I set more by the salvation of my own soul, than by ten kingdoms; and therefore the said possessions I utterly refuse here to hold after that sort and title, and give most hearty thanks to Almighty God who hath given me an husband likewise minded, with no less good affection in this behalf, than myself.

"Wherefore I charge and command, that my chancellor (with whom I have conferred my mind in this matter before) and you four, do resort together to-morrow to the most reverend lord legate, and signify to him the premises in my name, and give your attendance upon him for the more full declaration of the state of my kingdom, and of the aforesaid possessions accordingly, as you yourselves do understand the matter, and can inform him in the same."

On Wednesday, in Easter week, there were hearfes set up, and dirges sung, (a service for the dead used by the papists) which ceremony was ordered and celebrated by the queen and her council for the death of his pope's holiness Julius, who led, by all accounts, a very unholy life. At which time a woman going into St. Magnus' church, at the bridge foot in London, and there seeing an hearse and other preparation, asked what it meant: some that stood by, said that it was for the pope, and that she must pray for him. Nay, said she, that I will not, for he needeth not my prayers: and seeing he could forgive us all our sins, I am sure he is clean himself: therefore I need not to pray for him.

Some who stood by, heard her speak these words, and upon their information she was put into the cage, at London-bridge.

On the 2d of April, John Awcock died in prison, and was buried in the fields, as the manner of the papists was, to deny christian burial to such as died out of their popish antichristian church.

The beginning of this month, a letter was sent to the sheriff of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Woodgate and William Maynard, for preaching secretly, and to send them up to the council.

On the 7th, another letter was sent to the sheriff for the apprehension of one Harwich, who went about with a boy preaching from place to place.

On the 15th, a letter was directed to sir Nicholas Hare, and sir Thomas Cornwallis, requiring them to examine Mr. Flower, alias Branch, what he meant by wearing about his neck this motto: Deum time, idolum fuge, "Fear God, beware of idolatry:" and whom else he knew to wear the like; praying them also to speak to Bonner, bishop of London, speedily to proceed against him for his religion according to the laws; and that the justices of peace of Middlesex should likewise proceed against him for shedding of blood in the church, according to the statute, so as if he continued in his opinion he might be executed at the farthest by the latter end of this week, and that his right hand be struck off the day before his execution, or the same day.

The 22d of April, there was a like letter sent to the justices of peace of Middlesex, with a writ for the execution of the said Flower, commanding them to see his hand struck off before his burning.

The 29th of April, Mr. Robert Horneby, servant then to the lady Elizabeth, was convened before the council for his religion; and standing constantly to the truth, notwithstanding their threats and other persuasions, was therefore committed to the Marshalsea.

The HISTORY of the LIFE, EXAMINATION, and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, who was Burned for professing the TRUTH of the GOSPEL, at WEST-CHESTER, April 24th, 1555.

GEORGE MARSH was born in the parish of Deane, in the county of Lancaster, and was well brought up in learning and honest trade of living by his parents: who afterwards, about the 25th year of his age, took to wife an honest maiden of the country; with whom he continued, earning their living upon a farm, having children between them lawfully begotten: and then God taking his wife out of this world, he (leaving his household and children in good order) went unto the university of Cambridge, where he studied, and much increased in learning, and was a minister of God's holy word and sacraments, and for a while was curate to the Rev. Mr. Laurence Saunders, as himself reporteth. In which condition of life he continued for a space, earnestly setting forth God's true religion, to the defacing of Antichrist's false doctrine, by his godly readings and sermons, as well there and in the parish of Deane, as elsewhere in Lancashire.

At length he was apprehended, and kept close prisoner in Chester, by George Cores, then bishop of that see, within the precinct of the bishop's house, about the space of four months, being not permitted to have relief and comfort of his friends; but charge being given unto the porter, to mark who they were that asked for him, and to signify their names unto the bishop, as by the particular description of his story, testified and recorded with his own pen, more evidently will appear in what followeth.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, before the EARL of DERBY and others, written by himself.

ON the Monday before Palm Sunday, which was the 12th of March, it was told me at my mother's house, that Roger Wrinstone, with other of Mr. Barton's servants, did make diligent search for me in Bolton; and when they perceived that I was not there, they gave strict charge to Robert Ward and Robert Marsh, to find and bring me to Mr. Barton the next day following, with orders, to be brought before the honourable earl of Derby, to be examined in matters of religion, &c.

I knowing this, by my friends, was diversely affected; my mother, and other my friends advising me to fly, and to avoid the peril, which thing I had intended, after a week then next ensuing, if this in the mean while had not chanced; seeing that if I were taken, and would not recant in matters of religion, (as they thought I would not, and as God strengthening and assisting me in his Holy Spirit I never will,) it would not only have put them to great sorrow, heaviness, and losses, with costs and charges, to their shame and rebuke in this world, but also my own self, after troubles and painful imprisonment, unto shameful death.

This considered, they advised and counselled me to depart and fly the country, as I intended to have done, if this had not happened. To whose counsel my weak flesh would gladly have consented, but my spirit did not fully agree; thinking and saying thus to myself, that if I fled away, it would be thought, reported, and said, that I did not only fly the country, and my nearest and dearest friends, but much rather from Christ's holy word, according as these years past I had with my heart, or at least with mine outward living professed, and with my word and mouth taught, according to the small talent given me of the Lord. I being thus with their counsel and advice, and the thoughts and counsels of my own mind, drawn as it were divers ways, went from my mother's house, saying, I would come again at evening.

In the mean time I ceased not by earnest prayer to ask and seek counsel of God, (who is the giver of all good gifts) and of other my friends, whose pious judgments and knowledge I much trusted to. After this I met with one of my friends on Deane-moore, about sun setting, and after we had consulted together of my business, not without hearty prayer, we departed. I not fully determining what to do, but taking my leave of my friend, said, I doubt not but God (according as our prayer and trust was) would give me such wisdom and counsel, as should be most to his honour and glory, the profit of my neighbours and brethren in the world, and obtaining my eternal salvation by Christ in heaven.

This done, I returned to my mother's house again, where several of Mr. Barton's servants had been seeking after me; who, when they could not find me, strictly charged my brother and William Marsh to seek me that night, and to bring me to Smethehills the next day; who being so charged, were gone to seek me in Adderton, or elsewhere.

Thus intending before to have been all night with my mother, but then considering that my tarrying there would disquiet her with her household, I departed from thence, and went beyond Deane church, and there tarried all night with an old friend of mine, taking little rest, and consulting much with myself of my trouble.

At my first awaking, one came to me from a faithful friend of mine with letters, who said thus: My friend's advice was that I should in no wise fly, but abide and boldly confess the faith of Jesus Christ. At whose words I was so confirmed and established in my conscience, that from thenceforth I consulted no more, whether it were better to fly or to tarry; but was at a point with myself, that I would not fly, but go to Mr. Barton, who did seek for me, and there present myself, and patiently bear such cross as it should please God to lay upon my shoulders. Whereupon my mind before being much disquieted and troubled, was now merry and at ease.

I arose early in the morning, and after I had said the English litany (as my custom was) with other prayers, kneeling on my knees by my friend's bed side, I prepared myself to go toward Smethehills; and as I was going thither, I went into the houses of Henry Widdowes, of my mother-in-law, of Ralf Yeton, and of the wife of Thomas Richardson, desiring them to pray for me, and have me commanded to all my friends, and comfort my mother, and be good to my little children; for (as I supposed) they should not see my face any more before the last day; and so took my leave of them, not without tears shed on both sides, and came to Smethehills about nine o'clock, and presented myself to Mr. Barton; who shewed me a letter from the earl of Derby, wherein he was commanded to send me with others to Latham.

Whereupon he charged my brother and William Marsh to bring and deliver me the next day by ten o'clock, o'clock, before the said earl or his council. I made earnest suit, with other special friends, which I had there at the same time, to Mr. Barton, that he would take some one, or all of them, bound by recognizance or otherwise, for my appearing before the said earl or his council, that my brother and William Marsh might be at home, because it was the chief time of feeding, and their ploughs could not go if they were not at home; but nothing could be obtained.

So we went to my mother's, and there I dined and shifted part of my clothes, and praying, took my leave of my mother, the wife of Richard Marsh, and both their households, they and I both weeping, and departing from them, went towards Latham, and lay all night within a mile and a half of it. The next day, which was Wednesday, we arose, prayed, and came to Latham betimes, and tarried there till four o'clock in the afternoon.

Then was I called by Roger Mekinson, to my lord and his council, and was brought into the chamber of presence, where were present sir William Nores, sir Pierce Alec, Mr. Sherburn, the parson of Grapnal, Mr. Moore, with others. Where, when I had tarried a little while, my lord turned himself towards me, and asked what was my name: I answered, Marsh.

Then he asked, whether I was one of those that sowed evil seed and dissention amongst the people: which thing I denied, desiring to know my accusers, and what could be laid against me: but that I could not know.

Then, said he, he would with his council examine methemselves, and asked me whether I was a priest; I said, no. He asked me what had been my living, I answered, I was a minister, served a cure, and kept a school. Then said my lord to his council, This is a wonderful thing; before he said he was no priest, and now he confesseth himself to be one. I answered, By the laws now used in this realm, (as far as I do know) I am none.

They asked me who gave me orders, or whether I had taken any. I answered, I received orders of the bishop of London and Lincoln.

Then said they one to another, those are of these new heretics: and asked me what acquaintance I had with them? I answered, I never saw them but at the time when I received orders.

They asked me how long I had been curate, and whether I had ministered with a good conscience. I answered I had been curate but one year, and had ministered with a good conscience, I thanked God; and if the laws of the realm would have suffered me, I would have ministered still; and if they at any time hereafter would suffer me to minister after that sort, I would minister again.

At which they murmured, and the parson of Grapnal said, This last communion was the most devilish thing that ever was devised. Then they asked me what my belief was.

I answered, I believed in God the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, according as the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments do teach, and according as the four symbols or creeds that is to wit, the creed commonly called the Apostles, the creed of the council of Nice, of Athanasius, and of Austin and Ambrose, do teach.

After a few words the parson Grapnal said, But what is thy belief in the sacrament of the altar?

I answered, I believe that whoever, according to Christ's institution, did receive the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood, did eat and drink Christ's body, and with all the benefits of his death and resurrection to their eternal salvation; for Christ, said I, is ever present with his sacrament.

They asked me, whether the bread and wine, by virtue of the words pronounced by the priest, were changed in the flesh and blood of Christ, and that the sacrament, whether he were received or reserved was the very body of Christ. Whereunto I made answer, I knew no farther than I had shewed already.

After many other questions, which I avoided as well as I could, remembering the saying of St. Paul, "Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing they do but ingender strife;" my lord commanded me to come to the board, and gave me pen and ink in my hand; and commanded me to write my answers to the questions of the sacrament above-named; and I wrote as I had answered before. Whereat he being much offended, commanded me to write a more direct answer, saying, I should not chuse but do it.

Then I took the pen and wrote, that further I knew not. Whereat he being sore grieved, after many threatenings, said, I should be put to a shameful death like a traitor, with other like words; and sometimes giving me fair words, if I would turn and be conformable as others were, how glad he would be.

In conclusion, after much ado, he commanded me to ward, in a cold, windy, stone-house, where was little room; there I lay two nights without any bed, saving a few great canvass tent clothes, and so continued till Palm-Sunday, occupying myself as well as I could in meditation, prayer, and study; for no man could be suffered to come to me but my keeper twice a day, when he brought me meat and drink.

SECOND EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH.

ON Palm Sunday after dinner, I was sent for to my lord and his council, (saving sir William Nores and sir Pierce Alec were not then present) amongst whom were sir John Beram, and the vicar of Prescot. So they examined me once again of the sacrament. And after I had communed apart with the vicar of Prescot a good while concerning that matter, he returned with me to my lord and his council, saying, That answer which I had made before, and then did make, (as it is above written) was sufficient for a beginner, and as one which did not profess a perfect knowledge in that matter, until such times as I had learned further. Wherewith the earl was very well pleased, saying, he doubted not but by the means and help of the vicar of Prescot I would be conformable in other things; and after many fair words he commanded I should have a bed, with fire, and liberty to go amongst his servants, on condition I would do no harm with my communication amongst them.

And so after much other communication I departed, much more troubled in my mind than before, because I had not with more boldness confessed Christ, but in such sort as mine adversaries thereby thought they should prevail against me; whereat I was much grieved.

A day or two after I was sent for to the vicar of Prescot, and the parson of Grapnal; where our communication was concerning the mass: and he asked what offended me in the mass. I answered, the whole mass did offend me, first because it was in a strange language, whereby the people were not edified, contrary to St. Paul's doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. and because of the manifold and intolerable abuses and errors contained therein, contrary to Christ's priesthood and sacrifice.

Then they asked me in what place thereof; and I named several; which places they went about with gentle and far sought interpretations to mitigate, saying, those places were understood far otherwise than the words did purport, or than I did take them.

So they caused a mass-book to be sent for, and shewed me where in some places of the mass was written, A sacrifice of praise. Whereto I answered, that it followed not therefore that in all places it signified a sacrifice or oblation of praise or thanksgiving; and although it did, yet was not a sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving to be offered for the people.

After this, Mr. George Marsh was sent to Lancaster castle, and being brought with other prisoners unto the sessions, was made to hold up his hand with the malefactors; at which time the earl of Derby had this conversation with him.

A CON-

A CONVERSATION between the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, and the Earl of DERBY.

I said unto my lord, I had not dwelled in the country the three or four years past, and came home but lately to visit my mother, children, and others of my friends, and meant to have departed out of the country before Easter then next, and to have gone out of the realm. Wherefore I trusted, seeing nothing could be laid against me, wherein I had offended against the laws of this realm, his lordship would not with captious questions examine me, to bring my body into danger of death, to the great discomfort of my mother, but suffer me to avoid peaceably, seeing I might have fled out of the country, and yet of my own will came to his lordship.

He said to his council, he had heard tell of me before at London; and intended to make search for me, and take me either in Lancashire or at London, and asked me into what land I would have gone.

I answered, I would have gone either into Almain, or else into Denmark. He said to his council, in Denmark they used such heresy as they have done in England: but as for Almain, he said the emperor had destroyed them.

So after such like words, I said unto him, my trust was that his lordship being of the honourable council of the late king Edward, consenting and agreeing to acts concerning faith towards God and religion, under great pain, would not so soon after consent to put poor men to shameful deaths, as he had threatened me for embracing the same with so good a conscience.

He answered, that he, with the lord Windsor and lord Dacres, with one more, whose name I have forgot, did not consent to those acts, and that the name of them four would be seen, as long as the parliament house stood. Then my lord did rehearse the misfortune of the dukes of Northumberland and Suffolk, with others, because they favoured not the true religion; and again the prosperity of the queen's highness, because she favoured the true religion, thereby gathering the one to be good, and of God; and the other to be wicked, and of the devil; and said that the duke of Northumberland confessed so plainly.

After remaining some weeks in confinement at Lancaster, he was removed to Chester, and placed in the bishop's liberty, where his lordship frequently conferred with him, and used his utmost endeavours to bring him to an acknowledgment of the corporal presence in the sacrament of the altar, the mass, confession, and in short, of all the tenets and practices of the Church of Rome.

When the bishop found he would not assent to a single point, he remanded him back to prison; and in a few days summonsed him before him in the cathedral church of Chester, where, in the presence of the mayor, chancellor, and principal inhabitants of that city, both laity and clergy, he caused him to take a solemn oath to answer truly to such articles as might be alledged against him.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH.

WITHIN a few days the Rev. Mr. Marsh was sent for by Dr. Cotes, bishop, to appear before him in his hall, nobody else being present; and then he asked him certain questions concerning the sacrament: to whom he made such answers as the bishop seemed therewith to be content, saving that he utterly denied transubstantiation, and allowed not the abuse of the mass, nor that the lay-people should receive under one kind only, contrary to Christ's institution; in which point the bishop went about to persuade him: howbeit (God be thanked) all in vain. Other discourse he had with him to submit himself to the universal church of Rome; and when he saw he could not prevail, he sent him to prison again: and after being there, came to him divers times Mr. Massey, a fatherly old man, Mr. Wrench, a schoolmaster, Mr. Henshaw, the bishop's chaplain, and the archdeacon, with many more: who with all plausibility of words, philosophy, and deceitful vanity, after the tradition of men, but not after Christ, went about to persuade him to submit himself to the church of Rome, and to acknowledge the Pope to be heard thereof, and to interpret the scriptures no otherwise than that church did; with many such like arguments and persuasions of fleshly wisdom.

To whom the said Mr. George Marsh answered, that he did acknowledge and believe one holy catholic and apostolic church, without which there is no salvation, and that this church is but one, because it ever hath, doth, and shall confess and believe one only God, and him only worship, and one only Messiah, and in him only trust for salvation; which church also is ruled and led by one Spirit, one word, and one faith; and that this church is universal and catholic, because it ever hath been since the world's beginning, is, and shall endure to the world's end, and comprehending within it all nations, kindreds, and languages, degrees, states, and conditions of men: and that this church is built only upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the head corner stone, and not upon the Romish laws and decrees, the bishop of Rome being the supreme head.

And where they said the church did stand in ordinary succession of bishops, being ruled by general councils, holy fathers, and the laws of holy church, and so had continued for the space of fifteen hundred years and more; he made answer, that the holy church, which is the body of Christ, and therefore most worthy to be called holy, was before any succession of bishops, general councils, or Romish decrees; neither was it bound to any time or place, ordinary succession, general councils, or traditions of fathers; nor had it any supremacy over empires and kingdoms: but it was a poor simple flock, dispersed and scattered abroad, as sheep without a shepherd in the midst of wolves, or as a flock of orphans and fatherless children: and that this church was led and ruled by the only laws, councils, and word of Christ, he being the supreme head of this church, and assisting, succouring, and defending her from all assaults, errors, and persecutions, wherewith she is ever encompassed about.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH.

AFTER that the said bishop had taken his pleasure in punishing this his prisoner, and often reviling him with the odious names of heretic, &c. he caused him to be brought forth into a chapel in the cathedral church of Chester, called our Lady's-chapel, at two o'clock in the afternoon, and Fulk Dutton, mayor of the said city, Dr. Wall, and other priests assisting him, placed not far from the bishop; George Wensloe, chancellor, and one John Getham, register, sat directly over against him.

Then they caused the said Mr. Marsh to take an oath, to answer truly unto such articles as should be objected against him. Upon which oath taken, the chancellor laid to his charge, that he had preached and openly published most heretical and blasphemous doctrines, within the parishes of Deane, Eccles, Bolton, Berry, and many other places within the bishop's diocese, in the months of January, February, or some other time of the year last, proceeding directly against the pope's authority, and catholic church of Rome, the blessed mass, the sacrament of the altar, and many other articles. Unto all which he answered, that he neither heretically nor blasphemously preached or spoke against any of the said articles; but simply and truly, as occasion served, and (as it were thereunto forced in conscience) maintained the truth touching the same articles, as he said all you now present did acknowledge the same in the time of the late king Edward VI.

Then they examined him severally of every article, and bade him answer yes, or no, without equivocation; for they were come to examine, and not to dispute at that present.

Then he answered them unto every article very modestly, according to the doctrine by public authority received, and taught in this realm at the death of king Edward; which answers were every one written by the register to the uttermost that could make against him. After this, the company for that time broke up, and he was returned to prison again.

The THIRD and LAST EXAMINATION of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH.

THE bishop was now determined, if Mr. Marsh would not relent and abjure, to pronounce sentence definitive against him. Wherefore he bade the said George Marsh to be well advised what he would do, for it stood upon his life: and if he would not at that present forsake his heretical opinions, it would (after the sentence given) be too late, though he would ever so gladly desire it.

Then the chancellor first asked him, Whether he were not of the bishop's diocese? To which he answered, that he knew not how large his diocese was at Cambridge. But they asked, whether he had not lately been at Deane parish in Lancashire, and there abode? He answered, Yes.

Then the chancellor read all his answers that he made in that place at his former examination, and at every one he asked him whether he would stick to the same or no? To which he answered again, Yes, yes. Said the chancellor, in your last examination, amongst many other damnable and schismatical heresies, you said, That the church and doctrine taught, and set forth in king Edward's time, was the true church, and the doctrine of the true church, and that the church of Rome was not the true and catholic church.

So said I, replied Mr. Marsh, and I believe it to be true. Here also others took occasion to ask him (for that he denied the bishop of Rome's authority in England) whether Linus, Anacletus, and Clement, that were bishops of Rome, were not good men; and he answered, Yes, and divers others; but he said, they claimed no more authority in England, than the bishop of Canterbury doth at Rome; and I strive not with the place, neither speak I against the person of the bishop, but against his doctrine, which in most points is repugnant to the doctrine of Christ.

Thou art an arrogant fellow indeed, said the bishop. In what article is the doctrine of the church of Rome repugnant to the doctrine of Christ?

To whom Mr. Marsh answered, Oh, my lord, I pray you judge not so of me. I stand now upon the point of my life and death; and a man in my case hath no cause to be arrogant, neither am I, God is my record. And as concerning the disagreement of the doctrine, among many other things, the church of Rome erreth in the sacrament. For where Christ in the institution thereof did as well deliver the cup as the bread, saying, "Drink ye all of this;" and St. Mark reporteth, that they did drink of it: in like manner St. Paul delivered it unto the Corinthians. And in the same sort also it was used in the primitive church for the space of many hundred years. Now the church of Rome doth take away one part of the sacrament from the laity. Wherefore if I could be persuaded in my conscience by God's word, that it were well done, I could gladly yield in this point.

Then said the bishop, there is no disputing with a heretic. Therefore when all his answers were ready, he asked him whether he would stand to the same, being as they were full of heresy, or else forsake them, and come unto the catholic church?

To whom he made this full answer, That he held no heretical opinion, but utterly abhorred all kind of heresy, although they most untruly so did slander him. And he desired all the people there to bear him witness, (if any hereafter should slander him, and say that he held any grievous heresy) that in all articles of religion he held no other opinion than was by law established, and publicly taught in England at the death of king Edward VI. and in the same pure religion and doctrine he would, by God's grace, stand, live, and die. Here the chancellor spake to one Leach, who stood near to Mr. Marsh, and bade him stand farther from him; for his presence did him no good.

This being done, the bishop took a writing out of his bosom, and began to read the sentence of condemnation: but when he had read almost half thereof, the chancellor called him, and said, Good my lord, stay, stay: for if you proceed any further, it will be too late to call it again, and so the bishop stayed. Then his popish priests, and many of the ignorant people, called upon Mr. Marsh, with many earnest words to recant; and amongst others, one Pulleyn, a shoemaker, said to him, For shame man, remember thyself, and recant. They bade him kneel down, and pray, and they would pray for him: so they kneeled down, and he desired them to pray for him, and he would pray for them.

The bishop then asked him again, whether he would not have the queen's mercy in time; and he answered, he did gladly desire the same, and did love her grace as faithfully as any of them; but yet he durst not deny his Saviour Christ, lest he lose his mercy everlasting, and so win everlasting death.

Then the bishop put his spectacles on, and read forward his sentence about five or six lines, and there again the chancellor with flattering words and smiling countenance called to the bishop, and said, Yet, good my lord, once again stay, for if that word be spoken, all is past, no relenting will then serve; and the bishop (pulling off his spectacles) said I would stay if it would be.

How sayest thou, said he, wilt thou recant? Many of the priests and ignorant people bade him do so, and call to God for grace; and pulling him by his sleeve, bade him recant and save his life. To whom he answered, I would as fain live as you, if in so doing I should not deny my master Christ, and then he would deny me before his Father in heaven.

Then the bishop read out his sentence unto the end and afterwards said unto him, Now I will no more pray for thee, than I will for a dog. Mr. Marsh answered, That notwithstanding he would pray for his lordship; and after this the bishop delivered him unto the sheriffs of the city. His late keeper said, Farewell good George, with weeping eyes, which caused the officers to carry him to a prison at the north-gate, where he was very strictly kept until he went to his death, during which time he had small comfort or relief of any worldly creature.

For being in the dungeon or dark prison, none that would do him good could speak with him, or at least durst enterprize so to do, for fear of accusation; and some of the citizens who loved him, for the gospel's sake, (whereof there were but few) although they were never acquainted with him, would sometimes in the evening at a hole upon the wall of the city (that went into the said prison) call to him and ask him how he did. He would answer them most cheerfully, that he did well, and thanked God most highly that he would vouchsafe of his mercy to appoint him to be a witness of his truth, and to suffer for the same, wherein he did most rejoice; beseeching him that he would give him grace, not to faint under the cross, but patiently bear the same to his glory; and comfort of his church.

When the day and time appointed came that he should suffer, the sheriffs of the city, whose names were Amry and Couper, with their officers, and a great number of poor simple barbers with rusty bills and poll-axes, went to the North-gate, and there took out Mr. George Marsh, who came with them most humbly and meekly, with a lock upon his feet. And as he came upon the way towards the place of execution, some folks proffered him money, and looked that he should have gone with a little purse in his hand hand (as felons were accustomed in that city in times past, at their going to execution) to the end to gather money to give unto a priest to say masses for them after their death, whereby they might, as they thought, be saved; but Mr. Marsh said, he would not then be troubled to receive money, but desired some good man to take the money, if the people were disposed to give any, and to give it to the prisoners or poor people. He went all the way with his book in his hand, looking upon the same, and many said, This man goeth not unto his death as a thief, or as one that deserveth to die.

When he came to the place of execution without the city, near unto Spittal-Boughton, one Cawdry, being then a deputy chamberlain of Chester, shewed Mr. Marsh a writing under a great seal, saying, That it was a pardon for him if he would recant. He answered, forasmuch as it tended to pluck him from God, he would not receive it upon that condition.

He now began to speak to the people, shewing the cause of his death, and would have exhorted them to stick unto Christ. Whereupon one of the sheriffs said, George Marsh we must have no sermoning now. To whom he said, Master, I cry you mercy; and so kneeling down said his prayers, put off his clothes unto his shirt, and then was chained to the post, having a number of faggots under him, and a thing made like a firkin, with pitch and tar in it, over his head; the fire being unskilfully made, and the wind driving the same to and fro, he suffered great extremity in his death, which notwithstanding he bore very patiently.

When he had been a long time tormented in the fire without moving, having his flesh so broiled and pulled up, that they who stood before him, could see the chain wherewith he was fastened, and therefore supposed he had been dead; suddenly he spread abroad his arms, saying, Father of heaven have mercy upon me, and so yielded his spirit into the hands of the Lord. Upon this, many of the people said he was a martyr, and died marvellously patient; which caused the bishop shortly after to make a sermon in the cathedral church, and therein affirm, that the said Marsh was an heretic, burnt as such, and was a fire-brand in hell.

The Rev. Mr. Marsh wrote, besides his examinations while in prison, several letters.

LETTER I.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH to his Friends.

HERE you have, dearly beloved friends in Christ, the chief and principal articles of christian doctrine briefly touched, which heretofore I have both believed, professed, and taught, and as yet do believe, profess, and teach, and am surely purposed, by God's grace, to continue in the same until the last day. I do want both time and opportunity to write out at large the probations, causes, effects, and contraries or errors of these articles, which whoso desireth to know, let them read over the common places of the pious and learned men, Philip Melancthon, and Erasmus Sarcerius, whose judgment in these matters of religion I do chiefly follow and lean unto. The Lord give us understanding in all things, and deliver us from this evil world, according to his will and pleasure, and bring us again out of this hell of affliction into which it hath pleased the merciful Lord to throw us down: and deliver us out of the mouth of the lion, and from all evil doing, and keep us unto his everlasting and heavenly kingdom. Amen.

Though Satan be suffered as wheat to sift us for a time, yet our faith faileth not through Christ's aid, but that we are all times able and ready to confirm the faith of our weak brethren, "and always ready to give an answer to every man that asketh us a reason of the hope that is in us, and that with meekness and reverence; having a good conscience: and whereas they backbite us as evil doers, they may be ashamed, for-asmuch as they have falsely accused our good conversation in Christ." I thought myself now of late years, for the cares of this life, well settled with my loving and faithful wife and children, and also well quieted in the peaceable possession of that pleasant Euphrates, I do confess it; but the Lord, who worketh all things for the best to them that love him, would not there leave me, but did take my dear and beloved wife from me; whose death was a painful cross to my flesh.

Also I thought myself now of late well placed under my most loving and most gentle Mr. Laurence Saunders, in the cure of Langhton. But the Lord of his great mercy would not suffer me long there to continue (although for the small time I was in his vineyard, I was not an idle workman). But he hath provided me, I perceive it, to taste of a far other cup; for by violence hath he yet once again driven me out of that pleasing Babylon, that I should not taste too much of her wanton pleasures, but with his most dearly beloved disciples to have my inward rejoicing in the cross of his Son Jesus Christ; the glory of whose church, I see it well, standeth not in the harmonious sound of bells and organs, nor yet in the glittering of mitres and copes, neither in the shining of gilt images and lights (as the blind papists do judge it), but in continual labours and daily afflictions for his name's sake.

Take heed and beware of the leaven of the scribes and of the sadducees; I mean the erroneous doctrine of the papists which with their glosses deprave the scriptures. For as the apostle St. Peter doth teach us, There shall be false teachers amongst us, which privily shall bring in damnable sects; and he saith, that many shall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of, and that through covetousness they shall with feigned words make merchandize of us: and Christ earnestly warneth us, to beware of false prophets, which come to us in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravenous wolves. By their fruits you shall know them. The fruits of the prophets are their doctrine. In this place are we christians taught, that we should try the preachers, and others that come under colour to set forth true religion unto us, according to the saying of St. Paul, Try all things, hold fast that which is good.

Letter II. To the faithful professors of Langhton on the same subject as Letter I.

LETTER III.

From the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH to some of his FRIENDS at MANCHESTER, in LANCASHIRE.

GRACE be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

After salutations in Christ to you, with thanks for your friendly remembrance of me, desiring and wishing unto you, not only in my letters, but also in my daily prayers, such consolation in spirit, and taste of heavenly treasures, that ye may thereby continually work in faith, labour in love, persevere in hope, and be patient in all your tribulations and persecutions, even unto the end and coming of Christ; these shall be earnestly to exhort and beseech you in Christ, as ye have received the Lord Jesus, even so to walk, rooted in him, and not to be afraid of any terror of your adversaries, be they ever so many and mighty, and you on the other side ever so few and weak: for the battle is the Lord's. And as in times past, God was with Abraham, Moses, Isaac, David, the Maccabees, and others, and fought for them, and delivered all their enemies into their hands, even so hath he promised to be with us also unto the world's end, and so to assist, strengthen, and help us, that no man shall be able to withstand us. "For as I was with with Moses, so will I be with thee," saith God, "and will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and bold; neither fear nor dread; for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest. Now if God be on our side, who can be against us?"

In this our spiritual warfare is no man overcome, unless he traitorously leave and forsake his captain, either cowardly cast away his weapons, or willingly yield himself to his enemies, or fearfully turn his back and fly. Be strong therefore in the Lord, dear brethren, and in the power of his might, and put on all the armour of God, that ye may be able to stand steadfast against the crafty assaults of the devil.

Now what weapons ye must fight withal, learn of St. Paul, a champion both much exercised, and also most valiant and invincible. For we must think none other but that the life of man is a perpetual warfare upon earth, as the examples of all godly men throughout all ages do declare. The valient warrior St. Paul being delivered into the hands of the ungodly, and that so many times, and also from so many extreme perils and dangers of death, as he himself doth witness, is fain to commit himself in the end to the rough waters of the sea, where he was in great peril and jeopardy of his own life: yet was God always (to the great comfort of all that hear it) most ready to comfort and succour him, and gloriously delivered him out of all his troubles: so that no man that invaded him, could do him any harm: and in the end he was compelled to say, I have finished my course, the time of my departing is at hand, I long to be loosed, and to be with Christ, which is the best of all, most heartily desiring death.

Let us therefore, knowing Satan's deceits and rancour, walk the more warily, and take unto us the shield of faith, wherewith we may be able to quench and to overcome all the fiery and deadly darts of the wicked. Let us take to the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and learn to use the same according to the example of our grand captain Christ. Let us fast and pray continually. For this frantic kind of devils goeth not out otherwise, as Christ doth teach us, but by faithful prayer and fasting, which is true abstinence and soberness of living, if we use the same according to the doctrine of the gospel and word of God. Fasting is acceptable to God, if it be done without hypocrisy, that is to say, if we use it to this intent, that thereby this mortal body may be tamed and brought under the subjection of the spirit: and again, if we fast to this intent, that we may spare wherewith to help and succour our poor needy brethren.

This fast do the christians use all the days of their life, although among the common sort of people remaineth yet still that superstitious kind of fasting, which God so earnestly reproveth by his prophet Isaiah. For as for true chastening of the body, and abstaining from vice, with shewing mercy to our needy neighbours, we will neither understand nor hear of it, but still think with the Jews, that we do God a great pleasure when we fast, and that we then fast, when we abstain from one thing and fill our bellies with another. And verily in this point doth our superstition much exceed the superstition of the Jews; for we never read that they ever took it for a fast, to abstain from flesh, and to eat either fish or white-meat, as they call it.

To fasting or prayer must be joined alms, and mercy towards the poor and needy; and that our alms may be acceptable unto God, three things are chiefly required.

First, that we give with a cheerful and joyful heart: for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver.

Secondly, That we give liberally, putting aside all niggardliness, knowing that he that soweth little, shall reap little, and he that soweth plenteously, shall reap plenteously. Let every man therefore do according as he is able. The poorest wretch in the world may give as great and acceptable alms in the fight of God, as the richest man in the world can do. The poor widow that did offer but two mites, which make a farthing, did highly please Christ; insomuch that he himself affirmed, That she of her penury had added more to the offerings of God, than all the rich men, which of their superfluity had cast in very much. "For if there be first a willing mind, (as St. Paul saith) it is accepted, according to what a man hath, and not according to what a man hath not."

Thirdly, We must give without hypocrisy and ostentation, not seeking the praise of men, or our own glory or profit. And although the scriptures in some places make mention of a reward to our alms and other good works, yet ought we not to think that we do merit or deserve any thing; but rather we ought to acknowledge, that God in his mere mercy rewardeth in us his own gifts. For what hath he that giveth alms, that he hath not received? He then that giveth to a poor man any manner of thing, giveth not of his own, but of those goods which he hath received of God. "What hast thou," saith the Apostle, that thou hast not received? if thou hast received it, why rejoicest thou, as though thou hadst not received it?"

Wherefore, my dear brethren, be ye fervent in the law of God, and venture your lives, if need shall require, for the testament of the fathers, and so shall ye receive great honour, and an everlasting name.

Beloved in Christ, let us not faint because of affliction, wherewith God trieth all them that are sealed unto life everlasting: for the only way into the kingdom of God is through much tribulation. For the kingdom of heaven (as God teacheth by his prophet Esdras) is like a city built and set upon a broad field, and full of all good things, but the entrance thereof is narrow, (full of sorrow and travail, perils and labours) like as if there were a fire at the right hand, and a deep water at the left; and as it were one strait path between them both, so small, that there could but one man go there. If this city were now given to an heir, and he never went through the perilous way, how could he receive his inheritance? Wherefore seeing we are in this narrow and strait way, which leadeth unto the most joyful and pleasant city of everlasting life; let us not stagger, neither turn back, being afraid of the dangerous and perilous way, but follow our captain Jesus Christ in the narrow and strait way, and be afraid of nothing, no, not even of death itself: for it is he that must lead us to our journey's end, and open us the door to everlasting life. Consider also the course of this world how many there be which for their master's sake, or for a little promotion's sake, would venture their lives in worldly affairs, as commonly in wars, and yet is their reward but light and transitory, and our's is unspeakably great, and everlasting. They suffer pains to be made lords on earth for a short season: how much more ought we to endure like pains, yea, peradventure much less, to be made kings in heaven for evermore? Consider also the wicked of this world, which for a little pleasure's sake, or to be avenged on their enemies will fight with sword and weapons, and put themselves in danger of imprisonment and hanging. So much as virtue is better than vice, and God mightier than the devil, so much ought we to excel them in this our spiritual battle.

And seeing, brethren, it hath pleased God to send me, and that most worthy minister of Christ, John Bradford, your countryman, in the fore-front of this battle, where (for the time) is most danger, I beseech you all, in the bowels of Christ, to help us, and all our fellow-soldiers standing in like perilous places, with your prayers to God for us, that we may quit ourselves like men in the Lord, and give some example of boldness and constancy mingled with patience in the fear of God, that you and others our brethren, through our example, may be so encouraged and strengthened to follow us, that you also may leave example to your weak brethren in the world to follow you. Amen.

Consider

Consider what I say? the Lord give us understanding in all things. Brethren, the time is short; it remaineth that you use this world as though ye used it not: for the fashion of this world vanisheth away. Be meek and long-suffering, serve and edify one another, with the gift that God hath given you. Beware of strange doctrine; lay aside the old conversation of greedy lusts, and walk in a new life. Beware of uncleanness, covetousness, foolish talking, false doctrine, and drunkenness: rejoice and be thankful towards God, and submit yourselves one to another. Cease from sin, spend no more time in vice, be sober and apt to pray, be patient in trouble, love each other, and let the glory of God and profit of your neighbour be the only mark you shoot at in all your doings. And above all things cleave ye fast to him, who was delivered to death for our sins, and rose again for our justification. To whom with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and power for evermore. Amen.

Salute from me in Christ all others which love us in the faith, and at your discretion make them partakers of these letters: and pray ye all for me and others in bonds for the gospel, that the same God (which by grace has called us from wicked popery unto true christianity, and now of love proveth our patience by persecution) will of his mercy and favour in the end gloriously deliver us, either by death, or by life, to his glory. Amen. At Lancaster, August 30, 1555.

By me, an unprofitable servant of Christ,
GEORGE MARSH.

A P R A Y E R

Of the Rev. Mr. GEORGE MARSH, which he used to say daily.

O Lord Jesus Christ, which art the only physician of wounded consciences, we miserable sinners trusting in thy gracious goodness, do briefly open unto thee the evil tree of our hearts: thou thoroughly perceivest as well the inward lusts, doubtings, and denying thy providence, as those gross outward sins which we commit openly and daily. Wherefore we beseech thee according to the little measure of our infirmity, although we be very unable and unapt to pray, that thou wouldst mercifully circumscribe our stony hearts, and for these old hearts create new within us, and replenish us with a new spirit, and water and moisten us with the juice of heavenly grace, and wells of spiritual waters, whereby the inward venom and noisome juice of the flesh may be dried up, and custom of the old man changed, and our hearts, always bringing forth thorns and briars to be burned with fire, from henceforth may bear spiritual fruits in righteousness and holiness, unto life everlasting. Amen.

Beloved, among other exercises, I do daily on my knees use this confession of sins, willing and exhorting you to do the same, and daily to acknowledge unfeignedly to God your unbelief, unthankfulness, and disobedience against him.

C H A P. VIII.

The LIVES, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM of Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, the Rev. Mr. JOHN CARMAKER, Mr. JOHN SIMSON, Mr. JOHN WARNE, and Mr. JOHN ARDELEY, under the Persecution of the Inhuman BONNER, in the Bloody Reign of MARY I.

I.

The HISTORY of Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, a Monk and Priest, who, for striking a Popish Priest, was apprehended, and, first having his Hand cut off, was martyred for his constant Adherence to the Truth.

WILLIAM FLOWER otherwise named Branch, was born at Snow-hill, in the county of Cambridge, where he went to school some years, and then came to the abbey of Ely; where, after he had remained a while, he was a professed monk, according to the order and rule of the same house wherein he remained, using and bearing the habit of a monk, and observing the rules and orders of the same house, until he came to twenty-one years of age, or thereabouts; and before he came to that age, and being a professed monk, he was made a priest also in the same house, and there did celebrate and sing mass. After that, by reason of a visitation, and certain injunctions by the authority of Henry the eighth, he forsook the same house, and casting from him the monk's habit and religion, took upon him and used the habit of a secular priest, and returned to Snow-hill, where he was born; and there he did celebrate and sing mass, and taught children about half a year.

He then went to Ludgate, in Suffolk, and there served as a secular priest about a quarter of a year; from thence to Stoniland, where he tarried, and served as a secular priest also, until the coming out of the six articles: and then he departed from thence, and went into Gloucestershire, where after he had made his abode in that country a while, at length in Tewksbury, according to God's holy ordinance, he married a wife, with whom he ever after faithfully and honestly continued; and after his marriage, he tarried in Tewksbury about two years together, and from thence he went to Brosley where he tarried three quarters of a year, and practised physic and chirurgery. From thence he removed into Northamptonshire, where under a gentleman he taught children to write and read. But departing from those parts he came to London, and there remained for a certain space. After that, being desirous to see his country, he returned to Snow-hill, where he was born; from thence to Brankstrey in Essex, then to Coxall, where he taught children, and coming to Lambeth, near London, he hired a house, where he and his wife did dwell together: however for the most part he was always abroad, except once or twice in a month, to visit and see his wife; where he being at home upon Easter-Sunday, about ten or eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the same day, came over the water from Lambeth into St. Margaret's church at Westminster; when seeing a priest, named John Chelam, administering and giving the sacrament of the altar to the people, and therewith being greatly offended in his conscience with the priest for the same, did strike and wound him upon the head, and also upon the arm and hand with his wood knife, the priest having the same time in his hand a chalice, with certain consecrated hosts therein, which were sprinkled with the blood of the said priest.

Being examined before bishop Bonner, he confessed he had done wrong, submitting himself willingly to punishment, when it should come. Howbeit touching his belief in the sacrament, and the popish ministration, he neither would nor did submit himself.

Mr. William Flower being apprehended and laid in the Gatehouse at Westminster, (where he had given two groats the same day, to the prisoners, saying, he would shortly be with them) having as many irons as he could bear, was afterwards summonsed before bishop Bonner his ordinary, April 19, 1555, where the bishop, after he had sworn him upon a book, (according to his ordinary manner) ministered articles and interrogatories to him. Previous to this the following conversation took place between Mr. Flower and Mr. Robert Smith, a fellow prisoner.

A CONVERSATION between Mr. ROBERT SMITH and Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, concerning the Crime with which the latter stood charged, of having struck and wounded a Popish Priest, while officiating before the ALTAR, at Westminster.

Smith. FRIEND, forasmuch as I understand that you do profess the gospel, and also have done so a long season, I am bold to come unto you, and in the way of communication to demand and learn a truth at your own mouth, of certain things by you committed, to the astonishment not only of me, but of divers others that also profess the truth.

Flower. I praise God for his great goodness in shewing me the light of his holy word; and I give you hearty thanks for your visitation, intending by God's grace to declare all the truth that you shall demand lawfully of me, in all things.

Smith. Then I desire you to shew me the truth of your deed, committed on John Chelham, priest, in the church, as near as you can, that I may hear from your own mouth how it was.

Flower. I came from my house at Lambeth over the water, and entering into St. Margaret's church, and there seeing the people falling down before a most detestable idol, being moved with extreme zeal for my God, whom I saw before my face dishonoured, I drew forth my hanger, and struck the priest which ministered the same unto them; whereupon I was immediately apprehended; and this is most true, as the act is manifest.

Smith. Did you not know the person that you struck, or was you not zealous upon him for any evil will or hatred between you at any time?

Flower. No, verily, I never to my knowledge saw the person before that time, neither had evil will or malice; for if he had not had it, another should, if I had at any time come where the like occasion had been ministered, if God had permitted me to do it.

Smith. Do you think that thing to be well done, and after the rule of the gospel?

Flower. I do confess all flesh to be subject to the power of Almighty God, whom he maketh his ministers to do his will and pleasure; as in example, Moses, Aaron, Phineas, Joshua, Zimri, Jehu, Judith, Mattathias, with many others, not only changing decrees, but also planting zeals to his honour, against all order and respect of flesh and blood. For, as St. Paul saith, "His works are past finding out:" by whose Spirit I have also given my flesh at this present unto such order, as it shall please the good will of God to appoint, in death, which before the act committed I looked for.

Smith. Think you it convenient for me, or any other, to do the like by your example?

Flower. No verily, neither do I know if it were to do again, whether I could do it again, or no: for I was up very early at St. Paul's church upon Christ's day in the morning, to have done it in my jealousy: but when I came there, I was no more able to do it, than now to undo that which is done; and yet now being compelled by the Spirit, not only to come over the water, and to enter the church, but being in mind fully content to die for the Lord, gave over my flesh willingly without all fear, I praise God. Wherefore I cannot teach you to do the like. First, Because I know not what is in you. Secondly, Because the rules of the gospel command us to suffer with patience all wrongs and injury: yet nevertheless, if he makes you worthy, that hath made me zealous, you shall not be hindered, judged, nor condemned: for he doth in his people his unspeakable works in all ages, which no man can comprehend. I humbly beseech you to judge the best of the Spirit, and condemn not God's doings: for I cannot express with my mouth, the great mercies that God hath shewed on me in this thing, which I repent not.

Smith. Are you not assured to have death ministered unto you for the same act committed, and even with extremity?

Flower. I did, before the deed committed, adjudge my body to die for the same: whereupon I carried about me in writing, my opinion of God and the holy scriptures; that if it had pleased God to have given them leave to have killed my body in the church, they might in the said writing have seen my hope, which, (I praise God) is laid up safe within my breast, notwithstanding any death that may be ministered upon my body in this world; being ascertained of everlasting life through Jesus Christ our Lord, and being most heartily sorry for all my offences committed in this flesh, and trusting shortly, through his mercy, to cease from the same.

Smith. I need not examine or commune with you of the hope that you have any further: for I perceive (God be praised) you are in good state, and therefore I beseech God, for his mercies, spread his wings over you, that, as for his love you have been zealous, even to the loss of this life, so he may give you his Holy Spirit to conduct you out of this world into a better life, which I think will be shortly.

Flower. I hunger for the same, dear friend, being fully ascertained that they can kill but the body, which I am assured shall receive life again everlasting, and see no more death; intirely desiring you and all that fear the Lord, to pray with me to Almighty God, to perform the same in me shortly.—And thus Robert Smith departed, leaving him in the dungeon, and went again to his ward. And this is the truth, as near as the said Smith could report it.

Now to return again to the matter of his examination. We shewed before, how this William Flower, after his striking the priest, first was laid in the Gatehouse: then, being examined before bishop Bonner, had articles ministered against him, the copy whereof here followeth.

ARTICLES exhibited by Bishop BONNER, against Mr. WILLIAM FLOWER, late of LAMBETH, in the County of SURRY.

1. THAT thou being of lawful age and discretion, at the least seventeen years old, wast a professed monk in the late abbey of Ely, wherein after thy profession thou remainedst until the age of twenty-one years, using all the mean time the habit and religion of the same house, and wast reputed and taken notoriously for such a person.

2. That thou wast ordained and made priest, according to the laudable custom of the catholic church, and afterwards thou didst execute and minister as a priest, and wast commonly reputed, named, and taken for a priest.

3. That after the premises, thou, forgetting God, thy conscience, honesty, and the laudable order of the catholic church, didst, contrary to thy profession and vow, take, as unto thy wife, one woman, commonly called Alice Pulton, in the parish church of Tewksbury, in the diocese of Gloucester, with whom thou hadst mutual cohabitation, as man and wife, and had by her two children.

4. That thou being a religious man and a priest, didst, contrary to the order of the ecclesiastical laws, take upon thee to practise in divers places within the diocese of London, physic and chirurgery, when thou wast not admitted expert nor learned.

5. That upon Easter-day last past, that is to wit, the 14th of April, within the parish church of St. Margaret's, at Westminster, within the county of Middlesex, and diocese of London, thou didst maliciously, outrageously, and violently pull out thy wood-knife or hanger. And whereas the priest and minister there, called John Chelham, was executing his cure and charge, especially in doing his service, and administering the sacrament of the altar to communicants, then didst thou wickedly and abominably smite with thy said weapon, the said Priest, first upon the head, and afterwards upon his hands or other parts of his body, drawing blood abundantly from him; the said priest then holding the said sacrament in his hand, and giving no occasion why thou shouldst so hurt him; the people being grievously offended therewith, and the said church polluted thereby, so that the inhabitants were compelled to repair to another church to communicate, and receive the said sacrament.

6. That

6. That by reason of the premises, thou wast and art by the ecclesiastical laws of the church, amongst other penalties, excommunicated and accursed in very deed, and not to be accompanied withal, neither in the church nor elsewhere, but in special cases.

7. That thou, concerning the truth of Christ's natural body and blood in the sacrament of the altar, hast been by the space of one or more years, and yet art at this present, of this opinion, that in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed, contained (under the form of bread) the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

8. That thou for the hatred and disdain that thou hadst and didst bear against the said sacrament, and against the said priest administering the same, didst smite and hurt him in manner before declared.

9. That thou art also, by the order of the ecclesiastical laws of the church, to be reputed, taken, and adjudged a very heretic, and to be punished by and with the pains due for heresy, by reason of the said heresy and damnable opinion.

10. That all the premises be true, manifest, notorious, and famous, and that upon the same, and every part thereof, there was and is within the said parish of St. Margaret's, and other places thereabouts, a public voice and fame.

WILLIAM FLOWER's Answers.

TO the first article he answereth and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof, except that he saith and confesseth that he never consented and agreed in his heart to be a monk.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof. Howbeit he saith, that he never did, nor yet doth esteem the said order of priesthood according to the order of the said catholic church, because he was offended therewith in his conscience.

To the third article he answereth and confesseth, That he intended to live in holy matrimony, and not forgetting God did marry with the said Alice Pulton named in this article, wherein he believed that he did well, and according to God's laws. Further, confessing and believing, that all the time when he was a professed monk, and made priest, he did thereby utterly forget God: but when he did so marry the said Alice Pulton, and in continuing with her did beget three children, he did remember God, as he saith, and believeth that he did then lawfully.

To the fourth article he answereth and believeth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the fifth article he answereth and confesseth, That his conscience being greatly offended with the said John Cheltam, priest, for administering the sacrament of the altar to the people at the place and time specified in this article, he did so smite and strike the same priest with his hanger or wood-knife, as well upon his head, as upon other parts and places of his body, which he remembereth not, whereby the blood ran out, and was shed in the said church, as he believeth, having, as he saith, none other cause or matter so to do, but only that his conscience was offended and grieved, in that the same priest did so give and administer the said sacrament to the people: which people he believed was greatly abashed and offended with this said act and doing, and were compelled to go out of the church, and to repair to another to receive the said sacrament. And further, being then demanded and examined, whether he intended to have killed the said priest, or not; he said he would not answer thereunto. And being further examined, whether he did well or evil in striking the said priest, he would make no answer thereunto.

To the sixth he answereth, That whether he be so excommunicated or accursed, as is contained in this article, he referreth himself to the ecclesiastical laws.

To the seventh he answereth, That by the space of 26 years now past, he hath always been, and yet is of this opinion touching the said sacrament of the altar, as followeth; that in the sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration, there is not really, truly, and in very deed, contained, under form of bread, the very true and natural body of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

To the eighth he answereth and believeth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the ninth he answereth, and herein he referreth himself to the said laws, custom, and ordinance specified in this article, that is to say, the canonical laws.

To the last he answereth and believeth, That those things before by him confessed be true, and those which he hath denied be untrue; and that the said common voice and fame hath and doth only labour and go upon those things by him before confessed.

By me WILLIAM FLOWER.

After the depositions of certain witnesses were taken, the said bishop spake to William Flower, and asked him, if he knew any matter or cause why sentence should not be read, and he to be pronounced as an heretic. Whereunto he answered, I have nothing at all to say, for I have already said unto you all that I have to say; and what I have said, I will not go from: and therefore do what you will. Which when he had spoken, the bishop proceeded to the sentence, condemning and excommunicating him for an heretic, and after pronounced him also to be degraded, and so committed him to the secular power. Upon the 24th day of the aforesaid month of April, which was St. Mark's eve, he was brought to the place of martyrdom, which was in St. Margaret's church-yard at Westminster, where the fact was committed.

Mr. Cholmeley now came to him, desiring him to recant his heresy, whereby he might do good and not be damned: to which Flower answered, Sir, I beseech you for God's sake to be contented: for what I have said, I have said, and I have been of this faith from the beginning; and I trust to the living God he will give me his holy Spirit to continue to the end.

This done, first his hand being held up against the stake, was struck off, his left hand being fastened behind him. At which he in no part of his body did shrink, but once a little he stirred his shoulders. When fire was set unto him, he cried with a loud voice, O thou Son of God have mercy upon me, and receive my soul, three times, lifting up, notwithstanding, his stump with his other arm as long as he could.

May 3, 1555, a letter was sent to George Colt and Thomas Daniel, to make search for and apprehend John Bernard and John Walsh, who used to repair to Sudbury, and carrying about with them the bones of Pygot that was burned, shewed them to the people, persuading them to be constant in his religion; and upon examination to commit them to further ordering, according to the laws.

This day Stephen Appes was committed to the Little Ease in the Tower, there to remain two or three days till further examination.

The 12th day, Mr. Thomas Ross, preacher, was by the council's letters delivered from the Tower to the sheriff of Norfolk, to be conveyed to the bishop of Norwich; and he either to reduce him to recant, or else proceed against him according to the law.

The 16th, a letter was sent to the lord treasurer, signifying what the lord-lieutenant had done for Ross; and as for Appes, whom the lieutenant of the Tower reporteth to be mad, his lordship perceiving the same to be true, should commit him to Bedlam, there to remain till their further order.

The MARTYRDOM of Mr. JOHN CARDMAKER, and Mr. JOHN WARNE, May 30, 1555.

MR. Cardmaker was first an observant friar before the dissolution of the abbeyes; afterwards was a married minister, and in king Edward's time appointed to be a reader in St. Paul's, where the papists were so enraged against him for his doctrine's sake, that in his reading they cut and mangled his gown with their knives. Mr. Cardmaker being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow, bishop of Bath, was brought to London and put in the Fleet prison, king Edward's laws being yet in force. But after the parliament was ended, in which the pope was again admitted as supreme head of the church, and the bishops had also gotten power and authority, officially, to exercise their tyranny, these two were brought before the bishop of Winchester, lord chancellor, and others appointed by commission (as before mentioned) to examine the faith of such as were then prisoners; and as unto others before, so now unto them the chancellor offered the queen's mercy, if they would agree, and be conformable, &c.

To this they both made such an answer, as the chancellor with his fellow commissioners allowed them for catholics. Cardmaker was conveyed to the Compter in Bread-street, the bishop of London procuring it to be published, that he should shortly be delivered, after he had subscribed to transubstantiation and certain other articles.

ARTICLES against JOHN CARDMAKER.

1. I Edmund, bishop of London, object against thee John Taylor, alias Cardmaker, that thou wast and art of the city and diocese of London, and so of the jurisdiction of me Edmund, bishop of London.

2. Item, That thou in times past didst profess the rule of St. Francis, and didst by vow promise to keep poverty, chastity, and obedience.

3. Item, that thou in times past did receive all the orders of the church then used.

4. Item, That thou after thy said entry into religion and profession, didst take to wife a widow, and with her hast carnal copulation, breaking thereby thy vow and order, and also the ordinance of the church.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and so dost believe, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the visible signs there, (bread and wine) there is really and truly the true and very natural body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

6. Item, That the belief of the catholic church is, that in having the body and blood of Christ really and truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, is to have (by the omnipotent power of God) the body and blood of Christ invisibly and really present under the said sacrament, and not to make thereby a new God, or a new Christ, or a new body of Christ.

7. Item, That it may stand well together, and so is the faith of the catholic church, that the body of Christ is visibly and truly ascended into heaven, and there is in the visible form of his humanity; and yet the same body in substance is invisibly and truly contained in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That Christ at his last supper taking bread into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his apostles, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body; did institute a sacrament there, willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof.

Mr. CARDMAKER's ANSWERS.

TO the first article he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answereth and confesseth, That he being under age, did profess the said order and religion, and afterwards by the authority of king Henry VIII. he was dispensed with for the same religion.

To the third he answereth, and confesseth the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the fourth he answereth and confesseth the first part thereof to be true; and to the second part of the same article he answereth, that in marriage he brake no vow because he was set at liberty to marry, both by the laws of this realm, and also by the laws and ordinances of the church of the same.

To the fifth he answereth and confesseth, That he hath believed and taught as it is contained in this article, but he doth not now so believe or teach.

To the sixth he answereth, That he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the seventh he answereth, That he doth not believe the same to be true in any part thereof.

To the eighth he answereth and doth believe, that it is true, that is to say, that Christ taking bread at his last supper into his hands, blessing it, breaking it, giving it to his disciples, and saying, Take, eat, this is my body, did institute a sacrament there. And to the other part of this article, namely, Willing that his body really and truly should be contained in the said sacrament, no substance of bread and wine there remaining, but only the accidents thereof, he answereth, that he doth not believe the same to be true.

By me

JOHN CARDMAKER.

The next day Mr. Cardmaker did exhibit unto the bishop the following schedule:

"Where in my answers to your articles I deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament, I mean not his sacramental presence, for that I confess, but my denial is of his carnal presence in the same. But yet further, because this word is oftentimes taken by the holy fathers, not only for bread and wine, but also for the whole administration and receiving of the same according to Christ's institution: so I say, that Christ is present spiritually too, and in all them which worthily receive the sacrament: so that my denial is still of the real, carnal, and corporal presence in the sacrament, and not of the sacramental nor spiritual presence. This I have thought good to add to my former answer, because no man should misunderstand it."

ARTICLES objected against JOHN WARNE, Upholsterer, of the Parish of St. JOHN, in WALBROOK.

FIRST, That thou John Warne, being aged 29, of the parish of St. John of Walbrook, in London, hast believed, and dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very true and natural body of our Saviour Christ in substance, under the forms of bread and wine.

Item, That thou hast believed, and dost believe, that after the words of consecration spoken by the priest, there is not the body of Christ; but that there doth only remain the substance of material bread, as it is before the consecration.

Item, That thou hast said and dost believe, that if the catholic church do believe and teach, that there is in the mass now used in England, and in other places of Christendom, a sacrifice containing the body and blood of Christ really and truly; then that belief and faith of the church is naught.

Item, That thou hast said, that about a twelvemonth ago and more, a rough spaniel of thine was shorn on the head, and had a crown like a priest made on the same, thou didst laugh at it, and like it, though thou didst it not thyself, nor knewest who did it.

Item, That thou neither this Lent last past, nor at any time since the queen's majesty's reign, hast come into the church, or heard mass, or been confessed, or received the sacrament of the altar; and hast said that thou art not sorry that thou hast so done, but that thou art glad, because thou hast not therewith defiled thy conscience.

Upon all which articles John Warne being examined by the said bishop Bonner, in the presence of divers witnesses, May 23, 1555, did confess and believe the same, and subscribe hereunto his name with his own hand.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

It was also objected by the aforesaid bishop,

Item, That thou John Warne wast in time past here in the city of London, accused in Guildhall of heresy against the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the laws of this realm of England in the time of king Henry VIII. and when alderman Barnes was then sheriff, and the Thursday after that Anne Askew was burnt in Smithfield; and thereupon thou wast sent a prisoner to Newgate, to whom Edmund bishop of London, did repair with his chaplains, to instruct thee in the true faith of Christ, touching the said sacrament of the altar, and to bring thee from thy error, which was, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the body of Christ, nor any corporal presence fence of Christ's body and blood, under the forms of bread and wine; but that in the said sacrament there is only material bread and wine, without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all: and because thou wouldst not leave and forsake thy said heresy therein, but persist and abide obstinately and wilfully therein, thou wert, according to the said laws condemned to death and to be burnt; and thereupon suit being made for thee to the king and others in the court, thou hadst a pardon of king Henry VIII. and thereby didst save thy life.

Nevertheless, in thy heart, conscience, and mind, thou didst both then, and also afore believe no otherwise than at this present thou dost believe; that is to say, that in the sacrament of the altar there is neither the very true body or blood of Christ, nor any other substance but the substance of material bread and wine; and to receive the said material bread and wine, and to break it, and to distribute it among the people, only is the true receiving of Christ's body, and no otherwise: so that thy faith and belief is, that in the said sacrament there is no substance of Christ's material body and blood; but all the thing that is there is material bread, and the receiving of it as before; and that the substance of the natural and true body of Christ, born of the virgin Mary, is only in heaven and not in the sacrament of the altar. In which thine opinion thou hast ever hitherto since continued, and so dost continue at this present, thou confessing all this to be true, and in witness thereof subscribing thy name thereunto, as followeth.

By me, JOHN WARNE.

John Warne being examined upon the aforesaid articles by the bishop before certain witnesses, whose names were John Roswell, John Heywood, and Robert Ravens, the 23d of May, did answer for the same, confessing and granting the articles and contents thereof to be true, according as they were objected in every part, subscribing also the same with his hand. Such strength and fortitude God's Holy Spirit wrought in him, to stand stoutly and confidently to the defence of the sincere doctrine of his Son.

Whereupon the bishop exhorting him with many words to leave his heresies, (as he called them) and to return to the bosom of his mother the holy church, commanded him to appear again the next day, being the 24th of May.

Who so doing (and answering as he did before) was ordered to come thither again in the afternoon, and so he did: at which time he was earnestly exhorted by the said bishop to recant his opinions. To whom he answered, that he would not depart from his received profession, unless he were thereunto thoroughly persuaded by the holy scriptures.

Upon which answer he was ordered to come again the next day, being the 25th of May, at one of the clock in the afternoon. At which day and hour the bishop examined him again upon all his former articles objected, to which he, most constantly adhered with this further answer added thereunto: I am persuaded (said he) that I am in the right opinion, and I see no cause to recant; for all the filthiness and idolatry is in the church of Rome.

The bishop then seeing that notwithstanding all his fair promises and terrible threatnings, (whereof he used many) he could not prevail; finished this examination with the definitive sentence of condemnation pronounced against the said John Warne, and charged the sheriffs of London with him, under whose custody he remained in the prison of Newgate, until the 30th day of May.

Which day being appointed for their execution, John Cardmaker, and the said John Warne, were brought by the sheriffs to the place where they should suffer; who being come to the stake, first the sheriffs called Mr. Cardmaker aside, and talked with him secretly, during which time Mr. Warne had said his prayers, was chained to the stake, and had wood and reeds set about him, while Mr. Cardmaker was talking with the sheriffs.

The people who had before heard that Mr. Cardmaker would recant, and beholding this, were greatly afflicted, thinking indeed that Mr. Cardmaker would now recant at the burning of Mr. Warne. At length Mr. Cardmaker departed from the sheriffs, and came towards the stake, and (in his garments as he was) kneeled down and made a long prayer in silence to himself. His prayers being ended, he rose up, put off his clothes unto his shirt, and went with a bold courage unto the stake, and kissed it: and taking Mr. Warne by the hand, he heartily comforted him, and cheerfully gave himself to be bound to the stake. The people seeing this so suddenly done, contrary to their fearful expectation, as men delivered out of a great doubt, cried out for joy, saying, God be praised, the Lord strengthen thee, Cardmaker, the Lord Jesus receive thy spirit. And this continued while the executioner put fire to them, and both passed through the fire to the blessed rest and peace among God's holy saints and martyrs, to enjoy the crown of triumph and victory prepared for the elect soldiers and warriors of Christ Jesus in his blessed kingdom.

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY, of the Parish of WIGBOROW-THE-GREAT, in ESSEX.

JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY were condemned for the same cause and on the same day with Mr. Cardmaker and John Warne, which was the 25th day of May. But before we come to the story of them, first here is to be noted the copy of the king and queen's letter directed from the court the same day, and sent by a post early in the morning to bishop Bonner, in tenor and form as followeth.

"Right reverend father in God, right trusty and well beloved, we greet you well. And where of late we addressed our letters to the justice of peace within every of the counties of this our realm, whereby amongst other instructions given them for the good order and quiet government of the country round about them, they are willed to have a special regard unto such disordered persons as (forgetting their duties towards God and us) do lean to any erroneous and heretical opinions, refusing to shew themselves conformable to the catholic religion of Christ's church; wherein if they cannot by good admonitions and fair means reform them, they are willed to deliver them to the ordinary, to be by him charitably travelled withal, and removed (if it may be) from their naughty opinions, or else, if they continue obstinate, to be ordered according to the laws provided in that behalf: understanding now, to our no little marvel, that divers of the said disordered persons, being by the justices of the peace, for their contempt and obstinacy, brought to the ordinaries to be used as aforesaid, are either refused to be received at their hands, or if they be received, are neither so travelled with, as christian charity requireth, nor yet proceeded withal according to the order of justice, but are suffered to continue in their errors, to the dishonour of Almighty God, and dangerous example of others; we have thought convenient both to signify our knowledge, and therewith also to admonish you that when any such offenders shall be by the said officers or justices of the peace brought unto you, you to use your good wisdom and discretion in procuring to remove them from their errors, if it may be, or else in proceeding against them (if they shall continue obstinate) according to the order of the laws. Given under our signet at our manor of Hampton-court, the 24th of May, the first and second years of our reign."

This letter coming from the court to the bishop, made him the more earnest and hasty to the condemnation, as well of others, as of these men, of whom we are now treating, namely, Mr. John Simson and Mr. John Ardeley; who being both of one country, of one town, and of one trade, that is, being both husbandmen in the town of Wigborow in Essex, and almost of one age, Simson 34, the other 30, they were brought up both together by the under-sheriff of Essex, before Bonner, bishop of London, upon the accusation of heresy, as in that time it was called.

Here followeth the articles objected against them, with their answers, taken out of the bishop's registers.

ARTICLES

ARTICLES objected by BISHOP BONNER, against JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY, Husbandmen, at FULHAM.

1. THAT thou John Simson (or John Ardeley) husbandman, of the age of 34 years or thereabouts, wast and art of the parish of Great-Wigborow, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that there is here on earth one catholic and universal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounden, under the pain of damnation of thy soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic and universal church, and to the religion of the same, in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in the said faith or religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou hast not believed, nor dost believe that that faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being the members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the said catholic and universal church, and the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep; but to the contrary, thou hast believed, and dost believe, that that faith and religion, which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid have hitherto believed, and do now believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept, and followed by any christian man.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the sacrament of the altar there is in substance the very body and blood of Christ under the forms of bread and wine, and albeit that it be so believed, taught, and preached undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other the churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not so believed, nor dost so believe; but contrariwise, thou hast and dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that there is not in the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material and common bread and wine, with the forms thereof; and that the said material and common bread and wine, are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and by faith to be received, only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and thou hast openly spoken, and to thy power maintained and defended, and so dost believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood, is only to take material and common bread, and to break it, and to distribute it amongst the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, taught, and spoken, that the mass now used in this realm of England and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ, and hath no goodness in it, saving the Glory in the highest, and the epistle and the gospel: and that therefore thou hast not, and wilt not come to be present at the mass, nor receive the sacrament of the altar, or any other sacrament of the church, as they are now used in this realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid.

7. Item, That thou hast in time past believed precisely, and obstinately affirmed and said, and so dost now believe and think, that auricular confession is not needful to be made unto the priest, but it is a thing superfluous and vain, and ought only to be made to God, and to none other person: and likewise thou hast condemned as superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church and the service of the same, and hast said, that no service in the church ought to be said but in the English tongue, and if it be otherwise said, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN SIMSON and JOHN ARDELEY's ANSWERS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first, they believe, that here on earth there is one catholic and universal holy church, which doth hold and believe as is contained in the first article, and that this church is dispersed and scattered abroad throughout the whole world.

To the second, they believe, that they be bound to give faith and credence unto it, as is contained in the second article.

To the third, as concerning the faith and religion of the church of Rome, of Italy, Spain, France, Ireland, Scotland, and other churches in Europe, they say, they have nothing to do with that faith and religion: but as concerning the faith and religion of England, that if the said church of England be ruled and governed by the word of life, then the church of England hath the faith and religion of the catholic church, and not otherwise: and do say also, that if the church of England were ruled by the word of life, it would not go about to condemn them and others of this heresy.

To the fourth they answer, that in the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, there is very bread and very wine, not altered nor changed in substance in any wise, and that he receiveth the said bread and wine, doth spiritually and by faith only receive the body and blood of Christ, but not the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance under the forms of bread and wine.

To the fifth they say, they have answered, in answering to the said fourth article, and yet nevertheless they say, that they have believed, and do believe, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but only the substance of the natural bread and wine.

To the sixth they say, that they believe, that the mass is of the pope, and not of Christ; and therefore it is not good, nor having in it any goodness, saving the Glory in the highest, the epistle and gospel, the creed, and the Lord's Prayer; and for this cause they say they have not, nor will they come and hear mass.

To the seventh John Ardeley answereth and saith, That he believeth the contents of the same to be true; but John Simson doth answer, that he is not as yet fully resolved with himself, what answer to make thereunto; and further, that as touching the common and daily service said and used in the church, he saith that he never said that service in the church ought to be said but in the English tongue; neither did he ever say, that if it be otherwise said and used than in English, it is unlawful and naught.

JOHN ARDELEY and JOHN SIMSON.

The bishop, according to his usual manner, respited them to the afternoon, between the hours of two and three. At which time repeating the articles, and beginning with John Ardeley, he urged and solicited him to recant, but in vain. After this he read the sentence of condemnation against him, and also against John Simson, standing likewise in the same cause and constancy with John Ardeley.

Now John Simson and John Ardeley being delivered to the sheriffs May 25th, they were shortly after sent down from London to Essex, where they were both put to death in one day, but not in the same place; for John Simson suffered at Rochford, and John Ardeley at Raley.

The commissioners charged them with stubbornness and vain-glory, unto whom they answered in defence of their own simplicity, that they were content willingly to yield to the queen all their goods and lands, that they might be suffered to live under her, in keeping their conscience free from all idolatry and popery. Yet this could not be granted, although they had offered all to their heart's blood; so greedily and thirstily are the persecutors of christian blood.

C H A P. IX.

Further PROCEEDINGS of Bishop BONNER against the PROTESTANTS, together with the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, and MARTYRDOMS of THOMAS HAUKEs, THOMAS WATs, THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, who were all inhumanly burnt in the bloody Reign of Queen MARY I.

The ridiculous PROCEEDING of Bishop BONNER, against JOHN TOOLY, whose Body being taken out of his Grave, was given to the secular Power, and so burned for an HERETIC.

ABOUT the same time of the burning of John Simson and John Ardeley, in the beginning of the month of June, fell out a solemn process, and much ado was made about the pope's spirituality, against John Tooly in a case of heresy. The story is this: There was about the time that the Spaniards began first to make a stir in England, one John Tooley, a citizen and poulterer in London, who conspired with others of this society, to rob a Spaniard at St. James's: and altho' the deed was heinous and wicked of itself, yet was it aggravated and made greater than it was by others, being committed against such a person, and against such a country, which both the queen and her whole court did highly favour. The robbery being known, and brought into judgment, Tooly was found guilty, and adjudged to be hanged, whereas notwithstanding in this realm there are many more thefts committed than thieves executed.

The aforesaid Tooley being led to the gallows, (which stood near Charing-Cross) a little before he died, standing upon the cart, read a certain prayer in a printed book, and two other prayers written in two several papers: who then having the halter about his neck, desired the people there present to pray for him, and to bear him witness that he died a true christian man, and that he trusted to be saved only by the merits of Christ's passion, and shedding of his precious blood, and not by any masses, or trentals, images, or saints, which were, as he said, mere idolatry and superstition, and devised by the bishop of Rome; and as the same Tooly, and two others his fellows which were there hanged with him, did steal and rob for covetousness, so the bishop of Rome did sell his masses and trentals, with such paltry, with covetousness, and there being in a great anger (as appeared) against the bishop of Rome, spake with a loud voice the following words: "From the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities; from false doctrine and heresy, and from the contempt of thy word and commandment, Good Lord deliver us."

After this it happened, that when John Tooly had read the bill the first time, it fell from him, and a certain young man (who was thought to be an apprentice) stooped down and took up the bill, and climbed up by the cart, and delivered it to Tooly again, which he again did read to the people. That done, he delivered unto one of the marshal's officers, the book aforesaid, and desired him to deliver it to one Mr. Haukes, saying, that it was his book. Furthermore, he delivered one of the prayers, written in a paper, to one Robert Bromley, serjeant, who desired to have it of him; on the top of which was written a line, containing these words, Beware of Antichrist, and subscribed underneath, By me Thomas Harold, prisoner in the Marshalsea, enemy to Antichrist. For the bill aforesaid, Robert Bromley was afterwards brought, and was fain to ask pardon of the bishop, and to detest all the words of Tooly, and glad so to escape.

Thus while Tooly had made his prayers, as is above-said, to be delivered from the pope's tyranny, by the same prayer he fell into great tyranny. For so soon as the report of this fact came to the ears of the priests and mitred prelates, they were not a little mad thereat, thinking it not tolerable that so great a reproach should be done against the holy father. Calling therefore for a council together, as though it had been a matter of great importance, Tooly's talk at his death was debated among them.

At last (after much pro and contra) they all consented to those men's judgment, who thought it meet that the violating of the pope's holiness should be revenged with fire and faggot. By the cardinal Poole's orders, the bones of Martin Bucer and Paulus Phagius, which had been almost two years in their graves, were taken up and burned at Cambridge, as Tooly's carcass was at London. And besides this, because he would shew some token of his diligence in both universities, he caused Peter Martyr's wife, a woman of worthy memory, to be digged out of the church-yard, and to be buried on the dung-hill. Of these two prodigious acts you shall hear more hereafter. But now to our purpose of Tooly, who having ended his prayer, was hanged and put into his grave, out of which he was digged again by the command of the bishops, and because he was so bold as to deny the authority of the bishop of Rome, at the time of his death, it pleased them to judge and condemn him as an heretic, upon the commandment of the council's letter, as here appeareth.

The COUNCIL'S LETTER to Bishop BONNER.

AFTER our very hearty commendations to your lordship, understanding that of late amongst others that have suffered about London for their offences, one lewd person that was condemned for felony, died very obstinately, professing at the time of his death sundry heretical and erroneous opinions; like as we think it not convenient that such a matter should be overpassed without some example to the world, so we thought good to pray your lordship to cause further inquiry to be made thereof, and thereupon to proceed to the making out of such process as by the ecclesiastical laws is provided in that behalf. And so we bid your lordship heartily well to fare. From Hampton-Court, April 28, 1555.

Your lordship's loving friends,

STEPH. WINTON, Chanc.	R. ROCHESTER
F. SHREWSBURY	WILLIAM PETER
JOHN GAGE	R. SOUTHWELL
THOMAS CHENEY

Soon after a citation was set up upon St. Paul's church door, under the bishop of London's great seal; the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The WRIT or MANDATE of Bishop BONNER, set up at Charing-Cross, St. Paul's Church Door, and at St. Martin's in the Fields, for the citing and further inquiring into the CASE of JOHN TOOLY.

EDMUND, by the sufferance of God, bishop of London, to all singular parsons, vicars, curates, and others, clerks and learned men, being within our diocese of London, and especially unto Richard Clony, our sworn sumner, greeting, salutation, and benediction. Forasmuch as it is come to our hearing by common fame, and the declaration of several credible persons, that one John Tooly, late citizen and poulterer of London, the son of perdition and iniquity, coming to the profundity of malice at the self same time in which he should go to hanging, according to the laws of the realm, for the great theft lately by him committed, at which time chiefly he should have cared for the wealth of his soul, and to have died in the unity of the catholic church, did utter diverts and sundry damnable, blasphemous, and heretical opinions and errors, utterly contrary and repugnant to the verity of the catholic faith, and unity of the same, and did exhort, stir up, and encourage the people, there standing in great multitude, to hold and defend the same errors and opinions: and moreover, certain of the people there standing, as it did appear, affected with errors and heresies, as favourers and defenders of the said Tooley, did confirm and give express consent to the aforesaid words, propositions and affirmations: which thing we do utter with sorrow and bitterness of heart.

We therefore the aforesaid Edmund, and bishop aforesaid, not being able, nor daring to pass over in silence, nor wink at the aforesaid heinous act, left by our negligence and slackness the blood of them might be required at our hands at the most terrible day of judgment, desiring to be certified and informed whether the premises declared unto us be of the truth, and lest that any scabbed sheep, lurking amongst the simple flock of our Lord, do infect them with deadly heresy: to you therefore we straitly charge and command that you cite, or cause to be cited all and singular, having or knowing the truth of the premises, by setting up this citation upon the church door of St. Martin's in the fields, being within our diocese of London, and also upon the cathedral church door of St. Paul's in London, leaving there the copy hereof, or by any other means or ways, the best you can, that this citation and monition may come to their knowledge.

All which and singular by the tenor of these presents we cite and admonish that they appear, and every one of them do appear before us, our vicar general, or commissary, whatsoever he be in that behalf, in our cathedral church of St. Paul's in London, in the consistory place, upon Thursday the second day of May, now next ensuing, betwixt the hours of nine and ten of the clock in the forenoon the same day, to bear witness of the truth in this behalf, and to depose and declare faithfully the truth that they know or have heard of the premises, and moreover to do and receive what law and reason doth require.

Further we commit unto you as before, and straitly enjoining you do command, that ye will generally cite the wife of the said Tooley that is dead, and his children, and his kindred by father and mother, his friends and familiars especially, and all other and every of them, if there be any perhaps that desire to defend and purge the remembrance of the person in the premises, that ye admonish them after the manner and form aforesaid, whom we likewise, by the tenor of these presents, do in such sort cite and admonish that they appear all, and that every one of them do appear (under pain to be compelled to keep silence for ever hereafter in this behalf) before us, or our vicar general in spiritual matters, or such our commissary, at the day, hour, and place aforesaid, to defend the good name and remembrance of him that is dead, and to say, alledge, and propose in due form of law a cause reasonable, if they have or can tell of any, why the said John Tooley, that is dead, ought not to be determined, and declared for such an heretic and excommunicate person, and his remembrance condemned, in the detesting and condemning of so heinous a deed and crime, and his body or carcase to lack church burial, as a rotten member cut off from the church, and the same to be committed to the arm and power secular, and they compelled hereafter forever to hold their peace.

And moreover, that you cite and admonish, after the manner aforesaid, all and every of the receivers, favourers, and creditors of the said John Tooley that is dead, especially if any of them do incline and give consent to those wicked and detestable affirmations, propositions, and rehearsals aforesaid, that on this side the said Thursday they return and submit themselves unto us, and to the lap of the mother holy church: which thing if they do, we trusting upon the mercy of Almighty God, do promise that we will receive them being penitent for such their errors and faults, with thanks, benignity, mercy, and favour, to the comfort and health of their own souls; and what ye shall do in the premises, let him among you, which shall execute this our present mandate, certify us, or our vicar general in spiritual matters, either by his own person, or by his letters patent, together with these authentically sealed: Dated at London under our seal, the last day of April, 1555, and of our translation the 11th.

When the time of this citation was expired, and this Tooley being cited did not appear; next in order of law came the suspension, (whereas one suspension had been enough for him) and after that cometh the excommunication, that is, that no man should eat or drink with him; or if any met him by the way, he should not bid him good morrow, and besides that, he should be excluded from the communion of the church. These things being prepared in such a manner, as in such cases full wisely they use to do, at length one stood up that made answer to certain articles, rehearsed in judgment openly, and that in the behalf of the dead man. But when the poor dead man could neither speak for himself, nor did (as they said) sufficiently answer them by the other, to avoid the name of an heretic; first witnesses were provided against him, whose names were Henry Clark, Esq; Thomas Way, keeper of the Marshalsea; Philip Andrew, under-marshal; William Holingworth, fishmonger; William Gellard, William Walter, chandlers; Richard Longman, merchant-taylor; Philip Britten, John Burton, brewers; Thomas Smith, serjeant. Then he was condemned for an heretic, and so committed to the secular power, namely to the sheriffs of London, who with the like diligence went about to execute their charge. Therefore receiving the man, being suspended, excommunicated, condemned as an heretic, and besides that, dead, they laid him on the fire to be burned, namely, for a continual remembrance thereof: this was done the fourth day of June.

The LIFE and MARTYRDOM of THOMAS HAUKES, GENTLEMAN.

Immediately after the story of Dr. Taylor, mention was made of six men brought before bishop Bonner upon the eighth day of February, whose names were Stephen Knight, W. Pygot, Thomas Tomkins, J. Lawrence, William Hunter. In which number was also Thomas Haukes, and condemned likewise with them the 9th day of February. But because his execution did not so shortly follow their's, but was prolonged to the 10th day of June, it followeth therefore now consequently to give an account thereof; first beginning briefly with his pious conversation and institution of life, then shewing of his troubles, also of his examinations and conflicts with the bishop and other adversaries, according as the order of the story doth require.

As he was of the county of Essex, born of an honest stock, in calling and profession a courtier; besides that, he was of such comeliness of stature, so well endued with excellent qualities, that he might seem on every side a man (as it were) made for the purpose. But his gentle behaviour towards others, and especially his fervent study and singular love unto true religion and piety did surmount all the rest. Wherein as God did singularly adorn him; even so he, being such a valiant martyr of God, may seem to make famous the whole company of other holy martyrs, and as a bright star to make the church of God and his truth, of themselves bright and clear, more gloriously to shine by his example.

Mr. Haukes entered into the service of lord Oxford, where he remained so long as Edward VI. lived. But he dying, all things began to go backward, religion to decay, true piety not only to wax cold, but also to be in danger every-where. Haukes misliking the state of things, and especially in such men's houses, rather than he would change the profession of true godliness, which he had tasted, thought to change the place: and so, forsaking the nobleman's house, departed thence to his his own home, where more freely he might give himself to God, and use his own conscience.

But what place in this world shall a man find so secret for himself, whither the old wicked serpent cannot creep, whereby he may have some matter to overthrow the quietness of the godly? Now in the mean time, Haukes keeping his house at home, had born unto him a young son, whose baptism was deferred to the third week, for that he would not suffer him to be baptized after the papistical manner, which thing the adversaries not able to suffer, laying hands upon him, did bring him to the earl of Oxford, there to be reasoned with, as not sound in religion, in that he seemed to contemn the sacraments of the church.

The earl either intending not to trouble himself in such matters, or else seeing himself not able to weigh with him in such cases of religion, sent him up to London with a messenger, and letters, and so, willing to clear his own hands, put him in the hands of Bonner, bishop of London; the contents of which his letter sent to Bonner, are as follow.

MOST reverend father in God, be it known unto you, that I have sent you one Thomas Haukes, dwelling in the county of Essex, who hath a child that hath remained unchristened more than three weeks; who, being upon the same examined, hath denied to have it baptized, as it is now used in the church, whereupon I have sent him to your good lordship, to use as you think best, by your good discretion.

When the bishop had perused this letter, and afterwards read it to Mr. Haukes, he hearing the same, thought with himself that he should not be very well used, seeing he was put to his discretion. Then wrote the bishop a letter again to him that sent the prisoner, with many great thanks for his diligence in setting forth the queen's proceedings. Then the bishop began to enter communication with Mr. Haukes, first asking, what should move him to leave his child unchristened so long? To whom Mr. Haukes answered thus again as followeth.

Haukes. Because we are bound to do nothing contrary to the word of God.

Bonner. Why? baptism is commanded by the word of God.

Haukes. His institution therein I do not deny.

Bonner. What deny you then?

Haukes. I deny all things invented and devised by man.

Bonner. What things are those that be devised by man, that you are so offended withal?

Haukes. Your oil, cream, salt, spittle, candle, and conjuring of water, &c.

Bonner. Will you deny that which all the whole world and your fathers have been contented withal?

Haukes. What my father and all the whole world have done, I have nothing to do with: but what God hath commanded me to do, to that stand I.

Bonner. The catholic church hath taught it.

Haukes. What is the catholic church?

Bonner. It is the faithful congregation, wheresoever it be dispersed throughout the whole world.

Haukes. Who is the head thereof?

Bonner. Christ is the head thereof.

Haukes. Are we taught in Christ, or in the church now?

Bonner. Have you not read in the eighth of St. John where he said, He would send his Comforter which should teach you all things?

Haukes. I grant you it is so, that he would send his Comforter, but to what end? Forsooth to this end, that he should lead you into all truth and verity, and that is not to teach a new doctrine.

Bonner. Ah sir, you are a right scripture man. For you will have nothing but the scripture. There is a great number of your countrymen of your opinion. Do you know one Knight and Pygot?

Haukes. Knight I know, but Pygot I do not know.

Bonner. I thought you were acquainted with him: it seemeth of your judgment. What preachers do you know in Essex?

Haukes. I know none.

Bonner. Do you know one Baget?

Haukes. Yes, forsooth, I know him.

Bonner. What manner of man is he?

Haukes. An honest man so far as I know.

Bonner. Do you know him if you see him?

Haukes. Yes, that I do. [Then said he to one of his servants, Go call me Baget hither; and then said to me, You seem to be a very proud man and stubborn. He that brought me up, stood all this while by.]

Haukes. What should move your lordship so to say?

Bonner. Because I see in a man that came with you much humility and lowliness.

Haukes. It seemeth your lordship speaketh that to me, because I make no courtsey to you: and with that came Baget. Then the bishop said to Baget, How say you, sir, know you this man?

Baget. Yes, forsooth my lord; with that Baget and I shook hands. Then said the bishop to Baget, Sir, this man hath a child which hath lain three weeks unchristened, (as I have letters to shew) who refuseth to have it baptized, as it is now used in the church: how say you thereto?

Baget. Forsooth, my lord, I say nothing thereto (with low courtsey to the hard ground).

Bonner. Say you nothing thereto? I will make you tell me whether it be laudable, and to be frequented and used in the church or not.

Baget. I beseech your lordship to pardon me, he is old enough, let him answer for himself.

Bonner. Ah knave, are you at that point with me? Go call me the porter, said he to one of his men, thou shalt sit in the stocks, and have nothing but bread and water. I perceive I have kept you too well. Have I made thus much of you, and are you at this point? Then came the bishop's man, and said, The porter is gone to London: then said the bishop to Baget, Come with me, and he went away with him, and commanded the away, and bade one of his gentlemen to talk with me, (who was one of his own teaching) who desired amongst other things to know of me, with whom I was acquainted in Essex, and what men they were that were my teachers.

Haukes. When I see your commission, I will make you answer. And then immediately came the bishop again: but before he came, his man and I had much talk. Then the bishop sat down under a vine in his orchard, and called Baget to him, whom he carried away, and brought again, and called me also, and said to Baget, How say you now unto baptism? Say whether it be to be frequented and used in the church, as it is now, or no?

Baget. Forsooth, my lord, I say it is good.

Bonner. I befool your heart, could you not have said so before? You have wounded this man's conscience. Then the bishop turned to me, and said; How say you now, sir? this man is turned and converted.

Haukes. I build not my faith upon this man, neither upon you, but only upon Christ Jesus, who (as St. Paul saith) is the founder and author of all men's faith.

Bonner. I perceive you are a stubborn fellow. I must therefore go to work another way with you, to win you.

Haukes. Whatsoever you do, I am ready to suffer it; for I am in your hands to abide it.

Bonner. Well, you are so, come on your ways; you shall go in, and I will use you christian-like: you shall have meat and drink, such as I have in my house: but in any wise talk not.

Haukes. I purpose to talk nothing but the word of God and truth.

Bonner. I will have no heresy talked on in my house.

Haukes. Why, is the truth become heresy? God hath commanded that we should have none other talk in our houses, in our beds, at our meat, and by the way, but all truth.

Bonner. If you will have my favour, be ruled by my counsel.

Haukes. Then I trust you will grant me my request.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes.

Haukes. That your doctors and servants give me no occasion: for if they do, I will surely utter my conscience. Then he commanded his men to take in Baget, that Haukes and he might not have an opportunity to talk together. And so thus we departed, and went to dinner, and I dined at the steward's table.

After dinner, his chaplains and his men began to talk with me. But, amongst others, there was one named Darbishire, principal of Broadgates in Oxford, and the bishop's kinsman, who said to me, that I was too curious: for you will have (said he) nothing but your little pretty God's book.

Haukes. And is it not sufficient for my salvation?

Bonner. Yes, it is sufficient for our salvation, but not for our instruction.

Haukes. God send me the salvation, and you the instruction. And as we thus reasoned came the bishop, who said unto me; I gave you a commandment that you should not talk.

Haukes. And I desired of you that your doctors and servants should give me no occasion. Then we went into his orchard again, he and I and his doctors.

Bonner. Would not you be contented, provided your child should be christened after the book that was set out by king Edward?

Haukes. Yes, with a good will; it is the thing that I desire.

Bonner. I thought so: you would have the same thing. The principal is in the name of the Father, the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and in necessity it may serve.

Haukes. Christ did use it without any such necessity: and yet we lack the chiefest point.

Bonner. What is that?

Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them, &c."

Bonner. Thou speakest that because I am no preacher.

Haukes. I speak the text: I do not mean you. Then said all the doctors, and his men that were with him, He spake it of you, my lord (with a great noise that they made).

Bonner. Will you be content to tarry here, and your child shall be baptized, and you shall not know of it, so that you will agree to it?

Haukes. If I would so have done, I needed not to have come to you: for I had the same counsel given before.

Bonner. You seem to be a lusty young man; you will not give your head for the washing; you will stand in the defence of it for the honour of your country. Do you think that the queen and I cannot command it to be done in spite of your teeth?

Haukes. What the queen and you can do, I will not stand in it: but you get my consent never the sooner.

Bonner. Well, you are a stubborn young man: I perceive I must work another way with you,

Haukes. You are in the hands of God, and so am I.

Bonner. Whatsoever you think, I will not have you speak such words unto me. And so we departed until even-song time: and before even-song was begun, my lord called for me to come to him in the chapel, and said; Haukes, thou art a proper young man, and God hath done his part unto thee; I would be glad to do thee good. Thou knowest that I am thy pastor, and one that should answer for thee. If I would not teach thee well, I should answer for thy soul.

Haukes. What I have said, I will stand to, God willing: there is no way to remove it.

Bonner. Nay, nay, Haukes, thou shalt not be so wilful. Remember Christ bade two go into his vineyard; the one said he would, and went not; the other said he would not, and went.

Haukes. The last went.

Bonner. Do thou likewise, and I will talk friendly with thee; how sayest thou? It is in the sixth of St. John; "I am the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. And whosoever eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath everlasting life. My flesh is very meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. And he that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him." Do you believe this?

Haukes. Yes, I must needs believe the scriptures.

Bonner. Why, then; I trust that you be found in the blessed sacrament.

Haukes. I beseech your lordship to feel my conscience no farther then in that which I was accused in unto you.

Bonner. Well, well, let us go unto even-song.

Haukes. With that I turned my back to go out of the chapel.

Bonner. Why will you not tarry even-song?

Haukes. No, forsooth.

Bonner. And why?

Haukes. For I will not.

Bonner. And why will you not?

Haukes. Because I have no edifying thereby, for I understand no Latin.

Bonner. Why, you may pray by yourself. What books have you?

Haukes. I have the New Testament, the books of Solomon, and the Psalter.

Bonner. Then I pray you tarry here, and pray you on your Psalter.

Haukes. I will not pray in this place, nor in any such. Then said one of his chaplains, Let him go, my lord, and he shall be no partaker with us in our prayers.

Haukes. I think myself best at ease when I am farthest from you, and so the bishop went to even-song, and I came down and walked between the hall and the chapel in the court, and tarried there till even-song was done; and within an hour after even-song was done, the bishop sent for me into his chamber where he lay himself, and when I came there was he and three of his chaplains.

Bonner. You know of the talk that was between you and me, as concerning the sacrament. You would not have your conscience sought any farther, than in that you were accused of.

Haukes. I thought you would not be both mine accuser and judge.

Bonner. Well, you shall answer me to the sacrament of the altar, the sacrament of baptism, the sacrament of penance, and the sacrament of matrimony.

Haukes. There is none of these, but I dare speak my conscience in them.

Bonner. The sacrament of the altar you seem to be found in.

Haukes. In the sacrament of the altar? why, sir, I do not know it.

Bonner. Well, we will make you to know it, and believe in it too, before we have done with you.

Haukes. No, that shall ye never do.

Bonner. Yes, a faggot will make you do it.

Haukes. No, no, a fig for your faggot. What God thinketh meet to be done, that shall ye do, and more ye shall not do.

Bonner. Do you not believe that there remaineth in the blessed sacrament of the altar, after the words of consecration be spoken, no more bread, but the very body and blood of Christ? And at that word he put off his cap.

Haukes. I do believe as Christ hath taught me.

Bonner. Why? did not Christ say, "Take, eat, this is my body?"

Haukes. Christ said so: but therefore it followeth not, that the sacrament of the altar is so as you teach, neither did Christ ever teach it so to be.

Bonner. Why? the catholic church taught it so, and they were of Christ's church.

Haukes. How prove you it? The apostles never taught it so. Read the Acts, the second and the twentieth. Neither St. Peter nor St. Paul ever taught it, nor instituted it so.

Bonner. Ah sir, you will have no more than the scripture teacheth, but even as Christ hath left it bare.

Haukes. He that teacheth me any otherwise, I will not believe him.

Bonner. Why? then you must eat a lamb, if you will have but Christ's institution only.

Haukes. Nay, that is not so, for before Christ did institute the sacrament, that ceremony ceased, and then began the sacrament.

Bonner.

Bonner. Alas, you know not how it began, neither of the institution.

Haukes. Then I would be glad to learn.

Bonner. Marry, we will teach you; but you are so stubborn you will not learn.

Haukes. Except you teach me by the word of God, I never will credit you, nor believe you: and thus we concluded.

A CONVERSATION between Mr. HARPSFIELD and Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs.

UPON Monday morning very early, the bishop called for me. There was with him Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, to whom the bishop said, This is the man which I told of, who would not have his child christened, nor will have any ceremonies.

Harpsfield. Christ used ceremonies. Did he not take clay from the ground, and took spittle, and made the blind man to see?

Haukes. That I well know, but Christ did never use it in baptism. If ye will needs have it, put it to the use that Christ put it unto.

Harpsfield. Admit your child die unchristened: what a heavy case you stand in!

Haukes. I admit if it do, what then?

Harpsfield. Marry, then are you damned; and your child both.

Haukes. Judge you no farther than you may by the scriptures.

Harpsfield. Do you not know that your child is born in original sin?

Haukes. Yes, that I do.

Harpsfield. How is original sin washed away?

Haukes. By true faith and belief in Christ Jesus.

Harpsfield. How can your child, being an infant, believe?

Haukes. The deliverance of it from sin standeth in the faith of his parents.

Harpsfield. How prove you that?

Haukes. By St. Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 14. "The unbelieving man is sanctified by the believing woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified by the believing man, or else were your children unclean."

Bonner. Recant, recant: do you not know that Christ said, Except ye be baptized, ye cannot be saved?

Haukes. Doth christianity consist in outward ceremonies, or no?

Bonner. Partly it doth: what say you to that?

Haukes. I say as St. Peter saith, "Not the washing of water purgeth the filthiness of the flesh, but a good conscience consenting unto God."

Bonner. Let us make an end here. How say you to the mass?

Haukes. I say it is detestable, abominable, and unprofitable.

Bonner. What nothing profitable in it? what say you to the epistle and gospel?

Haukes. It is good if it be used as Christ left it to be used.

Bonner. How say you to the Confiteor?

Haukes. I say it is abominable and detestable, yea, and a blasphemy against God, and his son Jesus Christ, to call upon any, to trust to any, or to pray to any, save only Christ Jesus.

Harpsfield. What books have you?

Haukes. The New Testament, Solomon's books, and the Psalter.

Harpsfield. Will you read any other books?

Haukes. Yes; Latimer's books, my Lord of Canterbury's book, Bradford's sermons, and Ridley's books.

Bonner. Away, away, he will have no books but such as maintain his heretics: so they departed, for Harpsfield was booted to ride unto Oxford, and I went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day came hither an old bishop, who had a pearl in his eye, and he brought with him unto my lord a dish of apples, and a bottle of wine. For he had lost his living because he had a wife. Then the bishop called me again into the orchard, and said to the old bishop, This young man hath a child, and will not have it christened.

Haukes. I deny not baptism.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, thou canst not tell what thou wouldst have. This he spake with much anger.

Haukes. A bishop must be blameless or faultless, sober, discreet, no chider, nor given to anger.

Bonner. Thou judgest me to be angry: no by my faith I am not, and struck himself upon the breast.

Then said the old bishop, Alas good young man, you must be taught by the church, and by your elders, and do as your forefathers have done before you.

Bonner. No, no, he will have nothing but the scriptures; and God knows he doth not understand them. He will have no ceremonies in the church, no not one: what say you to holy water?

Haukes. I say to it as to the rest, and to all that be of his making that made them.

Bonner. Why, the scriptures do allow it?

Haukes. Where prove you that?

Bonner. In the book of Kings; where Elisha threw salt into the water.

Haukes. You say truth; that it is written in 2 Kings, chap. ii. the children of the prophets came to Elisha, saying, "The dwelling of the city is pleasant, but the waters be corrupted." This was the cause that Elisha threw salt into the water, and it became sweet and good: and so when our waters be corrupted, if you can by putting in of salt make them sweet, clear, and wholesome, we will the better believe your ceremonies.

Bonner. How say you to holy bread?

Haukes. Even as I said to the other. What scripture have you to defend it?

Bonner. Have you not read where Christ fed five thousand men with five loaves and three fishes?

Haukes. Will ye make that holy bread? There Christ dealt fish with his holy bread. He did not this miracle, or other, because we should do the like miracle, but because we should believe and credit his doctrine thereby.

After dinner I was called into the hall again, and the bishop desired the old bishop to take me into his chamber; for I would be glad (said he) if you could convert him. So he took me into his chamber, and sat himself down in a chair, and said to me; I would to God I could do you some good: you are a young man, and I would not wish you to go too far, but learn of your elders to bear somewhat.

Haukes. I will bear nothing that is contrary to the word of God. And I looked, that the old bishop should have made me an answer, but he was fast asleep. Then I departed out of the chamber alone.

The next day Dr. Fecknam came to me, and said, Are you he that will have no ceremonies?

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. You will not have your child christened; but in English, and you will have no ceremonies.

Haukes. Whatsoever the scripture commandeth to be done, I refuse not.

Fecknam. How say you, Christ took bread; and brake it, and said, "Take, eat, this is my body."

Haukes. I grant Christ said so.

Fecknam. Why, then, is Christ a liar?

Haukes. Is every word to be understood as Christ spake it? Christ said I am a door, a vine, I am a king, a way, &c.

Fecknam. Christ spake these words in parables.

Haukes. And why speaketh he this in parables, when he said I am a vine, a door, a king, a way, &c. more than when he said, This is my body? For after the same phrase of speech, as he saith, This is my body; so saith he, I am a door, a vine, a king, a way; he saith not I am like a door, like a vine, &c.

Then Fecknam stood up, and said, I had such a one before me the other day. Alas! those places serve nothing for your purposes. But I perceive you hang and build on them that be at Oxford.

Haukes. What mean you by that?

Fecknam. I mean Latimer, Cranmer, and Ridley.

Haukes. I know nothing else by them, but that they be both godly and learned.

Bonner. If any of those recant, what will you say to it?

U u

Haukes.

Haukes. When they recant, I will make you an answer.

Bonner. Then thou wilt say as thou dost now for all that?

Haukes. Yes indeed will I, and that trust to it by God's grace.

Bonner. I dare say, Cranmer would recant, so that he might have his living. And the bishop and Fecknam departed from me laughing, and I went again to the porter's lodge.

The next day Dr. Chedsey came to the bishop and him. They declared unto him that I had stood stubbornly in the defence against the christening of my child, and against the ceremonies of the church, and that I would not have it christened but in English.

Then said Dr. Chedsey, he denies the order of the catholic church.

Bonner. Yes, he thinketh there is no church but in England and Germany.

Haukes. And you think that there is no church, but the church of Rome.

Chedsey. What say you to the church of Rome?

Haukes. I say it is a church of a sort of vicious cardinals, priests, monks, and friars, which I will never credit nor believe.

Chedsey. What say you to the bishop of Rome?

Haukes. From him, and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us.

Bonner. He will by no means come within my chapel, nor hear mass: for neither the mass, nor the sacrament of the altar can he abide, neither will he have any service but in English.

Chedsey. Christ never spake in English.

Haukes. Neither did he ever speak any Latin, but always in such a tongue as the people might be edified thereby. And St. Paul saith, "That tongues profit us nothing." He maketh a similitude between the pipe and the harp, and except it be understood what the trumpet meaneth, who can prepare himself to the battle? So if I hear a tongue, that I do not understand, what profit have I thereby? no more than he hath by the trumpet, that knoweth not what it meaneth.

Chedsey. If you understand St. Paul's saying, he speaketh under a prophecy, "If one prophesy to you in tongues," &c.

Haukes. St. Paul maketh a distinction between prophesying and tongues, saying, "That if any man speak with tongues, let it be two or three at the most, and let another interpret it. But if there be no interpreter, let them keep silence in the congregation, and let himself pray unto God: and then let the prophets speak two or three, and that by course, and let the others judge: and if any revelation be made to him that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace:" so that it seemeth that St. Paul maketh a distinction between tongues and prophesying.

Chedsey. What gospel have you been taught?

Haukes. Praying to saints, and to our lady, and trusting in the mass, holy bread, holy water, and in idols.

Chedsey. He that teaches you so, teaches you not aright.

Haukes. Cursed be he that teacheth me so: for I will not trust him, nor believe him.

The next day Dr. Chedsey preached in the bishop's chapel, and did not begin his sermon until all the service was done: and then came the porter for me, and said, My lord would have you come to the sermon, and so I went to the chapel door, and stood without the door.

Bonner. Come in, man.

Haukes. No, that I will not. He called again, and I answered I will come no nearer, and so I stood at the door. Then said the bishop, Go to your sermon.

Then Dr. Chedsey put the stole about his neck, and carried the holy water-sprinkle unto the bishop, who blessed him and gave him holy water, and so he went to his sermon.

The text that he treated on was the 16th of St. Matthew, "Whom do men say that I the Son of Man am? Peter said, Some say that thou art Elias, some say that thou art John the Baptist, some say thou art one of the prophets. But whom say ye that I am? Then said Peter, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God." Then he left the text there, and said, Whose sins soever ye bind, are bound: which authority (said he) is left to the heads of the church, as my lord here is one, and so unto all the rest that be underneath him. But the church hath been much kicked at since the beginning: yet kick the heretics, spurn the heretics ever so much, the church doth stand and flourish. And then he went straitway to the sacrament, and said his mind on it, exalting it above heaven, (as most of them do) and so returned to his place again, saying, Whose sins do ye remit, are remitted and forgiven: and so he applied it to the bishops and priests to forgive sins, and said, All that be of the church will come and receive the same. And this he proved by St. John, chap. xi. saying that Christ came to raise Lazarus, who when he was risen was bound in bands: then said Christ to them that were in authority, (who were his disciples) Go ye and loose him, let him go. And this was the effect of his sermon, applying all to them, that they have the same authority that Christ spake of to his apostles.

Another CONVERSATION between THOMAS HAUKES, BISHOP BONNER, and others.

AFTER dinner I was called into the chapel, where were several of the queen's servants, and other strangers whom I did not know.

Bonner. Haukes, How like you the sermon?

Haukes. As I like all the rest of his doctrine.

Bonner. What, are you not edified thereby?

Haukes. No, surely.

Bonner. It was made only because of you.

Haukes. Why, then I am sorry that you had no more heretics here, as you call them: I am sorry that you have bestowed so much labour on one, and so little regarded.

Bonner. Well, I will leave you here, for I have business, I pray you talk with him, for if you could do him good, said he, I would be glad.

This the bishop spake to the queen's men, who said unto me, Alas! what mean you to trouble yourself about such matters against the queen's proceedings?

Haukes. Those matters have I answered before them that be in authority: and unless I see you have a further commission, I will answer you nothing at all. They cried, Faggots, burn him, hang him, to prison with him, it is pity he liveth, lay irons upon him; and with a great noise they spake these words. Then in the midst of all their rage I departed from them, and went to the porter's lodge again.

The next day the bishop called me into his chamber, and said, You have been with me a great while, and you are never the better, but worse and worse: and therefore I will delay the time no longer, but send you to Newgate.

Haukes. Truly I did look for none other when I came to your hands.

Bonner. Come on your ways, you shall see what I have written. Then did he shew me certain articles, and these are the contents of them:

Whether the catholic church do teach and believe, that Christ's real presence doth remain in the sacrament or no, after the words of consecration, according to the words of St. Paul, which are these; "Is not the bread which we break the partaking of the body of Christ, and the cup which we bless, the partaking of the blood of Christ?" which if it were not so, St. Paul would never have said it.

Haukes. What your church doth I cannot tell: but I am sure that the holy catholic church doth never so take it, nor believe it.

Bonner. Whether doth the catholic church teach and believe the baptism that now is used in the church, or no?

Haukes. I answered to it as I did to the other question before.

After many persuasions on his part we ended, and then departed.

The next day in the morning, which was the first of July.

July, the bishop called me himself from the porter's lodge, commanding me to make myself ready to go to prison, and to take such things with me as I had of my own. And I said, I do neither intend to bribe, neither to steal, God willing. Then he did write my warrant to the keeper of the Gate-house at Westminster, and delivered it to Harpsfield, who with his own man and one of the bishop's men brought me to prison, and delivered the warrant and me to the keeper; and this was contained in the warrant:

"I will and command you, that you receive him who cometh named in this warrant, and that he be kept as a false prisoner, and that no man speak with him, and that you deliver him to no man, except it be the council, or to a justice; for he is a sacramentary, and one that speaketh against baptism, a seditious man, a perilous man to be abroad in these perilous days." And thus was I received, and they departed. And there I remained thirteen days, and then the bishop sent two of his men unto me, saying, My lord would be glad to know how you do. I answered them, I do like a poor prisoner. They said, My lord would know, whether you be the same man that you were then when you departed. I said I am no changeling. They said, My lord would be glad that you should do well. I said, if my lord will do me any good, I pray you desire him to suffer my friends to come to me. So they said they would speak for me, but I heard no more of them.

This is the first examination of me Thomas Haukes, being examined by Edmund Bonner, then bishop of London, and by his chaplains and doctors at Fulham, four miles from London, where I lay, till I came to prison at Westminster: and after his two men had been with me, I heard no more of him till the 3d of September.

SECOND EXAMINATION of Mr. THOMAS HAUKEs.

THE bishop of Winchester, then being chancellor, preached that day at Paul's Cross, and the bishop of London said to my keeper, I think your man will not go to the sermon to-day.

Haukes. Yes, my lord, I pray you let me go; and that which is good I will receive, and the rest I will leave behind me, and so I went. And when the sermon was done, I and my keeper came to the bishop's house, and there we remained till dinner was done: and after dinner the bishop called for me, and asked me if I was the same man that I was before.

Haukes. I am no changeling, nor none will be.

Bonner. You shall find me no changeling neither. And so he returned into his chamber, and there he did write the side of a sheet of paper, and all that while I stood in the great chamber, and as many with me as might well stand in the chamber. And as I stood there, Dr. Smith came unto me, (who once recanted as it appeared in print) saying, he would be glad to talk brotherly with me. I asked him what he was? Then said they that stood by, he is Dr. Smith. Then said I, Are you he that did recant? And he said, It was no recantation, but a declaration.

Haukes. You were best to term it well for your own honesty.

Smith. Shall I term it as it pleaseth you?

Haukes. To be short with you, I will know whether you will recant any more or no, before that I talk with you, credit you, or believe you: and so I departed from him to the other side of the chamber. Then said the bishop's men and his chaplains, that my lord commanded me to talk with him. Then they that stood by, cried with a great noise, Hang him, burn him, it is a great pity that he lives.

Then said one Miles Huggard, where prove you that infants were baptized?

Haukes. "Go teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Sir, here is none excepted.

Mr. Huggard. What shall we go to teach children?

Haukes. That word doth trouble you; it might be left out full well: it is too much for you to teach. Is not your name Miles Huggard?

Mr. Huggard. So I am called.

Haukes. Be you not a hofier, and dwell in Pudding-lane?

Mr. Huggard. Yes that I am, and there I do dwell.

Haukes. It should seem so, for you have more skill in eating pudding, and selling stockings, than in disputing from the scriptures. With that he was in a great rage and chafed up and down. Then I desired that some person would take pains to appease the gentleman; he did so fret for anger. Then one that stood by me (who was parson of Horn-church and Rumford in Essex) said, Alas, what do you mean? A young man to be so stubborn? there seemeth too much pride in you.

Haukes. Are you not the parson of Horn-church?

Parson. Yes? that I am.

Haukes. Did you not set such a priest in your benefice?

Parson. Yes, for a shift.

Haukes. Like master, like man: For I know the priest to be as vile a man as can be. I asked the parson, what kin he was to the weather-cock of St. Paul's? and he fell into a great laughter with the rest of his companions. He said I did rail.

Then said another that stood by unto me; What books have you here? I answered the New Testament. May I look in it, said he? Yes; that you may, said I; and so he looked into my book, and said it was corrupt. I answered him, if the things contained in it be true, then ye are false prophets. He said that he would oppose me in the first word of the Testament, saying; Here is the generation of Christ; and Isaiah saith, no man can tell his generation.

Haukes. What meaneth Isaiah by that?

I would learn of you, said he:

Haukes. You would be angry if the scholar should teach the master: but if you will have me to teach you, I will tell you Isaiah's meaning.

Then said he, No man can tell the generation between the Father and the Son: but you (I dare say) did know it before.

Haukes. Isaiah denieth not the generation.

Then said he; Why is Christ called Christ?

Haukes. Because he is the Messiah.

Then said he; Why is he called the Messiah?

Haukes. Because he was so prophesied by the prophets.

Then said he, Why is your book called a book?

Haukes. These words do breed more strife than godly edifying.

Beware, said he, that you do not decline from the church; for if you do, you will prove yourself an heretic.

Haukes. Even as you do call us heretics, that do incline to Christ's church from your church; so are ye all false prophets that do decline from Christ's church to your own church. And by this shall all men know you to be false prophets, if ye say, This saith the church: and will not say, This saith our Lord. And so he went away as though he had a flea in his ear.

Then came another, and said unto me; he would talk with me; for he perceived (as he said) that I was angry and out of patience.

Haukes. I will see your commission, before I talk with you, or with any more. For I knew not how to be rid of them, they gathered so thick about me. And I said, I came to talk with my lord, and not with any of them.

With that came the bishop, bringing a letter in his hand, which he had written in my name, and read it unto me after this manner: I Thomas Haukes do here confess and declare before my said ordinary Edmund, bishop of London, that the mass is abominable and detestable, and full of all superstition, and also as concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ (commonly called the sacrament of the altar) that Christ is in no part thereof, but only in heaven: this I have believed, and this I do believe, &c.

Haukes. Stop there, my lord: what I have believed, what have you to do withal? But what I do believe, to that stand I, and will. Then he took his pen, and said that he would scrape it out for my pleasure, and so he did to my thinking.

W w

Then

Then he went farther with his writing, and said, I Thomas Haukes have talked with my said ordinary, and with certain good, godly, and learned men. Notwithstanding I stand still in mine opinion.

Haukes. Shall I grant you to be good, godly, and learned men, and yet grant myself to stand in a contrary opinion? No, I will not grant you to be good, godly, and learned men.

Bonner. You will grant that you have talked with us: the other I will put out for your pleasure. Then said all his doctors, if your lordship be ruled by him, he will cause you to put out all together: and then read more to me. Here unto this bill have I set my hand; and then he offered me the bill and his pen, and bade me set my hand to it.

Haukes. You shall not have my hand to any thing of your making or devising.

Bonner. Wilt thou not set to thy hand? It shall be to thy shame for the denying it.

And then he called all his doctors, and said, he would have every man's hand to it that was in the chamber? and so he had all their hands to it, and said, He that will not set his hand to it, I would he were hanged; and so said all his chaplains with a great noise.

Then the bishop thrust me on the breast with great anger; and said he would be even with me, and with all such proud knaves in Essex.

Haukes. You shall do no more than God shall give you leave.

Bonner. This jeer shall not be unpunished, trust to it.

Haukes. As for your cursing, railings, and blasphemings, I care not for them: for I know the moths and worms shall eat you, as they eat cloth or wool.

Bonner. I will be even with you at a future time.

Haukes. You may in your malice destroy a man: but when you have done, you cannot do so much as make a finger; and you be meetly even with some of us already.

Bonner. If I do thee any wrong, take the law of me.

Haukes. Solomon saith, "Go not to law with a judge; for he will judge according to his honour."

Bonner. Solomon saith, "Give not a fool an answer."

Haukes. What, do you count me a fool?

Bonner. Yes, by my troth do I, and so dost thou me too: but God forgive thee, and so do I.

Haukes. Thought is free, my lord. Then the bishop took the bill and read it again; and when he saw that he could not have my hand to it, then he would have had me to take it into my hand, and to give it him again.

Haukes. What needeth that ceremony? neither shall it come into my hand, heart, or mind. Then he wrapt it up, and put it in his bosom, and went away in great anger, and called for his horse, for the same day he rode on his visitation into Essex: and so I went to prison again with my keeper. This was the second time of my examination.

After all these private conferences, persuasions, and long debates with Mr. Haukes in the bishop's house, as hitherto hath been declared, the bishop seeing no hope to win him to his wicked ways, was determined to proceed openly against him after the ordinary course of his popish law. Whereupon Mr. Haukes was shortly after cited with the rest of his companions above-mentioned, namely, T. Tomkins, S. Knight, W. Pygot, J. Lawrence, and W. Hunter, to appear at the bishop's consistory, the eighth day of February, 1555. Upon which appearance was laid against him, in like order as to the others, first the bill of his confession, written with Bonner's own hand, to which bill it has been already mentioned this worthy man refused to subscribe.

The bishop then assigned him with the other five the next day following, which was the 9th of February, to appear before him again, to give a resolute answer what they would stick to. But still persevering in the true faith, bishop Bonner at last read the sentence of death upon him, and he was condemned the same day with the residue of his fellows, which was the 9th of February. Nevertheless his execution was prolonged, and he remained in prison till the 10th day of June. Then he was committed to the hands and charge of the lord Rich, who being sufficiently assisted with power by the worshipful of the shire, had Thomas Hawkes down into Essex, with six other fellow prisoners, whose stories hereafter follow, there to suffer martyrdom, Haukes at Coxehall, the others in several other places.

Thomas Haukes by the way used much exhortation to his friends, and whensoever opportunity served to talk with them, he would familiarly admonish them.

Mr. Haukes being led to the stake, there mildly and patiently prepared himself for the fire, having a strait chain cast about his middle, with a multitude of people on every side. Having secretly promised his friends to shew a pious disregard of pain, he would during his agonies lift up his hand above his head towards heaven; this noble martyr, when he had continued long in the fire, his speech taken away, his skin also drawn together, and his fingers consumed, mindful of his promise, suddenly reached up his hands burning on a light fire, over his head, and with great rejoicing, as it seemed, struck, or clapped them three times together: then straitway sinking down into the fire, gave up his spirit, June 10, 1555. And thus have we plainly and expressly described unto you the whole story, as well of the life, as of the death of Mr. Haukes, a most faithful witness of Christ's holy gospel.

The History of Mr. THOMAS WATS.

THOMAS WATS, of Billerica within the county of Essex, of the diocese of London, was by his occupation a linen-draper; who, before he was apprehended, had sold and made away his cloth in his shop, his things being set in order for his wife and children, and gave away much of his cloth unto the poor. For he daily expected to be taken by God's adversaries and his, as shortly came to pass; upon the 26th day of April, he was apprehended and brought before the lord Rich, and other commissioners at Chelmsford, and there being accused for not coming to the church, was upon the same examined before the lord Rich, Henry Tyrel, sir Anthony Brown, Edmund Tyrel, Thomas Mildman, John Wiseman, Roger Appleton, Richard Weston, justice Gaudy, &c.

When Thomas Wats came before the lord Rich and the justices, at the sessions at Chelmsford, lord Rich spoke to him as follows:

Wats, you be brought hither, as I understand, because of disobedience to the king and queen's laws. You will not come to the church, you will not hear mass, &c. but have your conventicles a sort of you in corners, contrary to the king's and queen's proceedings. To which Mr. Wats answered and said:

My lord, if I have offended a law, I am subject here to the law. Then Anthony Brown, justice, said unto him; Wats I pray thee tell me who hath been thy schoolmaster to teach thee this religion, or where didst thou first learn it? Forsooth, said Wats, even of you, sir, you taught it me, and none more than you. For in king Edward's days in open sessions you spake against this religion now used, no preacher more. You then said the mass was abominable, and all their trumpery besides, wishing and earnestly exhorting that none should believe therein, and that our belief should be only in Christ: and you said then whosoever should bring in any strange nation to rule here, it were treason, and not to be suffered. Then Mr. Brown said to my lord Rich, He belies me, my lord. What a knave is this! He will soon belie me behind my back, when he doth it before my face. And my lord Rich said again, I dare say he doth so.

The commissioners being weary of him, or else not willing to meddle further in these matters, sent him up to the bishop of London, with a letter, declaring the cause.

The reception he met with from the bishop and a summary of the proceedings in the consistory at St. Paul's, (the common stage of these tragedies) will appear in the succeeding Chapter.

The FIRST APPEARANCE of Mr. THOMAS WATS, in the BISHOP'S CONSISTORY.

FIRST upon Thursday, the 2d of May, Mr. Thomas Wats was brought before the bishop of London, and there being examined upon his words said before the lord Rich, and others, as contained in their letter, he did earnestly affirm the same to be true. Whereupon the bishop objected, and examined him upon these articles, to which he answered likewise as follows.

ARTICLES objected against Mr. THOMAS WATS, of BILLERICA, in the County of ESSEX, within the Diocese of LONDON, by BISHOP BONNER.

1. THAT the said Thomas Wats is of Billerica, and so of the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

2. Item, That he believeth not in the sacraments, of the holy and catholic church, as the catholic church of Rome, and all other churches, members of the same, ever hitherto hath believed, and is taught by all good and faithful people: nor hath allowed the sacraments, rites, usages, or ceremonies of the said church, but hath despised the same.

3. Item, That he believeth, and also hath taught others, that the substance of material bread and wine do remain in the sacrament of the altar after the consecration, and that the said material bread and wine are the signs and tokens of Christ's body hanged upon the cross, and of his blood there shed; and that in the said sacrament there is only a memory or remembrance of Christ's body and blood, and nothing else.

4. Item, That he believeth, and doth precisely affirm, that the very true presence of Christ's body and blood in substance, is not in the sacrament of the altar, but only in heaven, and no where else.

5. Item, That he believeth, affirmeth, and faith, the mass now used in the church of Rome, here in England, and other places, is full of idolatry, abomination, and wickedness, and that Christ did never institute it, nor ordain it, nor yet allow it as a good and laudable thing to be used in his church.

6. Item, That he believeth and affirmeth that auricular confession to be made unto the priest is not necessary but superfluous: and that it is enough for a man to believe only, and to confess himself unto God, without any priest or minister at any time, though he may have the priest to confess him unto.

7. Item, That he believeth that Luther, Wickliffe, Dr. Barnes, and all others that have held against the sacrament of the altar, and suffered death by fire or otherwise for the maintenance of the said opinion, were good men, and faithful servants and martyrs of Christ in so living and dying.

8. Item, That he hath and doth believe, that no fast, prayer, or to do alms-deeds, is a thing utterly unprofitable; for if a man shall be saved, he shall be saved without doing of them; and if he shall be damned, they shall not help him, or do him any good at all.

9. Item, That the said Wats of late coming into open court at the sessions before the lord Rich, sir Henry Tyrel, knight, Anthony Brown, esquire, and others, and being then and there examined, did openly confess, that he had refused to come to the church, and to hear there the divine service, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, according to the order of the church: because that like as the service of the church set out in the days of the late king Edward VI. was said and alledged to be abominable, heretical, schismatical, and altogether naught; so he the said Thomas Wats, then and there said openly before the said commissioners, that all that is now used and done in the church, is abominable, heretical, schismatical, and altogether naught: and that he did also then utter, before the said commissioners, other erroneous and arrogant words, to the hurt of his soul, and to the evil example of the people there present.

10. Item, That he the said Thomas, by reason of the premises, was, and is to be taken, had, reputed, and judged as an heretic, and for the same, by order of the ecclesiastical laws, is to be declared accursed; and being obstinate and incorrigible, is to be delivered to the secular power, to be punished as an heretic.

11. Item, That he, over and above all these offences and trespasses aforesaid, had also added this trespass, namely, That he had believed and deliberately said, that the church of Rome, in her rites, ceremonies, sacraments, institutions, and traditions, is the synagogue of Satan; and therefore that he had assented and agreed in opinion with one John Tooley, of late hanged at Charing-cross, who at the time of his execution desired the people to pray to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, with all his enormities; as much as to say, that his authority and doings were tyranny; and had all enormities and iniquities in them.

12. Item, That the premises and every part thereof be true; notorious, manifest, and openly spoken and talked of amongst the honest and credible persons in great multitude; and that of all and singular the same within Billerica aforesaid, and other places thereabout, being of the diocese of London, there is a common voice and fame thereof.

The ANSWER of Mr. THOMAS WATS to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first he said and confessed the same to be true in every part thereof.

To the second article he answered, that he believeth in all the sacraments according to Christ's institution, and the catholic church; but not according to the bishop of Rome's church: and further said, that he doth not believe now as he had done in times past; for in times past he believed as the church then believed, but now he doth not so believe; for the church of Rome had deceived us, and therefore he said he did not believe as the church of Rome believeth, but as Christ hath taught him; and further said, that he was so taught to believe by the preaching of Mr. Alvey, and others whose names he remembereth not, who did preach the word of God truly and sincerely.

To the third he answered, that he hath and doth believe that Christ's body is in heaven, and no where else: and further, that he never will believe that Christ's body is in the sacrament.

To the fourth he answered; confessing and firmly believing the same to be true.

To the fifth, That he did believe that the mass is abominable, and that he will not go one jot from that his belief.

To the sixth, That he neither did, nor yet doth believe, that the priest can absolve him from his sins: howbeit, he denieth not that it is good to ask counsel at the priest's mouth.

To the seventh he said, That he knew not what the opinions of the said persons named in the said article were; and in case the said persons did believe, that the body and blood of Christ were really and in very deed in the sacrament of the altar, then that they were not good men. But in case they did believe that the body and blood of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar really and truly, then he believed that they were good men.

To the eighth he said, That he had not spoken as is contained in this article; but he hath and doth believe, that fasting, prayers, and alms-deeds be works of a lively faith.

To the ninth he confessed, That he did utter and speak, as in this article is contained, and further he desired God that he might die in that faith and belief wherein he now is.

To the tenth he answered and said, That he will submit himself herein to the order of the law; and further said, that he trusteth that with God he shall be blessed, although with men he be accursed.

To the eleventh he said, he believed that the bishop of Rome is a mortal enemy to Christ and his church. And as for Tooley he said, he did never see or know him; but in case the said Tooley did wish and pray as is contained in the article, then he did likewise wish and consent with him therein.

To the twelfth he answered, That all which before he confessed to be true, is also true; and all that he hath denied to be true, he denieth again to be true, and believeth the same to be according to such things as he hath confessed.

By me THOMAS WATS.

These articles thus propounded and answered, the bishop commanded him to appear again in the same place at three o'clock in the afternoon, upon the same day; when after many persuasions to cause him to recant, he ordered him to depart, and come again on Saturday at eight o'clock in the morning. Where the bishop being absent, Dr. Nicholas Harpsfield, as then being his deputy, earnestly exhorted him to deny his opinions. But Wats being still resolute, Dr. Harpsfield ordered him to appear there again upon Friday, being the 10th day of the same month of May. Upon which day the bishop sent for him privately into his chamber, but finding all persuasion in vain he was again dismissed until Friday the 17th of May, and then commanded to appear in the consistory; when being condemned he was delivered to the sheriffs of London, and by them sent to Newgate, where he remained until the 9th of June, or (as some assert) to the 22d of May: at which time he was carried to Chelmsford, to Mr. Scot's house, which was an inn, where, as they were eating with Mr. Haukes and the rest that came down to their burning, they prayed together both before and after their meat.

Then Mr. Wats went and prayed privately by himself, and afterwards came to his wife and six children, when having exhorted them to remain steadfast in the true faith, bade them farewell, kissed them all, and was carried to the fire.

At the stake, after he had kissed it, he spake to my lord Rich these or the like words: My lord, said he, beware, beware, for you do against your own conscience herein, and without you repent, the Lord will avenge it: for you are the cause of this my death. Thus did this good martyr offer his body to the fire, in defence of the true gospel of Jesus Christ.

In the beginning of this month about Whitsuntide, vain rumour was spread about in London of the safe delivery of the queen, and the birth of the expected child. Bells were rung, bonfires and processions made, not only in the city of London, and in most other parts of the realm, but also in the town of Antwerp, guns were fired upon the river by the English ships, and the mariners rewarded with an hundred pistolets or Italian crowns by the lady regent, who was the queen of Hungary. Several preachers, particularly the parson of St. Ann within Aldersgate, after procession and Te Deum sung, took upon them to describe the prince; but soon after the people were certified, that the queen neither was then delivered, nor even after in hopes to have a child.

A proclamation was now issued for the restraining all books and writings, tending against the doctrine of the Pope and his church. The book of common service set forth by authority of parliament in the time of King Edward VI. was prohibited—in the stead of which were only allowed popish books, particularly the Lady's Matins or catholic Primmer, containing prayers to the saints and Virgin Mary.

ARTICLES to be inquired upon by the Wardens of every Company, touching seditious Books, especially concerning the Book called, A WARNING for ENGLAND.

1. Whether they have seen any of the aforesaid books.
2. Whether they have heard of any of the said books.
3. Where they were, and in what place they have seen them.

4. Whom they know to have lately come from beyond the sea, especially from Zurich, Strasburgh, Frankfort, Wesel, Embden, and Doefburgh.

5. Whom they know or vehemently suspect to be common carriers of letters, or money thither from hence.

6. That they bring to my lord mayor all such seditious books as they have, or shall have found hereafter.

In this proclamation the reader will easily discover the profound and learned censure of the Roman catholic church, what books they dislike and reject as heretical, schismatical, and pernicious. On which catholic censure of the learned fathers, we have not leisure at present to enlarge; neither is it necessary in this place to enter into a particular defence of the authors here condemned. Suffice it therefore, to take a general view of the ridiculous (not to say blasphemous) matter contained in some of the popish books; which by being contrasted with the doctrines of the opposite side, may give an opportunity of judging the better, which is most agreeable to God's holy word and truth, and of discerning between the true catholic church and the mother of abominations.

And first to begin with the primmer in English, for children, printed with a privilege according to the king and queen's majesty's letters patent, in the reign of queen Mary. Let us repeat and survey some part of the said primmer.

To Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Crnterbury.

"By the blood of Thomas, which he for thee did spend,
Make us, Christ, to climb, where Thomas did ascend."

Of St. Nicholas.

"O God, which hast glorified blessed St. Nicholas, thy holy bishop, with innumerable miracles, grant, we beseech thee, that by his merits and prayers we may be delivered from the fire of hell.

Of Mary Magdalen.

"Grant, we beseech thee, thy mercy, to let her purchase for us the bliss everlasting." &c.

Another Prayer to our Lady.

"The dolorous passion of God's sweet mother, Bring us to the bliss of Almighty God the Father," &c.

Another.

"Hail queen mother of mercy, our life, our sweetness, our hope. Unto thee do we cry and sigh, weeping and wailing. Come off therefore our patroness; cast upon us thy pitiful eyes, and after this our banishment, shew to us the blessed fruit of thy womb. O gate of glory, be for us a reconciliation unto the Father and the Son, &c. &c.

Likewise the Lady's Psalter, produced by Bonaventure, a seraphical doctor, bishop also and cardinal, canonized moreover by pope Sixtus IV. in the year 1482, for a saint in the kalendar. In the second part of his whole works, (which were printed at Argentine, anno 1495) to shew himself a devout servant to his lady, he hath taken every psalm of David's Psalter, put out the name of the Lord, and substituted the name of our Lady. This being done through the whole Psalms and every one of them, it is now called our Lady's Psalter, used to be sung and said in the praise and service of our Lady. A brief specimen whereof, for example's sake, we thought proper here to exhibit unto the reader as followeth.

The Title of the Psalter in English.

"Here beginneth the Psalter of the blessed Virgin, made by the seraphical doctor St. Bonaventure, bishop of Alban, and cardinal of the holy church of Rome.

1. "BLESSED is the man which understandeth thy name, O virgin Mary, thy grace shall comfort his soul. Thou shalt bring forth in him the most plentiful fruit of justice, being watered as it were with fountains of water. All women thou surpassest in beauty of thy body; all angels and archangels, in the excellency of thy holiness. Thy mercy and thy grace is magnified every where. Glory be to the Father, &c.

2. Why do your enemies fret and imagine vain things against us? let thy right hand defend us, O mother of God, terribly confounding and destroying them as a sword. Come unto her all ye that labour and are troubled, and she will give rest unto your souls. Come unto her in your temptations, and her loving countenance shall establish and comfort you. Bless her with all your heart, for the earth is full of her mercy. Glory be to the Father, &c.

3. Why are they so many, O lady, that trouble me? In thy fury thou shalt persecute and destroy them. Loose the bonds of our impiety, and take away the burden of our sins. Have mercy upon me, O lady, and heal my infirmity. Take away my sorrow and the anguish of my heart. Deliver me not into the hands of mine enemies, and in the day of my death comfort my soul.

soul. Bring me unto the haven of salvation, and restore my spirit unto my maker and creator. Glory be to the Father," &c.

4. "When I called to thee, thou heardst, O my lady, and out of thy high throne thou didst vouchsafe to think upon me. From the roaring of them that prepare themselves to devour me, and out of the hands of such as seek after my life, thy grace shall deliver me; because thy mercy and thy pity are great towards all them that call upon thy holy name. Blessed be thou, O lady, for ever, and thy majesty for ever and ever. Glorify her all nations of the earth." &c.

5. "Hear my words, O lady, &c. turn our mourning into gladness, and our trouble into rejoicing. Let our enemies fall before our feet, and with thy power dash their heads in pieces."

6. "O lady, suffer me not to be rebuked in God's anger, nor to be chastened in his heavy displeasure, &c. From the gate and deep pit of hell, with thy holy prayers deliver us. Let the everlasting gates be opened; that we may shew forth thy marvellous works for ever. Because the dead, nor they that be in hell, shall not praise thee, O lady, but they which obtain by thy grace life everlasting," &c. &c. &c.

This, it is presumed, is sufficient specimen of the psalms of popery.

Account of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and THOMAS OSBORNE, &c.

MENTION was made before in the story of Thomas Haukes, of six prisoners besides, which were sent down with him to Essex the same time as he went to execution. Of which six prisoners, three were sent to be burnt, the other three to recant, and to do penance: of whom it followeth next to treat. The names of the six were these, Thomas Osmond, fuller, William Bamford, alias Butler, weaver, Thomas Osborne, fuller, Nicholas Chamberlain, weaver, Thomas Brodehill, weaver, Richard Web, weaver, being all of the town of Coxhall. All which men, next after the examinations of Thomas Haukes and Thomas Wats, were sent up to bishop Bonner to be examined, by the earl of Oxford and sir Philip Paris, knight, a letter also being sent with them, and were brought before the said bishop the 17th of the said month, to be examined upon divers and sundry articles ministered and objected against them; whereunto they were compelled to answer, and put their hands to the same: the copy of which their articles and answers, being all in one form and effect, here followeth.

The COPY of the ARTICLES objected against THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN.

FIRST, That thou Thomas Osmond, fuller, wast and art of the parish of Coxhall, within the diocese of London, and thou hast not believed nor dost believe, that there is here in the earth one catholic and universal whole church, which doth hold and believe all the faith and religion of Christ, and all the necessary articles and sacraments of the same.

2. Item, That thou hast not believed nor dost believe, that thou art necessarily bounded under the pain of the damnation of thy soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic and universal church, and to the faith and religion of the same in all necessary points of the said faith and religion, without doubting or wavering in the said faith and religion, or in any part thereof.

3. Item, That thou hast not believed that the faith and religion, which both the church of Rome, Italy, Spain, England, France, Ireland, Scotland, and all other churches in Europe, being true members and parts of the said catholic and universal church, do believe and teach, is both agreeing with the faith and religion of Christ, and also is the very true faith and religion which all christian people ought to believe, observe, follow, and keep; but contrariwise, thou hast believed and dost believe, that that faith and religion which the said church of Rome, and all the other churches aforesaid, have heretofore believed, and do believe, is false, erroneous, and naught, and in no wise ought to be believed, observed, kept, and followed of any christian person.

4. Item, That albeit it be true, that in the sacrament of the altar there is in substance the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ under the forms of bread and wine; and albeit that it be so believed, taught and preached undoubtedly in the said church of Rome, and all other churches aforesaid, yet thou hast not so believed, nor dost so believe, but contrariwise, thou hast believed and dost believe firmly and stedfastly, that there is not the said sacrament of the altar, under the said forms of bread and wine, the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material and common bread and wine, with the form thereof, and that the said material and common bread and wine are only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith received only for a remembrance of Christ's body and blood, and are by faith to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any such substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

5. Item, That thou hast believed and taught, and hast openly spoke and defended, and so dost believe, think, maintain, and defend, that the very true receiving and eating of Christ's body and blood is only to take material and common bread, and to break it and distribute it among the people, remembering thereby the passion and death of Christ only.

6. Item, That thou hast likewise believed, thought, and spoken that the mass, now used in the realm of England, and other the churches aforesaid, is abominable and naught, and full of idolatry, and is of the ordinance of the pope, and not of the institution of Christ, and hath no goodness in it, saving the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel, and therefore thou hast not, nor wilt come to be present at mass, nor receive the sacrament of the altar, nor any other sacrament of the church, as they are now used in the realm of England, &c.

7. Item, That thou hast in times past believed, and yet dost now believe, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made unto the priest, but is a thing superfluous, void, and naught, only to be made to God and to none other person. And likewise thou hast condemned as superfluous, vain, and unprofitable, all the ceremonies of the church, and the service of the same, and hast said that no service in the church ought to be said but in the English tongue, and if it be otherwise, it is unlawful and naught.

8. Item, That thou being notoriously and openly suspected for an heretic, and a person culpable in the premises, wast of late called and brought before the earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, and there wast charged with the said heresies, and wouldst not come to the church to be confessed and receive the said sacrament as other christian people did, but utterly didst refuse to do the same, thou wast by the said earl of Oxford, and Mr. Philip Paris, sent up by a constable unto me bishop of London, and was by them denounced, detected, and put up to me as an heretic and misbelieving person.

9. Item, That thou hast known and believed, thou dost know and believe, or at least thou hast credibly heard, reported, spoken, and said, that all and all manner of persons, which do teach, preach, or hold any thing concerning the sacraments of the church, or any of the articles of faith, otherwise than is found already discussed and determined by our mother the holy church, or doth call into doubt or question that thing which is already decided or determined by the church, or that willingly or wittingly do utter, openly or privily, any slanderous or blasphemous words concerning the said sacraments or any of them, or that do preach, teach, or keep any sect or kind of heresy, against the wholesome doctrine of the church, and do wittingly or obstinately defend the sect or kind of heresy, are by the canons of the whole and universal catholic church, and also by the ecclesiastical laws of this church of England, by their so doing, accursed with that curse, which doth separate them from the entry into the church, from the receiving of the sacraments, and from the company of faithful people, and are (in continuing in this sad sect and heresy) to be pronounced, declared and taken for heretics, and to be delivered to the secular power, and by the laws temporal of this realm of England, and the custom of the same, to be by the said secular power put to death, and burnt for this sad sect and heresy.

10. Item,

10. Item, That thou, by reason of the premises, wast and art to be pronounced, taken, had, reputed, and judged, for a manifest and open, wilful and obstinate heretic, for a wicked and cursed person, and to be punished accordingly for the same, according to the said canon laws, usages, and customs.

The ANSWERS of THOMAS OSMOND, WILLIAM BAMFORD, and NICHOLAS CHAMBERLAIN, to the aforesaid ARTICLES.

TO the first they answered and confessed the same to be true, except that they do believe that there is here in earth one catholic and whole church, and that the same church doth hold and believe, as is contained in this article.

To the second they answer and believe the said article not to be true; for they say that they have and do believe that they are necessarily bounden, under pain of damnation of their soul, to give full faith and credence unto the said catholic church, and to the faith and religion of the same, in all necessary points of the same faith and religion, without wavering or doubting in any part thereof.

To the third they answer, That the church of Rome, and other churches mentioned in this article, be not true members and parts (as they be used in faith and religion) of the catholic church of Christ, and that the faith and religion, used in the said churches is not agreeable with the church of Christ, but is false and erroneous.

To the fourth they answer and say, That howsoever the said churches of Rome and others of Christendom have and do believe touching the sacrament of the altar, yet they do believe that in the sacrament, under the forms of bread and wine, there is not the very substance of Christ's body and blood, but that there is only the substance of material bread and wine, and that the same material bread and wine be only the signs and tokens of Christ's body and blood, and are to be received only for a remembrance of Christ's passion and death, without any substance of Christ's body and blood at all.

To the fifth article they answer, That the true receiving and eating of Christ's body, according to Christ's institution, is to take, distribute, and eat material bread, and thereby to remember the passion and death of Christ, and so receive by faith (as they believe) Christ's body and blood, and not otherwise.

To the sixth they answer, The same to be true in every part thereof, except that over and besides the Gloria in Excelsis, the epistle and gospel, which they believe to be good, they believe the Pater-noster and Creed used in the mass to be also good.

To the seventh they answer and confess, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to the priest; nevertheless they think it is necessary to go to such a priest as is able to give good counsel; and that for counsel only, and not otherwise. And as concerning the ceremonies of the church, they answer the same to be vain and unprofitable. No service in the church ought to be said but only in the English tongue.

To the eighth they answer, and believe the same to be true in every part thereof, except that they do not believe that they be heretics, or suspected of heresy.

To the ninth, Osmond and Bamford answered, That they referred themselves to the said laws mentioned in that article; but Chamberlain made no answer at all to this article.

To the tenth, the said Osmond and Bamford answered and said, That by reason of their belief before by them confessed, they are not to be reputed, taken, or adjudged for wilful and obstinate heretics, nor to be punished therefore, as is declared in that article. The other answered nothing.

These articles thus propounded and answered, they were dismissed till the afternoon. At which time they did again appear, and were sent away again until the next day, being Saturday, the 18th of May; when being condemned, they were delivered to the sheriffs, and then to the sheriff of Essex, and by him were executed, Chamberlain at Colchester, the 14th of June; Thomas Osmond at Maningtree; and William Bamford, alias Butler, at Harwich, the 15th of June.

The LIFE, ACTS, and MARTYRDOM of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD, who, together with Mr. JOHN LEAF, was burned in SMITHFIELD, in the bloody Reign of QUEEN MARY I.

The LIFE and ACTS of the Rev. Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

MR. John Bradford was born at Manchester in Lancashire; his parents brought him up in learning from his infancy, until he attained such knowledge in the Latin tongue, and skill in writing, that he was able to gain his own living in some honest condition. Then he became servant to sir John Harrington, knight, who in the great affairs of king Henry VIII. and Edward VI. which he had in hand when he was treasurer of the king's camps and buildings, at divers times, in Boulognois, had such experience of Mr. Bradford's activity in writing, his expertness in the art of auditors, as also his faithful trustiness, that not only in those affairs, but in many others of his private business, he trusted Mr. Bradford before others.

Mr. Bradford continued several years in an honest and thriving way, after the course of this world, if his mind could have so liked, or had been given to the world as many others be. But the Lord, which had electd him unto a better function, and pre-ordained him to preach the gospel of Christ, called this his chosen servant to the understanding and partaking of the same gospel. In which call he was so truly taught, that forthwith his effectual call was perceived by the fruits. For then he forsook his worldly affairs and forwardness in worldly wealth, and after a just account given to his master of all his doings, he departed from him, and with marvellous favour to further the kingdom of God by the ministry of his holy word, he gave himself wholly to the study of the holy scriptures. And the better to accomplish his design, he departed from the Temple at London, and went down to the university at Cambridge, to learn by God's law how to further the building of the Lord's temple. In Cambridge his diligence in study, his profiting in knowledge and pious conversation, so pleased all men, that within a few years after he had been there, the university gave him the degree of master of arts.

Immediately after, the master and fellows of Pembroke Hall gave him fellowship in their college with them, and that that good man, Martin Bucer, so liked him, that he held him not only most dear unto him, but also oftentimes exhorted him to bestow his talent in preaching. To which Mr. Bradford always answered, that he was unable to serve in that office through want of learning. To which Bucer was wont to reply, saying, if thou hast not fine wheat bread, yet give the poor people barley-bread, or whatsoever else the Lord hath committed unto thee. And while Mr. Bradford was thus persuaded to enter into the ministry, Dr. Ridley, that worthy bishop of London, and glorious martyr of Christ, according to the order that was then in the church of England, called him to take the degree of deacon. Which order, because it was not without some abuse, as to which Mr. Bradford would not consent, and the bishop perceiving that he was willing to enter into the ministry, was content to ordain him deacon without any abuse, even as he desired. This being done, he obtained from him a license to preach, and gave him a prebend in his cathedral church of St. Paul's.

In this preaching office Mr. Bradford diligently laboured for the space of three years.

On the 13th of August, in the first year of the reign of queen Mary, Mr. Bourne, then bishop of Bath, made a seditious sermon at Paul's Cross, in London, to set popery abroad in such sort, that it moved the people to great indignation, being almost ready to pull him out of the pulpit. Neither could the reverence of the place, nor the presence of bishop Bonner, who was then his master, nor yet the command of the mayor of London, whom the people ought to have obeyed, stay their rage: but the more they spake, the more the people were incensed. At length Mr. Bourne seeing the people in such a mood, and himself in such peril, desired Mr. Bradford, who stood in the pulpit behind him, to come forth, and to stand in his place and speak to the people. Good Mr. Bradford at his request was content, and there spake to the people of godly and quiet obedience. Whom as soon as the people heard begin to speak unto them, they were so glad that they gave a great shout. The tumult soon ceased, and in the end each man departed quietly to his house.

Thus Bourne for that time, through Bradford's means, escaped bodily death: but God hath his judgment to be shewed in the time appointed.

The same Sunday in the afternoon, Mr. Bradford preached at Bow church in Cheapside, and reprov'd the people sharply for their seditious misdemeanor. After this he abode still in London, with an innocent conscience, to try what would come of his just doing.

Within three days after, he was sent for to the Tower of London, where the queen then was, to appear before the council. There he was charged with this act of saving Bourne, which act they there called seditious, and also objected against him for preaching, and so by them he was committed first to the Tower, then to the King's Bench in Southwark, and after his condemnation he was sent to the Compter in the Poultry in London; in which two places he preached twice a day continually, unless sickness hindered him. He did not eat above one meal a day, which was but very little when he took it; and his continual study was upon his knees.

In the afternoon before he was had to Newgate, walking in the keeper's chamber, suddenly the keeper's wife came up as one half amazed, and seeming much troubled, being almost out of breath, said, Oh Mr. Bradford, I come to bring you heavy news. What is that? said he. To-morrow, said she, you must be burnt; and your chain is now a-buying, and you must soon go to Newgate. With that Mr. Bradford put off his cap, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, I thank God for it; I have looked for the same a long time, and therefore it cometh not now to me suddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord made me worthy thereof! and so thanking her for her kindness, departed up unto his chamber, where he continued in private prayer for some time.

The time they carried him to Newgate was about 11 or 12 o'clock at night, when it was thought none would be stirring abroad; and yet, contrary to their expectation, there was in Cheapside and other places (between the Compter and Newgate) a great multitude of people that came to see him, who most gently bade him farewell, praying for him with most lamentable and pitiful tears; and he again most gently bade them farewell, praying most heartily for them and their welfare.

It was nine o'clock in the morning before Mr. Bradford was brought into Smithfield; who, in going from Newgate thitherward, espied a friend of his whom he loved, standing on one side of the way, unto whom he reached his hand over the people, and plucked him to him, and delivered to him from his head his velvet night-cap, and also his handkerchief, with other things, and after a little private talk with him, they parted; when immediately came to him a brother-in-law of his, called Roger Beswick, who as soon as he had taken the said Mr. Bradford by the hand, one of the sheriffs of London, Mr. Woodrofe, came with his staff and brake the said Roger Beswick's head, that the blood run about his shoulders; which sight Mr. Bradford beholding with grief, bade his brother farewell, desiring him to recommend him to his mother and the rest of his friends, and speedily to go to some surgeon; so they parting, had little or no talk together. Then was he led forth to Smithfield, with a great company of armed men to guard him thither. Mr. Bradford now fell flat to the ground, secretly making his prayers to Almighty God; then rising again, and putting off his cloaths unto his shirt, he went to the stake, and there suffered with a young man of twenty years of age, joyfully and constantly, whose name was John Leaf.

He remained in the Tower from the month of August, 1553, to the 22d of January, 1555, upon which day he was called out to examination before Stephen, bishop of Winchester, and other commissioners, the effect of which examination and communication which passed between him and them, proceedeth in manner as followeth.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD before the LORD CHANCELLOR and others of the COUNCIL.

AFTER the lord chancellor, and the rest of the queen's council in commission with him, had ended their talk with Farrar, late bishop of St. David's, the under-marshal of the King's Bench was commanded to bring in John Bradford; who being come into the presence of the council sitting at a table, kneeled down on his knee; but the lord chancellor immediately commanded him to stand up, and so he did.

When he was risen, the lord chancellor spake thus to him in effect: That he had been a long time justly imprisoned for his seditious behaviour at Paul's-cross, the 13th of August, in the year 1553, for his false preaching and arrogancy, taking upon him to preach without authority. But now, said he, the time of mercy is come, and therefore the queen's highness, minding to offer unto you mercy, hath by us sent for you, to declare and give the same, if so be you will with us return: and if you will do as we have done, you shall find as we have found, I warrant you. This was the sum of his words, and in manner the same words which he spake.

To these words Mr. John Bradford spake (after reverent obeisance made) in this manner: My lord and lords all, I confess that I have been long imprisoned, and (with humble reverence be it spoken) unjustly, for that I did nothing seditiously, falsely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwise, but rather sought truth, peace, and all godly quietness, as an obedient and faithful subject, both in going about to serve the Bishop of Bath now, then Mr. Bourne, the preacher at the cross, and in preaching for quietness accordingly.

Lord Chancellor. I know thou hast a glorious tongue, and goodly shews thou makest; but all is lies thou speakest. And again, I have not forgot how stubborn thou wast when thou wast before us in the Tower, wherupon thou wast committed to prison concerning religion; I have not forgotten thy behaviour and talk, for which cause thou hast been kept in prison, as one that would have done more hurt than I will speak of.

Bradford. My lord, I stand as before you, so before God, and one day we shall all stand before him: the truth then will be the truth, though now ye will not so take it. Yea, my lord, I dare say, that my lord of Bath, Mr. Bourne, will witness with me, that I fought his safeguard with the peril of mine own life.

Bonner. That is not true; for I myself did see thee take upon thee too much.

Bradford. No, I took nothing upon me undesired, and that of Mr. Bourne himself, as, if he were present, I dare say he would affirm. For he desired me both to help him, to pacify the people, and also not to leave him till he was in safety. And as for my behaviour in the Tower, and talk before your honours, if I did or said any thing that did not beseech me, if your lordships would tell me wherein it was, I should and would presently make you answer.

Lord Chancellor. Well, to leave this matter: how sayest thou now? wilt thou return again, and do as we have, and thou shalt receive the queen's mercy and pardon.

Bradford. My lord, I desire mercy with God's mercy, but mercy with God's wrath, God keep me from: although (I thank God therefore) my conscience doth not accuse, that I did speak any thing why I should need to receive the queen's mercy or pardon. For all that ever I did or spake, was both agreeable to God's laws, and the laws of the realm at that present, and did tend much to quietness.

Lord Chancellor. I know well enough that we shall have glorious talk enough of thee: be sure, that as thou hast deceived the people with false and devilish doctrine, so shalt thou receive.

Bradford. I have not deceived the people, nor taught any other doctrine, than by God's grace I am, and hope shall be ready to confirm with my blood. And as for the devilishness and falseness in the doctrine, I would be sorry you could so prove it.

Durham. Why, tell me, what say you by the ministration of the communion, as now you know it is?

Bradford. My lord, here I must desire of your lordship and of all your honours a question, before I dare make you an answer to any interrogatory or question, wherein you now begin. I have been six times sworn that I shall in no case consent to the practising of any jurisdiction, or any authority on the bishop of Rome's behalf within this realm of England. Now, before God, I humbly pray your honours to tell me whether you ask me this question by his authority, or no? If you do, I dare not, nor may answer you any thing in his authority, which you shall demand of me, except I would be forsworn, which God forbid.

Secretary Bourne. Hast thou been sworn six times? what office hast thou borne?

Bradford. I was thrice sworn in Cambridge, when I was admitted master of arts, when I was admitted fellow of Pembroke-hall, and when I was there, the visitors came thither and swore the university. Again, I was sworn when I entered into the ministry, when I had a prebend given me; and when I was sworn to serve the king a little before his death.

Mr. Rochester. My lords, I never knew wherefore this man was in prison before now: but I see well that it had not been good that this man had been abroad: what the cause was that he was put in prison, I know not; but I now well know that not without a cause he was, and is to be kept in prison.

Secretary Bourne. Yea, it was reported this parliament time by the earl of Derby, that he hath done more hurt by letters, and exhorting those that have come to him in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he curseth all that teach any false doctrine (for so he calleth that which is not according to that he taught), and most heartily exhorteth them to whom he writeth to continue still in that they have received by him, and such like as he is. All which words several of the council affirmed. Whereunto the said Mr. Bourne added, saying, How say you, sir, have you not thus seditiously written and exhorted the people?

Bradford. I have not written nor spoken any thing seditiously, neither (I thank God therefore) have I admitted any seditious thought, nor trust ever shall do.

Secretary Bourne. Yea, thou hast not written letters.

Lord Chancellor. Why speakest thou not? Hast thou not written as he saith?

Bradford. What I have written, I have written.

Lord Chancellor. We shall never have done with thee; I perceive now: be short, wilt thou have mercy?

Bradford. My lords, if I may live as a quiet subject without clog of conscience, I shall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwise I behave myself, then I am in danger of the law: in the mean season I ask no more than the benefit of a subject till I be convicted of transgression. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done.

Now after a little pausing, my lord chancellor began again to declare, that the doctrine taught in king Edward's days was heresy, using for probation and demonstration thereof, no scripture nor reason, but this; that it ended with treason and rebellion, so that (said he) the very end were enough to prove that doctrine to be naught.

Bradford. Ah my lord, that you could enter into God's sanctuary, and mark the end of this present doctrine that you now so magnify.

Here my lord chancellor again offered mercy, and Bradford answered as before: Mercy with God's mercy should be welcome, but otherwise he should have none. Whereupon the lord chancellor rang a little bell to call in somebody; for there were few present besides those before named, and the bishop of Worcester. Now when one was come in, it is best, said Mr. secretary Bourne, that you give the keeper a charge of this fellow. So the under marshal was called in.

Lord Chancellor. You shall take this man to you, and keep him close without conference with any man, but by your knowledge, and suffer him not to write any letters, &c. for he is of another manner of charge to you now than he was before. And so they departed, Bradford looking as cheerfully as any man could do, declaring thereby even a desire to give his life for the confirmation of his faith and doctrine.

The SECOND EXAMINATION in St. MARY OVERY's CHURCH, before the Lord Chancellor, and other BISHOPS, January 29, 1555.

AFTER the excommunication of Mr. John Rogers, Mr. John Bradford was called in, and standing before the lord chancellor, and other bishops, the lord chancellor having made a long speech, Mr. Bradford began: My lord, and my lords all, as I now stand in your sight before you, so I humbly beseech your honours to consider, that you sit in the seat of the Lord, who (as David doth witness) is in the congregation of judges, and sitteth in the midst of them judging: and as you would have your place to be by us taken as God's place, so demonstrate yourselves to follow him in your sitting; that is, seek no guiltless blood, neither hunt by questions to bring into a snare them which are out of the same. At this present I stand before you guilty or guiltless, then proceed and give sentence accordingly: if guiltless, then give me the benefit of a subject, which hitherto I could not have.

Here the lord chancellor replied, and said, that the said Bradford began with a true sentence, That the Lord is in the midst of them that judge. But, said he, this and all thy gesture declareth but hypocrisy and vain glory. And further he endeavoured to clear himself that he sought not guiltless blood, and so began a long process how that Bradford's fact at St. Paul's Cross was presumptuous and arrogant, and declared a taking upon him to lead the people, which could not but turn to much disquietness, in that thou (speaking to Bradford) was so refractory and stout in religion at that present. For which as thou wert then committed to prison, so hitherto thou hast been kept in prison, where thou hast written letters to the great hurt of the queen's subjects, as was credibly declared by the earl of Derby in the parliament-house. And to this he added, that the said Mr.

Bradford,

Bradford did stubbornly behave himself the last time he was before them: and therefore not for any other thing now I demand of thee, said he, but of and for thy doctrine and religion.

Brad. My lord, whete you accuse me of hypocrisy and vain-glory, I must and will leave it to the Lord's declaration, who will one day open your's and my truth and hearty meanings: in the mean season, I will content myself with the testimony of my own conscience, which if it yield to hypocrisy, could not but have God to be my foe also; and so both God and man were against me. And as for my fact at St. Paul's-Cross, and behaviour before you at the Tower, I doubt not but God will reveal it to my comfort. For if ever I did any thing which God used to public benefit, I think that my deed was one, and yet for it I have been and am kept a long time in Prison. And as for letters and religion, I answer as I did the last time I was before you.

Lord Chancellor. There didst thou say stubbornly and faucily, that thou wouldst manly maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days.

Bradford. My lord, I said the last time I was before you, that I had six times taken an oath, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction on the bishop of Rome's behalf, and therefore I durst not answer to any thing that should be so demanded, lest I should be forsworn, which God forbid. Howbeit, saving my oath, I said I was more confirmed in the doctrine set forth publicly in the days of king Edward, than ever I was before I was put in prison: and so I thought I should be, and yet think still I shall be found more ready to give my life as God will, for the confirmation of the same.

Lord Chancellor. I remember well that thou madest much ado about needless matter, as though the oath against the bishop of Rome were so great a matter. So others have done before thee, but yet not in such sort as thou hast done: for thou pretendest a conscience in it, which is nothing else but mere hypocrisy.

Bradford. My conscience is known to the Lord: and whether I deal herein hypocritically or no, he knoweth. As therefore, I said then, my lord, so I say again now, That for fear lest I should be perjured, I dare not make answer to any thing you shall demand of me, if my answering should consent to the confirming or practising of any jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England.

Lord Chancellor. Why didst thou begin to tell that we are Gods, and sit in God's place, and now wilt thou not make us an answer?

Bradford. My lord, I said, you would have your place taken of us now, as God's place: and therefore I brought forth that piece of scripture, that you might the more be admonished to follow God and his ways at this present, who seeth us all, and well perceiveth whether of conscience I pretend this matter of the oath or not.

Lord Chan. No, all men may well see thy hypocrisy: for if for thine oath's sake, thou didst not answer, then wouldst thou not have spoken as thou didst, and have answered me at the first: but now men well perceive that this is but a starting-hole to hide thyself in, because thou darest not answer, and so wouldst escape, blinding the simple people's eyes, as though of conscience you did all you do.

Bradford. That which I spake at the first was not a reply or an answer to what you spake unto me: and therefore I needed not to lay for me mine oath. For I thought you would have more weighed what I did speak, than you did; but when I perceived you did not consider it, but came to ask matter, whereto by answering I should consent to the practising of jurisdiction on the bishop of Rome's behalf here in England; and so be forsworn; then of conscience and simplicity I spake as I do yet again speak that I dare not for conscience sake answer you. And therefore I seek no starting-holes, nor go about to blind the people, as God knoweth. For if you of your honours shall tell me, that you do not ask me any thing, whereby mine answering should consent to the practising of the bishop of Rome's jurisdiction, ask me wherein you will, and you shall hear that I will answer you as flatly as ever any did, that came before you. I am not afraid of death, I thank God; for I look, and have looked for nothing else at your hands a long time: but I am afraid when death come h, I should have matter to trouble my conscience by the guiltiness of perjury, and therefore do I answer as I do.

Lord Chancellor. These are gay glorious words, full of hypocrisy and vain-glory, and yet dost thou not know that I sit here as bishop of Winchester in my own diocese, and therefore may do this which I do, and more too?

Bradford. My lord, give me leave to ask you this question, that my conscience may be out of doubt in this matter. Tell me here before God, all this audience being witnesses, that you demand of me nothing whereby mine answering should consent to and confirm the practice of jurisdiction for the bishop of Rome here in England, and then your honour shall hear me give as flat and plain answers briefly, to whatsoever you shall demand of me, as ever any did.

Here the lord chancellor was greatly offended, and said that truly the bishop of Rome's authority needed no confirmation of Mr. Bradford's answering, nor any such as he was; and turned his discourse to the people, saying, that Mr. Bradford followed crafty covetous merchants, which because they would lend no money to their neighbours, when they were in need, would say that they had often sworn, that they would never lend any more money, because their debtors had so often deceived them. Even so thou, said he to Mr. Bradford, dost at this present, to cast a mist in the people's eyes, to blear them with an heresy, (which is greater and more hurtful to the common-wealth than the other is) pretend thy oath, whereby the people might make a conscience, whereas they should not. Why speakest thou not?

Bradford. My lord, as I said, I say again, I dare not answer you for fear of perjury, from which God defend me, or else I could tell you that there is a difference between oaths. Some are according to faith and charity, as the oath against the bishop of Rome; and some against faith and charity; as this, to deny by oath my help to my brother in his need.

Here my lord chancellor again was much offended, still saying that Bradford durst not answer, and further endeavoured to prove that the oath against the bishop of Rome was against charity.

But Bradford answered, that howsoever his honour took him, yet he was assured of his meaning, that no fear but the fear of perjury made him unwilling to answer: for as for death, my lord, said he, as I know there are twelve hours in the day, so with the Lord my time is appointed. And when it shall be his good time, then I shall depart hence: but in the mean season I am safe enough, though all the people had sworn my death. Into his hands have I committed it, and do, his good will be done. And saving mine oath, I will answer you in this behalf, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was not, nor is against charity.

Lord Chancellor. How prove you that?

Bradford. Forsooth, I prove it thus:

Nothing is against charity, which is with God's word, and not against it.

The oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is with God's word, and is not against it.

Ergo, The oath against the bishop of Rome's authority in England, is not against charity.

Lord Chancellor. Is it against God's word, that a man should take a king to be supreme head of the church in this realm?

Bradford. No, saving still mine oath, it is not against God's word, but with it, being taken in such sense as it may well be taken: that is, attributing to the king's power, the sovereignty in all his dominion.

Lord Chancellor. I pray you, where find you that?

Bradford. I find it in many places, but especially in the 13th chap. of the Romans, where St. Paul, exhorteth "every soul to be subject to the higher powers:" but what power? "The power verily which beareth the sword; which is not the spiritual, but the temporal power." As Chrysostom full well noteth upon the same place, which your honour knoweth better than I. He. (Chrysostom I mean) there plainly sheweth that bishops, prophets, and apostles, are obedient to the temporal magistrates.

Here the lord chancellor was angered yet more, and said, how that Mr. Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the queen for his oath: and so, said he, this man would make God's word a warrant of his disobedience; for he will answer the queen on this sort, that when she says, Now swear to the bishop of Rome, or obey his authority: No, (will he say) for I shall be forsworn, and so he makes the queen no queen.

Bradford. No, I go not about to deny all obedience to the queen's highness, but denying obedience in this part, if she should demand it. For I was sworn to king Edward, not simply, that is, not only concerning his own person, but also concerning his successors, and therefore in denying the queen's request herein, I deny not her authority, nor become disobedient.

Lord Chancellor. Yes, that thou dost; and so he began to tell a long tale, how if a man shall make an oath to pay me a hundred pounds by such a day, and the man to whom it was due would forget the debt, the debtor should say, No, you cannot do it; for I am forsworn then.

Here Mr. Bradford desired my lord chancellor not to trifle it, saying, that he wondered his honour would make solemn oaths made to God trifles in that sort; and make so great a matter concerning vows (as they call it) made to the bishop for marriage of priests.

At these words the lord chancellor was much offended, and said he did not trifle: but, says he, thou goest about to deny obedience to the queen, who now requires obedience to the bishop of Rome.

Bradford. No, my lord, I do not deny obedience to the queen, if you would discern between genus and species. Because I may not obey in this, Ergo, I may not obey in the other, is no good reason. As if a man let or sell a piece of his inheritance, yet this notwithstanding, all his inheritance is not let or sold: and so in this case, all obedience I deny not, because I deny obedience in this branch.

Lord Chancellor. I will have none of these similitudes.

Brad. I would not use them, if you went not about to persuade the people, that I meant that which I never meant: for I myself not only mean obedience, but will give example of all most humble obedience to the queen's highness, so long as she requires not disobedience against God.

Lord Chancellor. No, no, all men may see your meaning well enough. There is no man, though he be sworn to the king, that doth therefore break his oath, if he afterwards be sworn to the French king and to the emperor.

Bradford. It is true; my lord, but the cases be not alike; for here is an exception: Thou shalt not swear to the bishop of Rome at any time. If we in like manner were sworn; Thou shalt not serve the emperor, &c. you see there were some alteration and more doubt. But I beseech your honour remember what you yourself have written, answering the objections against this in your book, of true obedience: "Let God's word, and the reason thereof, bear the bell away."

Here the lord chancellor was greatly moved, and said still, how that Mr. Bradford had written seditious letters, and perverted the people thereby, and did stoutly stand, as though he would defend the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's time, against all men: and now, says he, he says he dare not answer.

Bradford. I have written no seditious letters, I have not perverted the people: but that which I have written and spoken, that will I never deny, by God's grace. And where your lordship says, that I dare not answer you; that all men may know that I am not afraid, save mine oath, ask me what you will, and I will plainly make you answer, by God's grace, although I now see my life lieth thereon. But, O Lord, into thy hands I commit it, come what will: only sanctify thy name in me, as in an instrument of thy grace, Amen. Now ask what you will, and you shall see I am not afraid, by God's grace, flatly to answer.

Lord Chancellor. Well then, how say you to the blessed sacrament? Do you not believe there Christ to be present concerning his natural body?

Bradford. My lord, I do believe that Christ is corporally present at and in the due administration of the sacrament. By this word (corporally) I mean that Christ is there present corporally unto faith.

Lord Chancellor. Unto faith! we must have many more words to make it plain.

Bradford. You shall so: but first give me leave to speak two words.

Lord Chancellor. Speak on.

Bradford. I have now been a year and almost three quarters in prison, and in all this time you have never questioned me hereabout, when I might have spoke my conscience frankly without peril; but now you have a law to hang up and put to death, if a man answer freely and not to your liking, and so now you come to demand this question. Ah, my lord, Christ used not this way to bring men to faith. No more did the prophets or apostles. Remember what Bernard writes to Eugenius the pope; "I read, that the apostles stood to be judged, but I read not, that they sat to judge. This shall be, that was," &c.

Here the lord chancellor was appalled, as it seemed, and said most gently that he used not this means. It was not my doing, said he, although some there be that think this to be the best way: for I, for my part, have been challenged for being too gentle oftentimes: which thing the bishop of London confirmed, and so did almost all the audience, that he had been too mild and too gentle.

At which words Mr. Bradford spake thus; My lord, I pray you stretch out your gentleness that I may feel it, for hitherto I have never felt it.

As soon as ever he had spoke thus; the lord chancellor, perhaps thinking that Mr. Bradford would have had mercy and pardon, said that with all his heart, not only he, but the queen's highness would stretch out mercy, if with them he would return.

Bradford. Return, my lord! God save me from that going back; I mean it not so, but I mean, that I was three quarters of a year in the Tower; you forbade me paper, pen, and ink, and never in all that time, nor since, did I feel any gentleness from you. I have rather hitherto found, as I looked for, extremity. And I thank God that I perceive now you have kept me in prison thus long, not for any matter you had, but for matter you would have; God's good will be done.

Here now were divers telling my lord it was dinner time. And so he rose up, leaving Mr. Bradford speaking, saying, in the afternoon they would speak more with him, and he was had into the vestry, and was there all that day until night, when he was carried to prison again.

In the mean time, about four o'clock in the afternoon, a gentleman, called Mr. Thomas Hufsey, of Lincolnshire, who was once an officer in the duke of Norfolk's house, came into the vestry to inquire for one Stoning; and when it was answered him by the under-marshal's officers of the King's-bench, that there was none such, he entered into the house, and made an acquaintance with Mr. John Bradford, saying, that he would commune and speak with him the next morning for old acquaintance.

The next morning about seven o'clock, this gentleman came into the chamber wherein Mr. John Bradford lay, and being with him, he began a long oration, how that of love and acquaintance he came to speak that which he would further utter. You did (said he) so wonderfully behave yourself before the lord chancellor, and other bishops yesterday, that even the greatest enemies you have, did see that they have no matter against you: and therefore I advise you, (speaking as though though it came of his own good will, without making any other man privy, or any other procuring him as he said) this day, for anon you shall be called before them again, to desire a time, and men to confer withal, so shall all men think a wonderful wisdom, gravity and piety in you; and by this means you shall escape present danger, which else is nearer than you are aware of. To this Mr. Bradford answered, I neither can nor will make such request. For then shall I give occasion to the people, and to all others to think that I doubt of the doctrine which I confess, which thing I do not, for thereof I am most assured, and therefore I will give no such offence.

As they were thus talking, the chamber door was unlocked, and Dr. Seton came in, whom when Mr. Bradford saw, he spake thus in his own mind: What, sir, goeth the matter thus? This man told me, no man knew of his coming: Lord, give me grace to remember thy lesson, "Beware of those men, &c. Cast not your pearls before dogs;" for I see these men be come to hunt for matter, that the one may bear witness to the other.

Dr. Seton, after some by-talk of Mr. Bradford's age, of his country, and such like, began a gay and long discourse of my Lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, and Mr. Ridley, and how they at Oxford were not able to answer any thing at all; and that therefore, my lord of Canterbury desired to confer with the bishop of Durham and others; all which talk tended to this end, that Mr. Bradford should make the like suit, being nothing to be compared in learning to my lord of Canterbury.

To this Mr. Bradford briefly answered as he did before to Mr. Hufsey.

With this answer neither the doctor nor the gentleman being contented, after many persuasions, Mr. Doctor said, I have heard much good talk of you, and even last night a gentleman made a report of you at the lord chancellor's table, that you were able to persuade as much as any that he knew. And (though I never heard you preach, and to my knowledge did never see you before yesterday) yet methought your modesty was such, your behaviour and talk so without malice and impatience, that I would be sorry you should do worse than myself. And I tell you further, I do perceive my lord chancellor hath a favour towards you: wherefore be not so obstinate, but desire respite and some learned man to confer withal, &c.

But Mr. Bradford kept still one answer; I cannot, nor will I so offend the people. I doubt not, but I am most certain of the doctrine I have taught.

Here Mr. Doctor waxed hot, and called Mr. Bradford arrogant, proud and vain glorious.

But Mr. Bradford answered, Beware of judging, lest you condemn yourself. But still Dr. Seton urged him, shewing him how merciful my lord chancellor was, and how charitably they entertained him.

Brad. I never saw any justice, much less love, (I speak for my part, said Mr. Bradford) in my lord chancellor. Long have I been unjustly imprisoned, and handled in the same uncharitably: and now my lord hath no just matter against me.

This talk served not the doctor's purpose: wherefore he went from matter to matter, from this point to that point. Bradford still gave him the hearing, and answered not: for he perceived that they both did come only to fish for some things which might make a shew that my lord chancellor had justly kept him in prison.

When all their discourse took no such effect as they expected, Mr. Hufsey asked Mr. Bradford, will you not admit conference, if my lord chancellor should offer it publicly?

Brad. Conference, if it had been offered before the law had been made, or if it were offered so that I might be at liberty to confer, and as sure as he with whom I should confer, then it were something: but else I see not to what other purpose conference should be offered, but to defer that which at length will come, and the lingering may give more offence than do good. Howbeit, if my lord shall make such an offer of his own motion, I will not refuse to confer with any he may appoint.

Dr. Seton hearing this, called Bradford arrogant, proud, and whatsoever it pleased him.

Then Bradford perceiving by them that he should shortly be called for, besought them both to give him leave to talk with God, and to beg wisdom and grace of him; for, said he, otherwise I am helpless: and so they with much ado departed. Then Mr. Bradford went and made his prayers to God, which the Lord of his goodness did graciously accept in his need, praised therefore be his holy name. Shortly after they were gone, Mr. Bradford was led to the aforesaid church, and there tarried uncalled for till eleven o'clock, that is, till Mr. Saunders was excommunicated.

The last EXAMINATION of Mr. BRADFORD, in the Church of St. MARY OVERIES.

AFTER the excommunication of Lawrence Saunders, John Bradford was called in, and being brought in before the lord chancellor and other bishops there sitting, the lord chancellor began to speak thus in effect: That if Bradford, being now come before them, would answer with modesty and humility, and conform himself to the catholic church with them, he yet might find mercy, because they would be loth to use extremity. Therefore he concluded with an exhortation, that Bradford would recant his doctrine.

After the lord chancellor had ended his long oration, Mr. Bradford began to speak thus: As yesterday I besought your honours to set in your sight the majesty and presence of God to follow him, who seeketh not to subvert the simple by subtle questions; so I humbly beseech every one of you to do this day: for you know well enough, that guiltless blood will cry for vengeance. And this I pray not your lordships to do, as one that taketh upon me to condemn you utterly herein, but that ye might be more admonished to do that, which none doth so much as he should do: for our nature is so much corrupt, that we are very forgetful of God. Again, as yesterday I pleaded mine oath and oaths against the bishop of Rome, that I should never consent to the practising of any jurisdiction for him, or on his behalf in the realm of England; so do I again at this day, lest I should be perjured. And last of all, as yesterday the answers I made, were by protestation and saving mine oath, so I would your honours should know that mine answers shall be this day: and this I do, that when death (which I look for at your hands) shall come, I may not be troubled with the guilt of perjury.

At which words the lord chancellor was wroth, and said, that they had given him respite to deliberate till this day, whether he would recant his errors of the blessed sacrament, which yesterday, said he, before us you uttered.

Brad. My lord, you gave me no time for any such deliberation, neither did I speak any thing of the sacrament which you do disallow. For when I had declared a presence of Christ to be there to faith, you went from that matter, to clear yourself that you were not cruel, and so went to dinner.

Lord Chan. What? I perceive we must begin all again with thee. Did I not yesterday tell thee plainly, that thou madest a conscience where none should be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was an unlawful oath?

Brad. No, indeed my lord: you said so, but you have not proved it yet, nor ever can do.

Lord Chan. O Lord God, what a fellow art thou! Thou wouldst go about to bring into the people's heads, that we, all the lords of the parliament house, the knights and burgeses, and all the whole realm be perjured. O what an heretic is this! here good people, you may see what a senseless heretic this fellow is. If I should make an oath I would never help my brother, nor lend him money in his need; were this a good answer to tell my neighbour desiring my help, that I had made an oath to the contrary? or that I could not do it?

Brad. O my lord, discern betwixt oaths that be against charity and faith, and oaths that be according ing to faith and charity, as this is against the bishop of Rome.

Here the lord chancellor made much ado, and a long time was spent about oaths, which were good, and which were evil, he captiously asking often of Bradford a direct answer concerning oaths: which Bradford would not give simply, but with a distinction. Whereat the chancellor was much offended: but Bradford still kept him at bay, that the oath against the bishop of Rome was a lawful oath, using thereto the lord chancellor's own book, of true obedience, for confirmation.

At length they came to this issue, who should be judge of the lawfulness of the oath; and Bradford said, the word of God, according to Christ's word John xii. My word shall judge; and according to the testimony of Isaiah and Micah, That God's word, coming out of Jerusalem, shall give sentence among the Gentiles. By this word, (said Bradford) my lord, I will prove the oath against the bishop of Rome's authority, to be a good, a godly, and a lawful oath. So that the lord chancellor left his hold, and as the other day he pretended a denial of the queen's authority and obedience to her highness, so did he now.

But Bradford, as the day before, proved, that obedience in this point to the queen's highness, if she should demand an oath to the bishop of Rome, being denied, was not a general denial of her authority, and of obedience to her; no more, said he, than the sale, gift, or lease of a piece of man's inheritance, proveth it a sale, gift, or lease of the whole inheritance.

And thus much ado was made about this matter: the lord chancellor talking much, and using many examples of debt, of going out of town to-morrow by oath, and yet tarrying till Friday, and such like. Which trifling talk Bradford did touch, saying, That it was a wonder his honour weighed conscience no more in this, and would be so earnest in vows of priests marriages made to bishops, and be careless for solemn oaths made to God and to princes. In short, this was the end. The lord chancellor said, the queen might dispense with it, and did so to all the whole realm. But Bradford said, that the queen's highness could do no more but remit her right; as for the oath made to God, she could never remit, forasmuch as it was made unto God.

At which words the lord chancellor chafed wonderfully, and said, that in plain sense I slandered the realm with perjury; and therefore, said he to the people, you may see how this fellow taketh upon him to have more knowledge and conscience than all the wise men of England, and yet he hath no conscience at all.

Bradford. Well, my lord, let all the standers-by see who hath conscience: I have been a year and a half in prison: now before all these people, declare wherefore I was imprisoned, or what cause you had to punish me. You said the other day in your own house, my lord of London witnessing with you, that I took upon me to speak to the people undesired. There he sitteth by you, I mean my lord of Bath, who desired me himself, for the passion of Christ, I would speak to the people. Upon whose words I coming in the pulpit, had like to have been slain with a dagger (which was hurled at him, I think) for it touched my sleeve. He then prayed me I would not leave him, and I promised him, as long as I lived, I would take hurt before him that day, and so went out of the pulpit and intreated with the people, and at length brought him myself into an house.

Besides this, in the afternoon I preached at Bow church, and there going up into the pulpit, one desired me not to reprove the people; for, said he, you will never come down alive, if you do it. And yet notwithstanding I did in that sermon reprove their fact, and called it sedition at least twenty times. For all which my doing, I have received this recompence, imprisonment for a year and a half and more, and death now, which you are plotting. Let all men be judges where conscience is.

They endeavoured to interrupt him while he was speaking these words, but Mr. Bradford still spake on, and gave no place till he had made an end. And then the lord chancellor said, that for all that fair tale, his fact at the cross was culpable.

Bradford. No, my fact was good, as you yourself did bear me witness. For when I was at first before you in the Tower, you yourself did say, that my fact was good, but my mind evil. Well, said I, then my lord, in that case you allow the fact, and condemn my mind; but how can I otherwise declare my mind to man but by saying and doing? God one day, I trust, will open it to my comfort, what my mind was, and your's is.

Here the lord chancellor was offended, and said, that he never said so. I had not so little wit, said he, as not to discern betwixt meaning and doing: and so brought forth many examples little to the purpose, to prove that men construe things by the meaning of men, and not by their doings. But when this would not serve, then came he to another matter, and said, that Bradford was put in prison at first because he would not yield, nor be conformable to the queen's religion.

Bradford. Why, my lord, your honour knoweth that you would not reason with me on religion, but said a time should afterwards be found out, when I should be talked withal. But if it were as your lordship saith, that I was put in prison for religion, in that my religion was then authorized by public laws of the realm, could conscience punish or cast me in prison therefore? Wherefore let all men be judges, in whom conscience is wanting.

Here came forth Mr. Chamberlain of Woodstock, and told my lord chancellor, that Bradford had been a serving man, and was with Mr. Harrington.

Lord Chancellor. True, and did deceive his master of seven-score pounds, and because of this, he went to be a gospeller and a preacher, good people, and yet you see how he pretendeth conscience.

Bradford. My lord, I am ready to face him, whosoever he be, that can come forth and justly vouch, that ever I deceived my master. And as you are chief justice by office in England, I desire justice upon them that so slander me, because they cannot prove it.

Here my lord chancellor and Mr. Chamberlain were smitten blank, and said they heard it. But, said my lord chancellor, we have another manner of matter than this against you: for you are an heretic.

Yea, added the bishop of London, he wrote letters to Mr. Pendleton, who knoweth his hand as well as his own; your honour did see the letters.

Bradford. This is not true, I never did write to Pendleton since I came to prison, and therefore I am not justly spoken of.

Lord. But you indited it.

Bradford. I did not, nor know not what you mean, and this I offer to prove.

Then came in another, (I believe they call him Mr. Allen, one of the clerks of the council) putting the lord chancellor in remembrance of letters written into Lancashire.

Lord Chancellor. You say true: for we have his hand to shew.

Bradford. I deny that you have my hand to shew of letters sent into Lancashire, otherwise than before you all I will stand to, and prove them to be good and lawful.

Here was all answered, and then the lord chancellor began a new matter. Sir, said he, in my house the other day you did most contemptuously despise the queen's mercy, and you would maintain the erroneous doctrine in king Edward's days against all men, and this you do most stoutly.

Bradford. Well, I am glad that all men see now you have had no matter to imprison me before that day justly. Now say I, that I did not contemptuously despise the queen's mercy, but would have had it, (though if justice might take place, I need it not) so that I might have had it with God's mercy, that is, without doing or saying any thing against God and his truth. And as for maintenance of doctrine, because I cannot tell how you will stretch this word maintenance, I will repeat again that which I spake. I said I was more confirmed in the religion set forth in king Edward's days, than ever I was: and if God so would, I trust I should declare it by giving my life for the confirmation and testification thereof. So I said then, and so I say now. As for otherwife maintain it, than pertaining to a private person by confession, I thought not, nor think not.

Lord Chancellor. Well, yesterday thou didst maintain false heresy concerning the blessed sacrament, and therefore we gave thee respite till this day to deliberate.

Bradford. My lord, as I said at the first, I spake nothing of the sacrament, but that which you allowed, and therefore reprov'd it not; nor gave me any thing to deliberate.

Lord Chancellor. Why? didst thou not deny Christ's presence in the sacrament?

Bradford. No, I never denied nor taught, but that to faith, whole Christ, body and blood, was as present as the bread and wine to the due receiver.

Lord Chancellor. Yea, but dost thou not believe that Christ's body naturally and really is there; under the forms of bread and wine?

Bradford. My lord, I believe Christ is present there to the faith of the due receiver: as for transubstantiation, I plainly and flatly tell you; I believe it not.

Here was Bradford called Diabolus, a slanderer; for we ask no question, said my lord chancellor, of transubstantiation, but of Christ's presence.

Bradford. I deny not his presence to the faith of the receiver, but deny that he is included in the bread, or that the bread was transubstantiated.

Worcester. If he be not included, how is he then present.

Bradford. Indeed though my faith can tell how, yet my tongue cannot express it; nor you otherwise than by faith hear it, or understand it.

Here was much ado, now one doctor standing up and speaking this, and others speaking that; and the lord chancellor talking much of Luther, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius: but still Bradford kept him at that point, that Christ is present to faith; and that there is no transubstantiation nor including of Christ in the bread: but all this would not serve them.

Therefore another bishop asked this question; Whether the wicked man received Christ's very body; or no? And Bradford answered plainly; No. Whereat the lord chancellor made a long oration, how that it could not be that Christ was present, except that the evil man received it. But Bradford put away all his oration in a few words, that grace was at that time offered to his lordship, although he received it not: so that, said he, the receiving maketh not the presence; as your lordship should infer; but God's grace, truth, and power, is the cause of the presence, which grace, the wicked that lack faith cannot receive.

Here the lord chancellor and other bishops made a great ado, that Bradford had found out a toy that no man else ever did, of the condition; and the lord chancellor made many words to the people thereabout.

My lord, are not these words, Take, eat, a commandment? and are not these words, This is my body, a promise? If you will challenge the promise and, do not the commandment, may you not deceive yourself?

Here the lord chancellor denied Christ to have commanded the sacrament, and the use of it.

Bradford. Why, my lord, I pray you tell the people what mood accipite manducate, is; is it not plain to children, that Christ, in so saying, commandeth?

At these words the lord chancellor fell to parsing and examining, and concluded it was no commandment, but such a phrase as this, I pray you give me drink, which, said he, is no commandment, I think.

Bradford. My lord, if it be not a commandment of Christ to take and eat the sacrament, why dare any take upon them to command and make that of necessity, which God leaveth free? as you do in making it a necessary commandment, once a year for all that be of discretion, to receive the sacrament.

Here the lord chancellor called him again Diabolus or Calumniator, and began from these words, "Let a man prove himself, and so eat of the bread, (yea bread, said Bradford) and drink of of the cup," to prove that was no commandment to receive the sacrament: for then (said he) if it were a commandment, it should bind all men, in all places, and all times.

Bradford. O my lord; discern between commandments: some be general, as the ten commandments, that they bind always in all places, and all persons: some be not so general, as this of the supper; the sacrament of baptism, of the thrice appearing before the Lord at Jerusalem, of Abraham offering of Isaac; &c.

Here the lord chancellor denied the cup to be commanded by Christ: for then; said he, we should have eleven commandments.

Bradford. Indeed I believe you think as you speak: for else you would not take the cup from the people, in that Christ saith, "Drink ye all of it." But how say you, my lords? Christ saith to you bishops especially, "Go and preach the gospel: feed Christ's flock," &c. Is this a commandment or no?

Here the lord chancellor was in a heat, and said as pleased him.

Then the bishop of Durham asked Bradford, when Christ began to be present in the sacrament? whether before the receiver received it; or no?

Mr. Bradford answered; that the question was curious and not necessary; and further said, that as the cup was the New Testament; so the bread was Christ's body to him that received it duly; but yet so that the bread is bread. For said he, in all the scripture ye shall not find this proposition, There is no bread. And so he quoted Chrysostom, to prove his assertions. Much ado was here; they calling Bradford heretic, and he desiring them to proceed in God's name, he looked for that which God appointed for them to do.

Lord Chancellor. This fellow is now in another heresy of fatal necessity; as though all things were so tied together, that of mere necessity all things must come to pass.

But Mr. Bradford desired him to take things as they are spoken, and not wrest them to a contrary sense. Your lordship, said he, doth discern betwixt God and man. Things are not by fortune to God at any time; though to man they seem so sometimes. I speak but as the apostles did; "Lord (said they) see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the prelates, are gathered together against thy Christ; to do that which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained for them to do."

Here the lord Chancellor began to read the excommunication. And in the excommunication, when he came to the name of John Bradford; lay-man. Why, (said he) art thou no priest?

Bradford. No, nor never was a priest, or beneficed, or married, or any preacher, before public authority had established religion, or preacher after public authority had altered religion, and yet I am thus handled at your hands: but God, I doubt not, will give his blessing where you curse. And so he fell down on his knees; and heartily thanked God that he had counted him worthy to suffer for his name's sake; and prayed to God to give him repentance and a good mind. After the excommunication was read, he was delivered to the sheriff of London, and so had to the Clink, and afterwards to the Compter in the Poultry, in the City of London, this being proposed by his murderers, that he should be delivered from thence to the earl of Derby, to be conveyed into Lancashire, and there to be burned in the town of Manchester, where he was born: but their purpose concerning the place was afterwards altered, for he suffered in London.

After the condemnation of Mr. Bradford, which was the last day of January, Mr. Bradford being sent to prison, remained there till the first of July, during which time he sustained divers other conferences and conflicts with sundry adversaries, who repaired to him in the prison. Of whom first bishop Bonner, coming to the Compter to degrade Dr. Taylor, the 4th day of February, began to discourse with Mr. Bradford as follows:

CONVERSATIONS between Mr. BRADFORD, and BISHOP BONNER, and others at different times.

Bonner. WELL; Mr. Bradford, you are well beloved, I pray you consider yourself, and refuse not charity when it is offered: because I perceive you are desirous to converse with some learned men, I have brought Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield to you.

Bradford.

Bradford. Indeed, my lord, this is small charity, to condemn a man as you have condemned me, who never brake your laws. In Turkey a man may have charity, but in England I could not yet find it. I was condemned for my faith as soon as I uttered it at your requests, before I had committed any thing against the laws. And as for conference, I am not afraid to talk with whom you will. But to say that I desire to confer, that do I not.

Bonner. Well, well. And so he called for Dr. Taylor, and Bradford went his way.

Upon another day in February, Mr. Willerton, chaplain to the bishop of London, came to confer with Mr. Bradford, and began to talk of the church, saying, that Bradford swerved from the church.

Bradford. No, that I do not, but you do: For the church is Christ's spouse, and Christ's obedient spouse, which your church is not, which robbeth the people of the Lord's cup, and of service in the English tongue.

Willerton. Why? It is not profitable to have the service in English, for it is written, "The lips of the priest should keep the law, and out of his mouth man must look for knowledge."

Bradford. Should not the people then have the scriptures? Wherefore serveth this saying of Christ, "Search the scriptures?"

Willerton. This was not spoke to the people, but to the scribes and learned men.

Bradford. Then the people must not have the scriptures?

Willerton. No, for it is written, "They shall be all taught of God."

Bradford. And must we learn all from the priests?

Willerton. Yea.

Bradford. Then I see you would bring the people to hang up Christ, and let Barabbas go, as the priests did then persuade the people. At which words Mr. Willerton was so offended, that he had no desire to talk any more.

Upon the 14th of February, Percival Creswell, an old acquaintance of Mr. Bradford's came to him, who after many words said: "I pray you let me intercede for you."

Bradford. You may do what you will.

Creswell. But tell me what suit I shall make for you.

Bradford. Forsooth, what you please: do it not at my request, for I desire nothing at your hands. If the queen will give me life, I will thank her. If she will banish me, I will thank her. If she will burn me, I will thank her. If she will condemn me to perpetual imprisonment, I will thank her.

Creswell. O, if ever you loved me, do one thing for me.

Bradford. What is that?

Creswell. Desire and name what learned man or men you will have to come unto you. My lord of York, my lord of Lincoln, my lord of Bath, and others will gladly come unto you.

Bradford. No, never will I desire them, or any other, to come to confer with me; for I am as certain of my doctrine as I am of any thing. But for your pleasure, and also that all men may know that I am not ashamed to have my faith sifted and tried, bring whom ye will, and I will talk with them. So they went their way.

Upon the 25th of February, Percival Creswell came with Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and a servant waiting upon him. After formal salutations, he made a long oration. That all men, even the Infidels, Jews, Turks, Anabaptists, and Libertines, desire happiness as well as the Christians, and that every one thinketh they shall attain to it by their religion. To which Mr. Bradford answered briefly, that he spake not far amiss.

Then said Harpsfield, But the way thither is not alike: for the Infidels by Jupiter, Juno, &c. the Turk by his Alcoran, the Jew by his Talmud, do believe to come to heaven. For so may I speak of such as believe the immortality of the soul.

Bradford. You speak truly.

Harpsfield. Well, then, here is the matter, to know the way to this heaven.

Bradford. We are not to invent ways. There is but one way, and that is Jesus Christ, as he himself doth witness: "I am the way."

Harpsfield. What you say is true, and also false. I suppose what you mean by Christ, is believing in Christ.

Bradford. I have learned to discern betwixt faith and Christ. Albeit, I confess, that whoso believeth in Christ, the same shall be saved.

Harpsfield. No, not all that believe in Christ: for some shall say, "Lord, Lord, have we not cast out devils?" &c. but Christ will answer in the day of judgment to these, "Depart from me, I know you not."

Bradford. You must make a difference betwixt believing, and saying I believe.

Harpsfield. Well, this is not very material. There is but one way, Christ. How came we to know him? Where shall we seek to find him?

Bradford. Forsooth, we must seek him by his word, and in his word, and after his word.

Harpsfield. Very good: but tell me how first we came into the company of them that could tell us this, but by baptism.

Bradford. Baptism is the sacrament, by which outwardly we are ingrafted into Christ: I say outwardly, because I dare not exclude from Christ all that die without baptism.

Harpsfield. Well, we agree, that by baptism then we are brought, and begotten to Christ. For Christ is our Father, and the church his spouse is our mother. Now then tell me whether this church of Christ hath not been always?

Bradford. Yes, since the creation of man, and shall be for ever.

Harpsfield. Very good. But tell me whether this church is a visible church, or no?

Bradford. It is no otherwise visible, than Christ was here on earth; that is, by no exterior pomp or shew that setteth her forth commonly, and therefore to see her we must put on such eyes, as good men put on to see and know Christ when he walked here on earth: for as Eve was of the same substance that Adam was of, so was the church of the same substance that Christ was of.

Harpsfield. Well, this church is a multitude. Hath it not the preaching of the gospel, and the administration of the sacraments? And yet more, hath it not the power of jurisdiction?

Bradford. What jurisdiction is exercised in persecution and affliction?

Harpsfield. I mean by jurisdiction, admonishing one another, and so forth. It hath also succession of bishops. And here he endeavoured to prove this an essential point.

Bradford. You say as you would have it; for if this part fail you, all the church you go about to set up will fall down. You shall not find in all the scripture, this your essential part of succession of bishops. In Christ's church Antichrist will sit. And Peter tells us, as it went in the old church before Christ's coming, so it will be in the new church since Christ's coming: that as there were false prophets, so shall there be false teachers.

This conversation continued for some time, and was renewed Feb. 26, when the archdeacon, not being able to dissuade Bradford from his faith, lamented that he was so secure and careless.

Bradford. I am more carnally secure, and careless, than I should be: God make me more vigilant. But in this case, I cannot be so secure, for I am most assured I am in the truth.

Harpsfield. That you are not; for you are out of the catholic church.

Bradford. No, though you have excommunicated me out of your church, yet I am in the catholic church of Christ, and am, and by God's grace shall be a child, and an obedient child of it for ever. I hope Christ will have no less care for me, than he had for the blind man excommunicated out of the synagogue; and further, I am sure that the necessary articles of the faith, I mean the twelve articles of the creed, I confess and believe with that which you call the holy church, so that even your church hath taken too much upon her to excommunicate me for that, which by the testimony of my lord of Durham, in the book of the sacrament lately put forth, was free many hundred years after Christ, to believe or not believe.

Harpsfield. What is that?

Brad. Transubstantiation.

Harpsfield. Why, you are not condemned only for that.

Brad. For that, and because I deny that wicked men do receive Christ's body.

Harpsfield. You agree not with us in the presence, nor in any thing else.

Brad. How you believe you know: for my part, I confess a presence of whole Christ, God and man, to the faith of the receiver.

Harpsfield. Nay, you must believe a real presence in the sacrament.

Brad. In the sacrament? Nay, I will not shut him in, nor tie it to him otherwise than faith seeth and perceiveth, And with this and such like talk they departed.

On the 23d of the month, the archbishop of York, and the bishop of Chichester came to the Compter to speak with Mr. Bradford. When he was come before them, they both, and especially the bishop of York, used him very gently: they desired him to sit down, and because he would not, they also would not sit. So they all stood, and whether he would or not, they would needs have him put on, not only his night-cap, but his upper-cap also, saying unto him, That obedience was better than sacrifice.

While they were thus standing together, my lord of York began to tell Mr. Bradford that they came to him out of pure love and charity, without being sent; and himself also, for the acquaintance he had with Mr. Bradford, more than the bishop of Chichester had; and after commending Mr. Bradford's godly life, he concluded with this question, How he was certain of salvation and of his religion?

After thanks for their good will, Mr. Bradford answered, By the word of God, even by the scriptures, I am certain of salvation and religion.

York. Very well said: but how do you know the word of God and the scriptures, but by the church?

Brad. Indeed my lord, the church was and is a means to bring a man to know the scriptures and the word of God, as the woman of Samaria was the means by which the Samaritans knew Christ: but when they had heard him speak, they said, Now we know that he is Christ, not because of thy words, but because we ourselves have heard: so after we come to the hearing and reading of the scriptures shewed unto us, and discerned by the church, we do believe them, and know them as Christ's sheep, not because the church saith they are the scriptures, but because they be so, being assured thereof by the same spirit which wrote and spake them.

York. You know in the apostles time at first the word was not written.

Brad. True, if you mean it for some books of the New Testament; but else for the Old Testament St. Peter tells us, "We have a more sure word of prophecy;" not that it is simply so, but in respect of the Apostles, which being alive and subject to infirmity, attributed to the written word more weight, as wherewith no fault can be found, whereas for the infirmity of their persons men perchance might have found some fault at their preaching; although in very deed no less obedience and faith ought to have been given to the one, than to the other; for all proceedeth from one spirit of truth.

York. That place of St. Peter is not so to be understood of the word written.

Brad. Yes, sir, that it is, and of none other.

Chichester. Yes, indeed, Mr. Bradford doth tell you truly in that point.

York. Well, you know that Irenæus and others do magnify much, and alledge the church against the heretics, and not the scripture.

Brad. True, for they had to do with such heretics as did deny the scriptures, and yet did magnify the apostles, so they were enforced to use the authority of those churches wherein the apostles had taught, and had still retained the same doctrine.

Chichester. You speak the very truth; for the heretics did refuse all scriptures, except it were a piece of St. Luke's gospel.

Brad. Then the alledging of the church cannot be principally used against me, which am so far from denying of the scriptures, that I appeal to them utterly, as to the only judge.

York. A pretty matter, that you will take upon you to judge the church! I pray you, where hath your church been hitherto? For the church of Christ is catholic and visible hitherto.

Brad. My lord, I do not judge the church when I discern it from the congregation, and those which be not the church; and I never denied the church to be catholic and visible, although at some times it is more visible than at others.

Chichester. I pray you tell me where the church which allowed your doctrine, was these 400 years.

Brad. I will tell you my lord, or rather you shall tell yourself, if you will tell this one thing, Where the church was in Elijah's time, when Elijah said he was left alone?

Chichester. That is no answer.

Brad. I am sorry that you say so: but this I will tell your lordship, that if you had the same eyes wherewith a man might have espied the church then, you would not say it were no answer. The fault why the church is not seen by you, is not because the church is not visible, but because your eyes are not clear enough to see it.

Chichester. You are much deceived in making this comparison betwixt the church then and now.

York. Very well spoken, my lord; for Christ said, "I will build my church," and not I do, or have built it; but I will build it.

Brad. My lords, St. Peter teacheth me to make this comparison, saying, "As in the people there were false prophets, which were most in estimation before Christ's coming, so shall there be false teachers amongst the people after Christ's coming, and very many shall follow them." And as for your future tense, I hope your grace will not thereby conclude Christ's church not to have been before, but rather that there is no building in the church but Christ's work only: for Paul and Apollos be but waterers.

Chichester. In good faith I am sorry to see you so light in judging the church.

Brad. My lords, I speak simply what I think, and desire reason to answer my objections. Your affections and sorrows cannot be my rules. If you consider the order and case of my condemnation, I cannot think but that it shall something move your honours. You know it well enough, no matter was laid against me, but was gathered upon mine own confession. Because I denied transubstantiation, and the wicked to receive Christ's body in the sacrament, therefore I was condemned and excommunicated, but not by the church, although the pillars of the church (as they be accounted) did it.

Chichester. No: I heard say the cause of your imprisonment was, for that you exhorted the people to take the sword in one hand and the mattock in the other.

York. Yea, and you behaved yourself before the council so stoutly at first, that you would defend the religion then; and therefore worthily were you imprisoned.

Brad. Your grace heard me answer my lord chancellor to that point. But suppose I had been so stout as they and your grace make it, were not the laws of the realm then on my side? Wherefore unjustly then was I imprisoned: only that which my lord chancellor propounded, was my confession of Christ's truth against transubstantiation, and of that which the wicked do receive, as I said.

York. You deny the presence.

Brad. I do not, to the faith of the worthy receivers.

York. Why? what is that to say other, than that Christ lieth not on the altar?

Brad. My lord, I believe no such presence.

Chichester. It seemeth that you have not read Chrysostom: for he proveth it.

Brad. Hitherto I have been kept well enough without books: howbeit this I do remember of Chrysostom, that he saith that Christ lieth upon the altar, as the seraphims with their tongues touch our lips with the coals of the altar in heaven, which is an hyperbolical speech, of which you know Chrysostom is full.

York. It is evident that you are too far gone; but let us come then to the church, out of which you are excommunicated.

Brad. I am not excommunicated out of Christ's church, my lord, although they which seem to be in the church, and of the church, have excommunicated me, as the poor blind man was, John ix. I am sure Christ receiveth me.

Here, after much talk of excommunication, at length Mr. Bradford said: Affuredly, as I think you did well to depart from the Romish church, so I think you have done wickedly to couple yourselves to it again; for you can never prove that, which you call the mother church, to be Christ's church.

Chichester. Ah, Mr. Bradford, you were but a child when this matter began. I was a young man, and then coming from the university, I went with the world; but it was always against my conscience.

Brad. I was but a child then, howbeit as I told you, I think you have done evil. For you are come and have brought others to that wicked man which sitteth in the temple of God, that is in the church: for it cannot be understood of Mahomet, or any out of the church, but of such as bear rule in the church.

York. See how you build your faith upon such places of scriptures as are most obscure, to deceive yourself, as though in the church, where you are not.

Brad. Well, my lord, though I might by fruits judge of you and others, yet will I not utterly exclude you out of the church. And if I were in your case, I would not condemn him utterly that is of my faith in the sacrament, knowing as you know, that at least 800 years after Christ, as my lord of Durham writeth, it was free to believe or not believe transubstantiation.

Chichester. He is an heretic, and so none of the church, that doth hold any doctrine against the definition of the church, as a man to hold against transubstantiation. Cyprian was no heretic, though he believed re-baptizing of them who were baptized by heretics, because he held it before the church had defined it, whereas if he had held it after, then had he been an heretic.

Brad. Oh my lord, will you condemn to the devil any man that believeth truly the twelve articles of the faith, (wherein I take the unity of Christ's church to consist) although in some points he believe not the definition of that which you call the church? I doubt not but that he which holdeth firmly the articles of our belief, though in other things he dissent from your definitions, yet he shall be saved.

York & Chichester. Yea, this is your divinity.

Brad. No, it is St. Paul's, who saith, that if they hold the foundation, Christ, though they build upon him straw and stubble, yet they shall be saved.

York. You delight to lean to hard and dark places of the scriptures.

Chichester. I will shew you that Luther did excommunicate Zuinglius for this matter, and so he read a place of Luther making for his purpose.

Brad. My lord, what Luther writeth, as you mind it not, no more do I in this case. My faith is not built on Luther, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, in this point.

York. Well, you are out of the communion of the church.

Brad. I am not, for it consisteth and is in faith.

York. Lo, how you make your church invisible; for you would have the communion of it consist in faith.

Brad. For to have communion with the church needeth no visibleness of it; for communion consisteth, as I said, in faith, and not in exterior ceremonies, as appeareth both by St. Paul, who would have one faith, and by Irenæus to Victor, for the observation of Easter, saying, that disagreeing about fasting should not break the agreement of faith.

Chichester. The same place hath often even wounded my conscience, because we separated ourselves from the see of Rome.

Bradford. Well, God forgive you, for you have done evil in bringing England thither again.

York. You think that none is of the church, but such as suffer persecution.

Bradford. What I think, God knoweth: I pray your grace to judge me by my words, and mark what St. Paul saith; "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution."

York. Well Mr. Bradford, we lose our labour; for you seek to put away all things which are told you for your good: your church no man can know.

Bradford. Yes, that you well may.

York. I pray you whereby?

Bradford. Chrysostom saith, only by the scriptures.

York. Chrysostom is an imperfect work. The church is best known by succession of bishops.

Bradford. No, my lord, Lyra upon Matthew writeth, that "The church consisteth not in men by reason either of secular or temporal power, but in men endued with true knowledge, and confession of faith, and of verity."

Then came one of the servants, and told them, that lord Durham tarried for them at the archbishop of York's house; upon which they put up their written books of common places, and said that they lamented his case; they desired him to read over a book which did Mr. Crome good; and wishing him good in words, went their way, and Bradford to his prison.

Within two days following came into the Compter two Spanish friars to talk with Mr Bradford, sent (as they said) by the earl of Derby; of whom one was the king's confessor, the other was Alphonsus, who had before written a popish book against heresies.

Alphonsus. What is the matter whereof you were condemned? we know not.

Bradford. Sir, I have been in prison almost two years: I never transgressed any of their laws for which I might justly be imprisoned, and now I am condemned, because I frankly confessed my faith concerning the sacrament, when I was demanded in these two points; one, that there is no transubstantiation; the other, that the wicked do not receive Christ's body.

Alphonsus. Do you not believe that Christ is present really and corporally in the form of bread?

Bradford. No, I do believe that Christ is present to the faith of the worthy receiver, as there is present bread and wine to the senses and outward man: as for any such presence of including and placing Christ, I believe not, nor dare I believe.

Alphonsus. I am sure you believe Christ's natural body is circumscribable.

And here he made much ado of the two natures of Christ, how that the one is every-where, and the other is in his proper place, demanding such questions as no wise man would have spent any time about.

At last the disputation became so high that the friar fell into a violent rage, and finally declared, that Bradford could not find in scripture that baptism and the Lord's supper bare any similitude together. And here he triumphed before the conquest, saying, that these men would have nothing but scripture, and yet are able to prove nothing by the scripture.

Bradford. Be patient, and you shall see that by the scripture I will find baptism and the Lord's supper coupled together. St. Paul saith, "That as we are baptized into one body, so we were Potati in uno spiritu, i. e. we have drank of one spirit," meaning the cup in the Lord's supper.

Alphonsus. St. Paul hath no such words.

Bradford. Give me a Testament, and I will shew you.

So a priest that sat by them gave him his Testament, and he shewed them the plain text. Then they looked one upon another. In fine, the friar made this simple shift, that St. Paul spake not of the sacrament.

Bradford. Well, the text is plain enough, and there are many many of the fathers which do so understand the place: for Chrysostom doth expound it so.

Alphonfus, which had the Testament in his hand, desirous to suppress this foil, turned the leaves of the book from leaf to leaf, till he came to the place, 1 Cor. xi. and there he read how that he was guilty, which made no difference of the Lord's body.

Bradford. Yea, but therewith he saith, "He that eateth of the bread:" calling it bread still: and that after consecration (as you call it) as in the tenth of the Corinthians he saith, "The bread which we break," &c.

Alphonfus. Oh how ignorant are you who know not that things after their conversion do retain the same names which they had before, as Moses's rod: and calling for a bible, after he had found the place he began to triumph. But Bradford cooled him quickly, saying,

Sir, there is mention made of the conversion, as well as that the same appeared to the sense. But here you cannot find it so. Find me one word how the bread is converted, and I will then say, you bring some matter that maketh for you.

At these words Alphonfus was troubled, and at length he said, That Bradford hanged on his own sense.

Bradford. No, that do I not: for I will bring you the fathers of the church 800 years after Christ, to confirm what I speak.

Alphonfus. This church hath defined the contrary, and that I will prove by all the good fathers from Christ's ascension, even for 800 years at least continually.

Bradford. What will you so prove; Transubstantiation?

Alphonfus. Yea, that the bread is turned into Christ's body.

Bradford. You speak more than you can do.

Alphonfus. That do I not.

Bradford. Then will I give place.

Alphonfus. Will you believe?

Bradford. Belief is God's gift; therefore I cannot promise: but I tell you I will give place: and I hope I shall believe his truth always, so good is he to me in Christ my Saviour.

Here the friar found great fault with Mr. Bradford's answer. But this he let pass, and repeated his question, if he could prove it as he said, whether he would give place?

Bradford. Yes, that I will. Then called he for paper, pen, and ink, to write; and then said I, Suppose that I prove by the testimony of the fathers, that continually for 800 years after Christ at least, they did believe that the substance of bread doth remain in the sacrament, what will you do?

Alphonfus. I will give place.

Bradford. Then write you here that you will give place if I so prove, and I will write that I will give place if you so prove; because you are the elder you shall have the pre-eminency.

The king's confessor asked Bradford what the second question was?

Bradford. That wicked men receive not Christ's body in the sacrament, as St. Augustine speaketh of Judas, that he received the bread of the Lord, but not bread the Lord.

Alphonfus. St. Augustin saith not so.

Bradford. Yes, that he does. So they arose and talked no more of the matter. Thus went they away.

After they were gone, one of the priests came, and desired Bradford not to be so obstinate.

Bradford. Sir, be not you so wavering; in all the scriptures you cannot find these words, There is not bread.

Priest. Yes, that I can, in five places.

Bradford. Then I will eat your book. So the book was opened, but no place found: and he went his way smiling, God help us!

On the 21st of March, Mr. Bradford being called down, as soon as he entered into the hall, Dr. Weston very gently took him by the hand, and asked how he did, with such other talk. At length he desired them to go out of the chamber: so they all went out save Dr. Weston himself, Mr. Collier, the earl of Derby's servant, the sub-dean of Westminster, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and the parson of the church near the Compter.

Now when he began with Mr. Bradford, to tell how that he had often intended to have come unto him, being desired by the earl of Derby: and (said he) after I perceived by this man, that you could be contented rather to speak with me, than any other, I could not but come to do you all the good I can; for you may be sure I will never hurt you.

Sir, replied Mr. Bradford, when I perceived by the report of my lord's servant, that you did bear me good will, more (as he said) than any other of your sort, I told him then, that I could be better content and more willing to talk with you, if you should come unto me. This did I say: otherwise I desired not your coming.

Weston. Well, Mr. Bradford, now I am come to talk with you: but before we enter into any talk, certain principles we must agree upon, which shall be this day's work.

First, said he, I shall desire you to put away all vain glory, and not hold any thing for the praise of the world.

Bradford. Sir, St. Augustine maketh that indeed a piece of the definition of an heretic; which if I cannot put away clean, (for I think there will be a spice of it remain in us, as long as this flesh liveth) yet I promise you by the grace of God, that I purpose not to yield to it. God I hope will never suffer it to bear rule in them that strive against it, and desire all the dregs of it utterly to be driven out of us.

Weston. I am glad to hear you say so, although indeed I think you do not so much esteem it as others do.

Secondly. I would desire you that you will put away singularity in your judgment and opinions.

Bradford. Sir, God forbid that I should stick to my singularity or private judgment in God's religion. Hitherto I have not desired it, neither do, nor mind at any time to hold any other doctrine than is public and catholic, (understand catholic as good men do) according to God's word.

Weston. Very well, this is a good day's work, I hope to do you good: and therefore now thirdly, I shall pray you to write me the heads of those things whereupon you stand in the sacrament, and to send them to me betwixt this and Wednesday next: until which time, yea, until I come to you again, be assured that you are without all peril of death. Of my fidelity, I warrant you, therefore away with all doubts, &c.

Bradford. Sir, I will write you the grounds I lean to in this matter. As for death, if it come, welcome be it; this which you require of me shall be no great hindrance to me therein.

Weston. You know that St. Augustine was a Manichean, yet he was converted at length; so that I have good hope of you.

Bradford. Sir, because I will not flatter you, I would you should flatly know, that I am even settled in that religion for which I am condemned.

Weston. Yea, but if it be not the truth, and you see evident matter to the contrary, will you not then give place?

Bradford. God forbid, but that I should always give place to the truth.

Weston. I would have you so to pray.

Bradford. So I do, and that he will more and more confirm me in it, as he hath done and doth.

Weston. Yea, but pray with a condition if you be in it.

Bradford. No, Sir, I cannot pray so, because I am settled and assured of his truth.

Well, said Weston, as the learned bishop answered St. Augustine's mother, that though he was obstinate, yet the tears of such a mother could not but win her son: so also I hope your prayers (for then Bradford's eyes did shew that he had wept in prayer) cannot but be heard by God, though not as you would, yet as best shall please him. Do you not remember the history thereof?

Bradford. Yea, sir, I think it is of St. Ambrose.

Weston. No, that it is not. And here Weston would have laid a wager, and began to triumph, saying to Bradford, As you are overseen herein, so are you in other things.

Bradford. Well, sir, I will not contend with you for the name. This St. Augustine writeth in his confessions.

After this talk Dr. Weston began to tell Mr. Bradford, that the people were persuaded by him to withstand the queen.

The end was this, that Bradford should fend unto him the heads of the doctrine of the supper, and after Wednesday he would come unto him again; and thus he departed, after he had drunk to him in beer and wine.

In the mean time, when Mr. Bradford had written his reasons and arguments, and had sent them to Dr. Weston, soon after, about the 28th of March, there came to the Compter Dr. Pendleton, and with him the aforesaid Mr. Collier, sometime warden of Manchester, and Stephen Bech. After salutations, Dr. Pendleton began to speak to Mr. Bradford, that he was sorry for his trouble. And further, said he, after that I knew you could be content to talk with me, I made the more speed, being as ready to do you good, and serve you what I can, as you would wish.

Bradford. Sir, I remember that once you were (as far as any man might judge) of the religion that I am of at present, and I remember that you have earnestly set forth the same. Gladly therefore would I learn of you what thing it was that moved your conscience to alter, and gladly would I see what thing it is that you have seen since which you saw not before.

Pendleton. I do not know for what you are condemned.

Bradford. Transubstantiation is the cause for which I am condemned, and because I deny that wicked men do receive Christ's body: wherein I would desire you to shew me what reasons which before you knew not, did move your conscience now to alter. For once, (as I said) you were as I am in religion.

Here Mr. Pendleton, half amazed, began to excuse himself, as though he had not fully denied transubstantiation indeed, although I said, says he, that the word was not in scripture: and so he made an endless tale of the thing that moved him to alter: but (said he) I will gather you the places which moved me, and send you them. And here he desired Mr. Bradford that he might have a copy of that which he had sent to Dr. Weston: which Mr. Bradford promised him.

Dr. Weston came to Mr. Bradford the same day, and he desired every man present to depart. And after he had thanked Mr. Bradford for his writing to him, he pulled out of his bosom the writing which Mr. Bradford had sent him. The writing is as follows:

CERTAIN REASONS against TRANSUBSTANTIATION, collected by MR. JOHN BRADFORD, and given to DR. WESTON, and Others.

THAT which is former (saith Tertullian) is true; that which is latter false. But the doctrine of transubstantiation is a late doctrine; for it was not defined generally before the council of Lateran, about 1215 years after Christ's coming, under pope Innocent, the third of that name. For before that time it was free for all men to believe, or not believe it, as the bishop of Durham doth witness in his book of the presence of Christ in his supper, lately published. Therefore, the doctrine of transubstantiation is false.

2. That the words of Christ's supper be figurative, the circumstances of the scriptures, the analogy or proportion of the sacraments, and the opinions of all the holy fathers, which were, and wrote for the space of 1000 years after Christ's ascension, do teach; whereupon it follows, that there was no transubstantiation.

3. That the Lord gave to his disciples bread, and called it his body, the scriptures do witness. For he gave that and called it his body, which he took in his hand, whereon he gave thanks, which also he brake, and gave to his disciples, that is to say, bread, as the fathers Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Cyprian, Epiphanius, Augustine, and all the residue which are of antiquity, do affirm: but inasmuch as the substance of bread and wine is another thing than the substance of the body and blood of Christ, it plainly appeareth that there is no transubstantiation.

4 The bread is no more transubstantiated than the wine: but that the wine is not transubstantiated, St. Matthew and St. Mark teach us: for they witness that Christ said he would drink no more of the fruit of the vine, which was not blood but wine: and therefore it follows, that there is no transubstantiation. Chrysostom upon St. Matthew, and Cyprian do affirm this reason.

5. As the bread in the Lord's supper is Christ's natural body, so it is his mystical body: for the same Spirit that spake of it, This is my body, said also For we many are one bread, one body, &c. but now it is not the mystical body by transubstantiation, and therefore it is not his natural body by transubstantiation.

6. The words spoken over the cup in St. Luke and St. Paul, are not so mighty and effectual, as to transubstantiate it: for then the cup, or that which is in it, should be transubstantiated into the New Testament: therefore the words spoken over the bread, are not so mighty as to make transubstantiation.

7. All that doctrine which agreeth with those churches which be apostolical mother churches, is to be counted for truth, because it holdeth that which these churches received of the apostles, the apostles of Christ, and Christ of God. But it is manifest that the doctrine taught at this present by the church of Rome, concerning transubstantiation, doth not agree with the apostolical and mother churches of Greece, of Corinth, of Philippos, Colossia, Thessalonica, and Ephesus, which never taught transubstantiation; yea, it agreeth not with the doctrine of the church of Rome, as it was taught in times past.

After Mr. Weston's departure, the keeper, Mr. Claydon, and Stephen Bech came to Mr. Bradford, and spake to him in such a manner as if they had been his utter enemies, notwithstanding the friendship they hitherto pretended. If God be with us, it matters not who is against us.

There was a certain gentlewoman's servant came, which gentlewoman had been cruelly afflicted, and miserably handled by her father and mother for not coming to mass; and she would have been put to death, had not the providence of God delivered her from her father's house.

This gentlewoman's servant therefore coming to Mr. Bradford, and taking him by the hand, said, God be thanked for you. How do you do?

Mr. Bradford answered, Well, I thank God. For as men in sailing, which be near to the shore or haven where they would be, would be nearer; even so the nearer I am to God, the nearer I would be.

Servant. Sir, I have never seen you so strong and healthful in body, as methinks you be now.

Why, said Bradford, I have given over all care and study, and I only covet to be talking with him, whom I have always studied to serve.

Servant. Well, God hath done much for you since the time that I first knew you, and hath wrought wonderfully in you to his glory.

Bradford. Truth it is, for he hath dealt favourably with me, in that he hath not punished me according to my sins, but hath suffered me to live, that I might seek repentance.

Servant. We hear say, there is a rod made so grievous, out of which I think no man shall pluck his head.

Bradford.

Brad. Well, let all that be of Christ's flock, arm themselves to suffer: for I think verily, God will not have one of his to escape untouched, if he love him, let them seek what means or ways they can.

Serv. Well, fir, there is a discourse of a friar that preached before the king, who told him, that he should be guilty of the innocent blood that hath been shed of late.

I indeed, said Bradford, I had a book within these two days of his writing, and therein he saith, that it is not meet nor convenient that heretics should live: and therefore I do marvel how that talk should rise: for I have heard of it also, and I have also talked with this friar (he is named Alphonfus) and with divers others, and I praise God they have confirmed me: for they have nothing to say but that which is most vain.

Serv. Sir, Mr. Cardmaker commendeth himself unto you.

Brad. How doth he, how doth he?

Serv. Well, God be thanked.

Brad. I am very glad thereof: for indeed my lord chancellor did cast him in my teeth: but as David saith, God hath disappointed him.

Serv. Forsooth, God's name be praised, he is very strong.

Brad. And I trust, so are we. What else? our quarrel is most just: therefore let us not be afraid.

Serv. My mistress commendeth herself unto you.

Brad. How doth she?

Serv. Well, God be praised, but she hath been sorer afflicted by her own father and mother, than ever you were with your imprisonment; and yet God hath preserved her, I trust to his glory.

Brad. I pray you, tell her, I read this day a godly history, written by Basilius Magnus, of a virtuous woman who was a widow, and was named Juledo. She had great lands and many children, and nigh her dwelt a cormorant, who for her virtuous and pious living, had great indignation against her, and of very malice he took away her lands, so that she was constrained to go to law with him: and in conclusion, the matter came to the trial before the judge, who demanded of this tyrant why he wrongfully withheld these lands from this woman? He made answer and said, he might so do, for (said he) this woman is disobedient to the king's proceedings: for she will in no wise worship his gods, nor offer sacrifice unto them. Then the judge hearing that, said unto her, Woman, if this be true, thou art not only like to lose thy land, but also thy life, unless that thou worship our gods, and do sacrifice unto them. This good woman hearing that, steps forth to the judge, and said, Is there no remedy but either to worship your false gods, or else to lose my lands and life? Then farewell suit, farewell lands, farewell children, farewell friends, yea and farewell life too: and in respect of the true honour of the everliving God, farewell all. And with that saying the judge committed her to prison, and afterwards she suffered most cruel death: and being brought to the place of execution, she exhorted all women to be strong and constant. For, saith she, you were redeemed with as dear a price as men. For although you were made of the rib of the man, yet are you all of his flesh: so that also in the case and trial of your faith towards God, you ought to be as strong. And thus died she constantly, not fearing death. I pray you, tell your mistress of this story.

Serv. That I shall, fir, by God's grace: for she told me that she was with you and Mr. Saunders, and received your kind counsel.

Brad. We never gave her other counsel but the truth, and in witness thereof, we have and will seal it with our blood. For I thought this night I had been sent for, because at eleven o'clock there was such a rapping at the door.

Then answered a maid, and said, Why then, I perceive you were afraid.

Brad. You shall hear how fearful I was. For I considered that I had not slept, and I thought to take a nap before I went: and after I was asleep, these men came into the next chamber, and sang, as it was told me, and yet for all my fearfulness, I heard them not: therefore I could not be much afraid, if I slept so fast.

Serv. Do you lack any thing towards your necessity?

Brad. Nothing but your prayers, and I trust I have them, and you mine.

Serv. I saw a priest come to you to-day in the morning.

Brad. Yea, he brought me a letter from a friar, and I am writing an answer.

Serv. Then we hinder you, therefore the living God be with you.

Brad. And with you also, and blefs you.

Serv. Amen, amen; and gave him thanks and departed.

Mr. Bradford continued still in prison, until the month of July, in such labours and sufferings as he always before had sustained in prison. But when the time of his determined death was come, he was suddenly conveyed out of the Compter where he was prisoner, in the night season to Newgate, as is declared before, and from thence he was carried the next morning to Smithfield, where he constantly abiding in the same truth of God, which before he had confessed, earnestly exhorting the people to repent, and to return to Christ, and sweetly comforting the pious young man of nineteen or twenty years of age, who suffered with him, cheerfully ended his painful life to live with Christ.

The EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN LEAF.

WITH Mr. Bradford was burnt John Leaf, apprentice to Humphry Gaudy, tallow chandler, of the parish of Christ-church, in London, born at Kirkly Moreside, in the county of York; who upon the Friday before Palm-Sunday was committed to the Compter in Bread-street, by an alderman of the ward where the said John Leaf dwelt. Afterwards he coming to examination before bishop Bonner, gave a firm and christian testimony of his doctrine and profession, answering to such articles as were objected to him by the said bishop.

First, As touching his belief and faith in the said sacrament of the altar, he answered, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the bread and wine, there was not the very true and natural body and blood of Christ in substance; and further did hold and believe, that the said sacrament of the altar, as is now called, used, and believed in this realm of England, is idolatrous and abominable; and also said further, that he believed, that after the words of consecration spoke by the priest over the material bread and wine, there is not the self same substance of Christ's body and blood there contained; but bread and wine, as it was before. And further said, that he believed, that when the priest delivereth the said material bread and wine to the communicants, he delivereth only material bread and wine; and the communicants do receive the same in remembrance of Christ's death and passion, and spiritually in faith they receive Christ's body and blood, but not under the forms of bread and wine: and also affirmed, that he believed confession not necessary to be made unto a priest; neither that the priest hath any authority given him by the scripture to absolve and remit any sin.

Upon these his answers, and testimony of his faith, he was at that time dismissed, with orders to appear again on the next Monday, June 10, in the said place, there and then to hear the sentence of his condemnation. At which time the aforesaid bishop propounded the said articles to him as before, endeavouring by all manner of ways to bring him to renounce his religion; but notwithstanding all his persuasions, threats, and promises, found him the same man still, so planted upon the sure rock of truth, that no words or deeds of men could remove him.

Then the bishop, after many words passing between them, at last asked him, if he had been Mr. Rogers's scholar? To whom the aforesaid John Leaf answered again, granting it so to be; and that he believed in the doctrine of the said Rogers, and in the doctrine of bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, and others of their opinion, who were lately burned for the testimony of Christ, and that he would die in that doctrine that they died for. The bishop still continued persuading him to return to the unity of the church, but he answered again in these words: My lord, (said he) you call mine opinion heresy; but it is the true light of the word of God. And again repeating the same, he professed that he would never forsake his stayed and well grounded opinion, while the breath should be in his body. Whereupon the bishop being too weak, either to refute his sentence, or to remove his constancy, proceeded consequently to read the sentence of condemnation; whereby this pious and constant young man being committed to the secular power of the sheriffs there present, was then adjudged, and not long after suffered, the same day with Mr. Bradford, confirming with his death that which he had spoken and professed in his life.

It is reported of the said John Leaf, by one that was in the Compter at the same time, and saw the thing, that after his examinations before the bishop, when two bills were sent unto him in the Compter in Bread-street, the one containing a recantation, the other his confessions, to know to which of them he would put his hand; first hearing the bill of recantation read unto him, (because he could not read nor write himself) that he refused. And when the bill of his confessions was read unto him, instead of a pen he took a pin, and so pricking his hand, sprinkled the blood upon the said bill, desiring the reader thereof to shew the bishop, that he had sealed the same bill with his blood already.

On the DEATH of Mr. JOHN BRADFORD.

LET no disciple 'bove his master be,
 God's servants are not from afflictions free,
 God, whom he loves, chastises every son;
 Strait is the way to the celestial throne.
 These words whilst, Bradford, thou didst ruminat,
 No humane threats, no fears, no dismal state,
 Could shock thy steady soul; no fiery dart
 Of Satan's malice wound thy constant heart:
 But thou didst freely (arm'd with grace divine)
 Thy body to the flaming pile resign.

Mr. Bradford, during the time of his imprisonment, wrote several comfortable treatises, and many pious letters, of which, some were directed to the city of London, Cambridge, Walden, to Lancashire and Cheshire, and divers to his other private friends. Which letters, to the intent it may appear how well this good man occupied his time in prison, what special zeal he bare to the state of Christ's church, what care he had to perform his office, how earnestly he admonished all men, how tenderly he comforted the heavy-hearted, how faithfully he confirmed them whom he had taught, we thought good here to introduce: all the letters that he wrote cannot be here exhibited, being so many in number that they alone would make a large volume; however, for the satisfaction of the pious reader, we will insert those that are judged the best and most excellent among them.

It has been mentioned before how the earl of Derby complained in the parliament house, of certain letters written by John Bradford out of prison, to Lancashire; and he was likewise charged by the bishop of Winchester, and Mr. Allen, with some other letters. Now to the intent that the reader may more perfectly understand what sort of letters these were, which he wrote to his mother, brethren, and sisters, out of the Tower, before his condemnation, we will here produce the copy and contents as followeth.

L E T T E R I.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his Mother, a pious Matron, dwelling in MANCHESTER, and to his Brethren and Sisters, and other Friends there.

OUR dear and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, whose prisoner at this present (praised be his name) I am, preserve and keep you, my good mother, with my brothers and sisters, my fathers John Traves, Thomas Sorrocold, Laurence and James Bradshaw, with their wives and families, &c. now and for ever, Amen.

I am now in prison, secure enough from starting, to confirm what I have preached unto you, as I am ready (I thank God) to seal the same with my life and blood, if God shall vouchsafe to make me worthy of that honour. For, good mother and brethren, it is a most special benefit from God, to suffer for his name's sake and gospel, as now I do; I heartily thank God for it, and am sure that with him I shall be partaker of his glory, as St. Paul saith, "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him." Therefore be not faint-hearted, but rather rejoice, at least for my sake, who am now in the right and highway to heaven: for by many afflictions we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. Nor will God make known his children. When the wind doth not blow, a man cannot know the wheat from the chaff; but when the blast cometh, then the chaff flieth away, but the wheat remaineth, and is so from being hurt, that by the wind it is more cleansed from the chaff, and known to be wheat. Gold, when it is cast in the fire, is the more precious: so are God's children by the cross of affliction. God always beginneth his judgment at his house. Christ and the apostles were in the most misery in the land of Jewry, but yet the whole land smarted for it after: so now the children of God are first chastised in this world, that they should not be damned with the world: for surely the great plagues of God hang over this realm.

Ye all know that there never was more knowledge of God, and less godly living, and true serving of God. It was counted a foolish thing to serve God truly; and earnest prayer was not minded. Preaching was but a pastime. The communion was counted too common. Fasting to subdue the flesh was quite out of use. Alms was almost nothing. Malice, covetousness, and uncleanness, was common every-where, with swearing, drunkenness, and idleness. God therefore now is come, and you have heard me preach, and because he will not damn us with the world, he beginneth to punish us: as me for carnal living. For, as for my doctrine, I am very certain that it is and was God's truth, and by his grace I resolve to give my life for it; but because I loved not the gospel as sincerely as I ought, therefore doth he thus punish me; nay, in punishing, he rather blesteth me. Indeed I thank him more for this prison, than for any parlour, yea, than for any pleasure that ever I had; for in it I always find God my sweetest and greatest good. The flesh is now punished to admonish us heartily to live as we profess; and to certify the wicked of their just damnation, if they repent not.

Perhaps you are weakened in that which I have preached, because God doth not defend it, as you think, but suffereth the popish doctrine to come again and prevail: but you must know, good mother, that God by this doth prove and try his children, whether they will unfeignedly and simply stand stedfast to him and his word. He did so with the Israelites, bringing them into a desert, after their coming out of Egypt, where (I mean in the wilderness) was want of all things, in comparison of that which they had in Egypt. Christ, when he came into this world, brought no worldly wealth, nor quietness with him, but rather war: "The world, (saith he) shall rejoice, but ye shall mourn and weep, but your weeping shall be turned into joy: and therefore happy are they that mourn and weep, for they shall be comforted." They are marked then with God's mark in their foreheads, and not with the beast's mark, I mean the pope's shaven crown, who now with his shavelings rejoice; but woe unto them, for they shall be cast down, they shall weep and mourn. The rich glutton had here his joy, and Lazarus sorrow, but afterwards the case was changed. The end of carnal joy is sorrow. Now let the whoremonger joy with the drunkard, swearer, covetous, malicious, and blind buzzard sir John: for the mass will not bite them, nor make them blush as preaching doth. Now they may do what they will, come devils to church, and go devils home again, for no man must speak against it. They are glad of all this! now they have their heart's desire, as the Sodomites had when Lot was gone; but what what followed? forsooth, when they cried peace, all shall be well, then came God's vengeance, fire and brimstone from heaven, and burnt up every mother's child; even so (dear mother) will it be to our papists.

Wherefore fear God; stick to his word, though all the world swerve from it. Die you must once, and when and how, you cannot tell. Die therefore with Christ, suffer for serving him truly, according to his word: for we may be sure, that of all deaths it ought to be our greatest desire to die for the cause of God. This is the safest way of dying: we need not doubt but that we shall go to heaven, if we die for his name's sake. And that you shall so die, the word of God will warrant you, if you stick to that which God by me hath taught you. You shall see that I speak as I think; for by God's grace I will drink before you of this cup, if it be put to me.

I doubt not but God will give me grace and strength to undergo what I purpose: pray for me, that I may be immovable in the fiery trial. I am ready whenever God shall be pleased to call me. Death nor life, prison nor pleasure, I trust in God, shall be able to separate me from my Lord God, and his gospel. In peace, when no persecution was, then were you content and glad to hear me, then you believed me, and will you not do so now, seeing I speak nothing but that which by God's grace I will verify with my blood? Good mother, I write to you before God, as before him I have preached.

I have taught the pure word of God: it is the same infallible truth whereof he said, "Heaven and earth shall pass, but my word shall not pass." The mass, and such baggage as the false worshippers of God, and the enemies of Christ's cross (the papists) have brought in again, to poison the church of God, highly displeaseth him, and is abominable in his sight. Happy may he be who for conscience sake will suffer the loss of life or goods, in contending against it. Come not near it. If God be God, follow him: if the mass be God, let who will see it, hear, or be present at it, go to the devil with it. What is there which God ordained? His supper was ordained to be received by us as a memorial of his death, for the confirmation of our faith, that his body was broken for us, and his blood shed for the pardon of our sins; but in the mass there is no receiving, but the priest alone keepeth all to himself. Christ saith, Take, eat: No, saith the priest, Gape, peep. Here (in the mass) is a sacrificing, yea, crucifying Christ again as much as they can. Here is idolatry in worshipping the outward sign of bread and wine; here is all in Latin, you cannot tell what is said. In short, here is nothing as God ordained. Wherefore (my good mother) come not near it.

I presume some will say, that it will be worse for you, if you refuse to go to mass, and do as others do. But be assured, that God will assist and protect you, as you shall one day find: he hath promised to them who suffer for his cause, his great blessing in this world, and in the world to come life everlasting.

You shall be counted an heretic: but they are the heretics that so call you, whose praise is a scandal.

You are not able to reason against the priests, but God will, that they shall not be able to withstand you. I doubt not but father Traves, and others of my brothers and sisters will comfort and assist you by their counsel and pious examples; but if they do not, I your son in God, by his grace, will so do, and go before you: pray that I may be constant: rejoice in my sufferings, for it is for your sakes, that thereby I may confirm the truth I have taught. Beware that this letter come not abroad, but only into father Traves's hands: for if it should be known that I have pen and ink in prison, it would be much worse for me. Therefore keep it to yourselves, and commend me to God's mercy through Jesus Christ, and pray that he would make me worthy to give my life for the sake of his church and gospel. From the Tower of London, October 26, 1553.

My name I write not, you know the reason well enough: like the letter never the worse. Commend me to all our good brethren and sisters in the Lord. Howsoever you do, be obedient to the higher powers; that is, in no point either in hand or tongue rebel, but rather if they command that which with good conscience you cannot obey, lay your head on the block, and suffer whatsoever they shall do or say. By patience possess your souls.

After the time that Mr. Bradford was condemned, and sent to the Compter, his adversaries purposed (as ye heard before) to send him to Manchester to be burned. Whereupon he writeth to the city of London, thinking to take his last farewell of them in this letter.

LETTER II.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to the CITY of LONDON.

TO all that profess the gospel and true doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in the city of London, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord now not only in prison, but also excommunicated and condemned to be burned for the same true doctrine, wishes mercy, grace, and peace, with increase of all godly knowledge and piety from God the Father of mercy, through the merits of our alone and all sufficient Redeemer Jesus Christ, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, for ever. Amen.

My dearly beloved brethren in our Saviour Christ, although the time I have to live is very little, (for I hourly look when I shall be had hence to be conveyed into Lancashire there to be burned, and to render my life by the providence of God, where I received it) and although there is great charge given to keep me from all things whereby I might signify any thing to the world of my estate: yet having, as I now have, pen and ink, through God's working, in spite of Satan and his soldiers, I thought good to write a short confession of my faith, and join thereto a little exhortation to you all to live according to your profession.

First, For my faith, I do confess and pray all the whole congregation of Christ to bear witness with me of the same, that I believe constantly, through the gift and goodness of God, (for faith is God's only gift) all the twelve articles of the symbol and creed, commonly attributed to the collection of the apostles. This my faith I would particularly declare and expound to the confirmation and comfort of the simple! but alas! by starts and stealth I write in manner what I write, and therefore I shall desire you all to take this brevity in good part. And this faith I hold, not because of the creed itself, but because of the word of God, which teacheth and confirmeth every article accordingly. This word of God, written by the prophets and apostles, left and contained in the canonical books of the old Bible, I do believe to contain plentifully all things necessary to salvation, so that nothing (as necessary to salvation) ought to be added thereto, and therefore the church of Christ, nor none of his congregation, ought to be burdened with any other doctrine, than that which hath it's foundation and ground from thence. In testimony of this faith, I render and give my life, being condemned as well for not acknowledging the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general, and supreme head of his catholic and universal church here or elsewhere upon earth; as for denying the horrible and idolatrous doctrine of transubstantiation, and Christ's real, corporal, and carnal presence in his supper, under the forms and accidents of bread and wine.

To believe Christ our Saviour to be the head of his church, and kings in their realms to be the supreme powers, to whom every soul oweth obedience, and to believe that in the supper of Christ (which the sacrament of the altar, as the papists call it and use it, doth utterly overthrow) is a true and very presence of whole Christ, God and Man, to the faith of the receiver, but not to the stander by, and looker upon, as it is a true and very presence of bread and wine to the senses of men: to believe this, I say, will not serve, and therefore as an heretic I am condemned, and shall be burned; whereof I heartily ask God mercy that I do no more rejoice than I do, having so great cause, as to be an instru-instrument wherein it may please my dear Lord God and Saviour to suffer.

For albeit my manifold sins, even since I came into prison, have deserved at the hands of God, not only this temporal, but also eternal fire in hell, much more than my former sinful life; which the Lord pardon for Christ's sake, as I know he of his mercy hath done, and will never lay mine iniquities to my charge to condemnation, so great is his goodness, (praised therefore be his holy name) although, I say, my late manifold and grievous sins have most justly deserved all the tyranny that man or devil can do unto me; and therefore I confess that the Lord is just, his judgments be true, and I have deserved them: yet the bishops and prelates, instead of persecuting them in me, do persecute Christ himself, his word, his truth, and his religion. And therefore I have great cause to rejoice that ever I was born, and hitherto preserved by the Lord; that by my death, which I deserve for my sins, it pleaseth him to glorify his name, to testify and confirm his truth, and to overcome his adversaries. O good God and merciful Father, forgive my great unthankfulness, especially herein.

And you, my dearly beloved, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, I humbly and heartily in his bowels and blood do now for my last farewell in this present life, beseech you, and every one of you, that you will consider this work of the Lord accordingly. By me be admonished to beware of hypocrisy and carnal security; profess not the gospel with tongue and lips only; but in heart and in truth frame your lives accordingly: beware God's name be not evil spoken of, and the gospel less regarded by your conversation. God forgive me that I have not so heartily professed it as I should have done, but have sought myself, and too much consulted my own ease therein. The gospel is a new doctrine to the old man; it is new wine, and therefore cannot be put into old bottles, without greater harm than good to those bottles. If we will talk with the Lord, we must put off our shoes and carnal affections; if we will hear the voice of the Lord, we must wash our garments and be holy; if we will be Christ's disciples, we must deny ourselves, take up our cross, and follow him; we cannot serve two masters. If we seek Christ's kingdom, we must seek the righteousness thereof. To this petition, Thy kingdom come, we must join, Thy will be done, done on earth as it is in heaven. If we will not be doers of the word, but hearers only, we miserably deceive ourselves. If we hear the gospel, and love it not, we declare ourselves to be but fools, and builders upon the sand. Deceitfulness the Lord abhorreth; if we come to him, we must beware that we come not with a double heart; for then God will answer us according to our own folly; and we shall deceive ourselves and others.

On this sort, my right dearly beloved, let us heartily bewail our sins, repent us of our former evil life, heartily and earnestly purpose to amend our lives in all things, continually watch in prayer, diligently and reverently attend, hear, and read the holy scriptures, labour after our vocation to amend our brethren. Let us reprove the works of darkness. Let us fly from all idolatry. Let us abhor the antichristian and Romish rotten service, detest the popish mass, renounce the Romish god, prepare ourselves to the cross, be obedient to all that are in authority, in all things that be not against God and his word; for then answer with the apostles, "It is more meet to obey God than man." Howbeit never for any thing resist, or rise against the magistrates. Avenge not yourselves, but commit your cause to the Lord, to whom vengeance belongeth, and he in his time will reward it. If you feel in yourselves an hope and trust in God, that he will never tempt you above that he will make you able to bear, be assured the Lord will be true to you, and you shall be able to bear all brunts. But if you want this hope, fly and get you hence, rather than by your tarrying, God's name should be dishonoured.

In sum, cast your care on the Lord, knowing for most certain, that he is careful for you; with whom all the hairs of your head are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish without his good pleasure: much more then nothing shall happen to our bodies, which shall not be profitable, howsoever for a time it seem otherwise to our senses. Depend on the providence of God, not only when you have means to help you, but also when you have no means, yea, when all means be against you. Give him this honour, which of all other things he chiefly requireth at your hands: namely, believe that you are his children through Christ, that he is your Father and God through him, that he loveth you, pardoneth you all your offences, that he is with you in trouble, and will be with you for ever. When you fall, he will put under his hand, you shall not lie still: before you call upon him he heareth you, out of the evil he will finally deliver you, and bring you to his eternal joy. Doubt not herein, my dearly beloved, doubt not (I say) this God your Father will do for you, not in respect of yourselves, but in respect of Christ your captain, your pastor, your keeper, out of whose hands none shall be able to pluck you; in him be quiet, and often consider your dignity, namely, how that you be God's children, the saints of God, citizens of heaven, temples of the Holy Ghost, the thrones of God, members of Christ and lords over all.

Therefore be ashamed to think, speak, or do any thing that should be unseemly for God's children, God's saints, Christ's members, &c. Marvel not though the devil and the world hate you, though ye be persecuted here, for the servant is not above his master. Covet not earthly riches, fear not the power of man, love not this world, nor the things of this world; but long for the Lord Jesus's coming, at which time your bodies shall be made like unto his glorious body; when he appeareth, you shall be like unto him; when your life shall be thus revealed, then ye shall appear with him in glory.

In the mean time live in hope thereof. Let the life you lead be in the faith of the Son of God. "For the just do live by faith; which faith flieth from all evil, and followeth the word of God as a lanthorn to her feet, and a light to her steps; her eyes be above where Christ is, she beholdeth not the things present, but rather things to come; she glorieth in affliction; she knoweth that the afflictions of this life are not worthy to be compared to the glory which God will reveal to us and in us. Of this glory God grant us here a lively taste, then shall we run after the scent it sendeth forth. It will make us valiant men to take to us the kingdom of God; whither the Lord of mercy bring us in his good time through Christ our Lord, to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, three Persons and one God, be all honour and glory, world without end. Amen.

My dearly beloved, I would gladly have given here my body to have been burned for the confirmation of the true doctrine I have taught here unto you. But that my country must have. Therefore I pray you take in good part this signification of my good will towards all of you. Impute the want herein to time and trouble. Pardon me mine offensive and negligent behaviour when I was amongst you. With me repent, and labour to amend. Continue in the truth which I have truly taught unto you, by preaching in all places where I have come; God's name therefore be praised. Confess Christ when you be called, whatsoever cometh thereof, and the God of peace be with us all, Amen. February 11, 1555.

Your brother in bonds for the Lord's sake,
JOHN BRADFORD.

L E T T E R III.

From Mr. BRADFORD to the University of CAMBRIDGE.

TO all that love the Lord Jesus and his true doctrine, being in the university and town of Cambridge, John Bradford, a most unworthy servant of the Lord, imprisoned and condemned for the same true doctrine, wisheth grace grace, peace, and mercy, with increase of all godliness from God the Father of all mercy, through the bloody passion of our Saviour Jesus Christ, by the lively working of the Holy Spirit for ever, Amen.

Although I look hourly when I should be had to the stake, (my right dearly beloved in the Lord) and although the charge over me is great and strict, yet having by the providence of God secretly pen and ink, I could not but signify unto you my solicitude which I have for all of you in the Lord, though not as I would, yet as I may. For albeit I have deserved (through my uncleanness, hypocrisy, avarice, vain-glory, idleness, unthankfulness, and carnality, whereof I accuse myself, to my confusion before the world, that before God through Christ I might, as my assured hope is I shall, find mercy) eternal death and hell, much more than this affliction and fire prepared for me: yet my dearly beloved, it is not these, or any of these things, for which the prelates do persecute me, but God's verity and truth; yea, even Christ himself is the only cause for which I am now condemned, and shall be burned as an heretic, because I will not grant the Antichrist of Rome to be Christ's vicar general and supreme head of his church here, and every-where upon earth, by God's ordinance, and because I will not grant such corporal, real, and carnal presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament, as doth transubstantiate the substance of bread and wine, and is received by the wicked, yea by dogs and mice. Also I am excommunicated and accounted as a dead member of Christ's church, as a rotten branch, and therefore shall be cast into the fire.

Therefore you ought heartily to rejoice with me, and to give thanks for me, that God the eternal Father hath vouchsafed our mother to bring up any child in whom it would please him to magnify his holy name as he doth, and I hope for his mercy and truth's sake, will do in me and by me. Oh, what such benefit upon earth can it be, as that I who deserved death by reason of my sins, should be delivered to a demonstration, a testimony, and confirmation of God's verity and truth? Thou mother the university hath not only had the truth of God's word plainly manifested unto thee by reading, disputing, and preaching publickly and privately; but now to make thee altogether excuseless, and as it were, almost to sin against the Holy Ghost, if thou put to thy helping hand with the Romish rout to suppress the verity, thou hast my life and blood as a seal to confirm thee, if thou wilt be confirmed, or else to confound thee, and bear witness against thee, if thou wilt take part with the prelates and clergy, which now fill up the measure of their fathers which slew the prophets and apostles, that all the righteous blood from Abel to Bradford, shed upon earth, may be required at their hands.

Of this therefore I thought good before my death, as time and liberty would suffer me, (for the love and duty I bear unto thee) to admonish thee good mother, and my sister the town, that you would call to mind from whence you are fallen, and study to do the first works. You know, (if you will) these matters of the Romish supremacy, and the antichristian transubstantiation, whereby Christ's supper is overthrown, his priesthood evacuated, his sacrifice frustrated, the ministry of his word unplaced, repentance repelled, faith faint, piety extinguished, the mass maintained, idolatry supported, and all impiety cherished: you know I say (if you will) that these opinions are not only besides God's word, but even directly against it, and therefore to take part with them, is to take part against God, against whom you cannot prevail.

Therefore for the tender mercy of Christ, in his bowels and blood I beseech you to take Christ's eyesalve to anoint your eyes, that you may see what you do, and have done, in admitting (as I hear you have admitted, yea, alas! authorized, and by consent confirmed) the Romish rotten rags, which once you utterly expelled. O be not "The dog returned to his own vomit: the sow that was washed returned to her wallowing in the mire," 2 Pet. ii. Beware lest Satan enter in with seven other spirits, and then the last shall be worse than the first. It had been better ye had never known the truth, than after knowledge to run from it: Ah, woe to this world and the things therein, which hath now so wrought with you. Oh that ever the dirt of the devil should daub up the eye of the realm. If thou be light and shine, all the body shall fare the better: but if thou the light be darkness, alas how great will the darkness be? What is man whose breath is in his nostrils, that thou shouldst thus be afraid of him?

Oh what is honour and life here? Bubbles. What is glory in this world, but shame? Why art thou afraid to carry Christ's cross? Wilt thou come into his kingdom, and not drink of his cup? Dost thou not know Rome to be Babylon? Dost thou not know that as the old Babylon had the children of Judah in captivity, so hath this Rome the true Judah, that is, the confessors of Christ? Dost thou not know, that as destruction happened unto it, so shall it do unto this? And thinkest thou that God will not deliver his people now when the time is come, as he did then? Hath not God commanded his people to come out from her! Hast thou forgotten the woe that Christ threateneth to offence-givers? Wilt thou not remember, that it were better that a mill-stone were hanged about thy neck and thou thrown into the sea, than that thou shouldst offend the little ones?

And alas, how hast thou offended? Yea, and how dost thou still offend? Wilt thou consider things according to the outward shew? Was not the synagogue more seemly and like to be the true church, than the simple flock of Christ's disciples? Hath not the whore of Babylon more costly array, and rich apparel, externally to set forth herself, than the homely housewife of Christ? Where is the beauty of the king's daughter, the church of Christ? Without or within? Doth not David say, within? O remember that as they are happy which are not offended at Christ, so are they happy which are not offended at his poor church. Can the pope and his prelates mean honestly, which make so much of the wife, and so little of the husband? The church they magnify, but Christ they contemn.

When Christ and his apostles were upon the earth, who was most like to be the true church, they or the prelates, bishops and synagogue? If we ought to have followed custom, unity, antiquity, or the greater part, should not Christ and his company have been cast out doors? therefore Christ saith, search the scriptures. Good mother, shall the servant be above his master? Shall we look for better entertainment at the hands of the world, than Christ and his dear disciples found? In Noah's time who was taken for the church, poor Noah and his family, or all the others that were destroyed by the flood? Who was taken for God's church in Sodom, righteous Lot, or the others? And doth not Christ say, "As it was then, so shall it go now towards the coming of the Son of man?" What meaneth Christ when he saith, Iniquity shall have the upper hand? Doth he not likewise say, that charity shall wax cold? And we plainly see the greatest scarcity of it in those, who would now be taken for Christ's true catholic church.

Therefore dear mother, receive some admonition of one of thy poor children, now going to be burnt to ashes for the testimony of Jesus. Come again to God's truth; come out of Babylon; confess Christ and his true doctrine; repent of what is past, make amends by declaring thy repentance by the fruits. Remember the reading and preaching of God's prophet the true preacher, Martin Bucer. Call to mind the threatenings of God against impenitent sinners. Let the exile of Leaver, Pilkington, Grindal, Haddon, Horn, Scory, Ponet, &c. awake and strengthen thee. Let the imprisonment of thy dear sons, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, move thee. Consider the martyrdom of thy intimate friends, Rogers, Saunders, and Taylor. And now cast not away the poor admonition of me, that am now going to be burnt and to receive the like crown of glory with my fellows. Take to heart God's calling by us. Be not as Pharaoh was, that it may not happen unto unto thee as it did unto him. What is that? Hardness of heart. And what then? Destruction eternally both of body and soul. Ah therefore, good mother, awake, awake, repent, repent, and make haste to turn to the Lord. For otherwise it shall be more easy for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for thee. O harden not your hearts; O stop not your ears to-day in hearing God's voice, though it be by a most unworthy messenger. O fear the Lord, for his anger is begun to kindle. Even now the axe is laid to the root of the tree.

You know I prophesied truly before the sweating sickness came what would come, if you repented not your carnal preaching. And now I tell you before I depart hence, that the ears of men will tingle to hear the vengeance of God that will fall upon you all, both town and university, if you repent not, if you leave not your idolatry, if you turn not speedily to the Lord, if you will be ashamed of Christ's truth which you know.

O Perne repent, O Thompson repent, O doctors, bachelors and masters repent; O mayor, aldermen, and town-dwellers, repent, repent, repent, that you may escape the approaching vengeance of the Lord. Rent your hearts and make haste to come unto the Lord. Let us all say, We have sinned, we have done wickedly, we have not hearkened to thy voice, O Lord. Deal not with us after our deserts, but be merciful unto our iniquities, for they are great. O pardon our offences. In thine anger remember thy mercy. Turn us unto thee, O Lord God of hosts, for the glory of thy name's sake. Spare us and be merciful unto us. Let not the wicked people say, Where is now their God? O for thine own sake, for thy name's sake, deal mercifully with us. Turn thyself unto us, and us unto thee, and we shall praise thy name for ever.

If in this sort, my dearly beloved, in heart and mouth we come unto our Father, and prostrate ourselves before the throne of his grace, then surely we shall find mercy. Then shall the Lord look merrily upon us, for his mercy's sake in Christ: then shall we hear him speak peace unto his people. For he is gracious and merciful, of great pity and compassion: he cannot be chiding for ever: his anger cannot last long to the penitent. Though we weep in the morning, yet at night we shall have our sorrow to cease. For he is merciful, and hath no pleasure in the death of a sinner: he would rather have him turn from his wickedness and live.

Oh turn ye now and repent; yet once again I humbly beseech you, and then the kingdom of heaven shall draw nigh. The eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, nor is the heart of man able to conceive the joys prepared for us, if we repent, amend our lives, and heartily turn to the Lord. But if you repent not, but be as ye were, and go forwards with the wicked, following the fashion of the world, the Lord will lead you on with wicked doers, you shall perish in your wickedness, your blood will be upon your own heads, your parts shall be with hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth; you shall be cast from the face of the Lord for ever and ever; eternal shame, sorrow, woe, and misery, shall be both in body and soul to you world without end. Oh therefore, right dear to me in the Lord, turn you, turn you, repent you, repent you, amend, amend your lives, depart from evil, do good, follow peace, and pursue it. Come out from Babylon, cast off the works of darkness, put on Christ, confess his truth, be not ashamed of his gospel, prepare yourselves for the cross, drink of God's cup before it come to the dregs, and then shall I with you and for you, rejoice in the day of judgment, which is at hand: and therefore prepare yourselves thereto, I heartily beseech you. And thus I take my farewell for ever, with you in this present life, mine own dear hearts in the Lord. The Lord of mercy be with us all, and give us a joyful and sure meeting in his kingdom, Amen, Amen.

Out of prison, February 11, 1555.
Your own in the Lord for ever,
JOHN BRADFORD.

Letter IV. Herein he addressed the people of Lancashire and Cheshire, exhorting them to repentance with similar entreaties. Also (Letter V.) the town of Walden, requesting his dear friends not to waver in Christ's religion, as set forth in the days of king Edward.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his loving BRETHREN,
B. C. &c. their WIVES and whole FAMILIES.

I beseech the everliving God to grant you all, my good brethren and sisters, the comfort of the Holy Spirit, and the continual sense of his mercy in Christ our Lord, now and for ever, Amen.

The world, my brethren, seemeth to have the upper-hand, iniquity overfloweth, the truth and verity seemeth to be oppressed, and they which take part therewith are unjustly treated: as they which love the truth lament to see and hear as they do. The cause of all this is God's anger and mercy; his anger, because we have grievously sinned against him; his mercy, because he here punisheth us, and as a father nurturcth us. We have been unthankful for his word; we have contemned his kindness; we have been negligent in prayer; we have been so carnal, covetous, licentious, &c. we have not hastened to heaven-ward, but rather to hell-ward. We were fallen almost into an open contempt of God, and all his good ordinances; so that of his justice he could no longer forbear, but make us feel his anger as now he hath done, in taking his word and true service from us, and permitting Satan to serve us with anti-christian religion; and that in such sort, that if we will not yield to it, and seem to allow it in deed outward fact, our bodies are to be laid in prison, and remain there, and our goods given we cannot tell to whom.

We should look upon this as a sign of God's anger procured by our sins; which, my good brethren, every one of us should often call to our memories, as particularly as we can, that we might heartily lament them, repent them, hate them, earnestly ask mercy for them, and submit ourselves to bear in this life any kind of punishment which God will lay upon us for them. This should we do in consideration of God's anger in this time. Now his mercy in this time of wrath is seen, and should be seen in us, my dearly beloved, in this, that God doth vouchsafe to punish us in this present life. If he should not have punished us, do not you think that we would have continued in the evils we were in? Yes verily, we would have been worse, and have gone forwards in hardening our hearts by impenitence, and negligence of God and true godliness. And then if death had come, should not we have perished both soul and body in eternal fire and perdition? Alas, what misery should we have fallen into, if God should have suffered us to have gone forward in our evils? There is no greater sign of damnation, than to lie in evil and sin unpunished by God, as now the papists (my dearly beloved) are cast into Jezebel's bed of security, which of all plagues is the most grievous that can be. They are bastards and not sons, they are not under God's rod of correction.

A great mercy it is therefore that God doth punish us: for if he loved us not, he would not punish us. Now doth he chastise us, that we should not be damned with the world. Now doth he nurture us, because he favoureth us. Now may we think ourselves God's house and children, because he beginneth his chastising with us. Now he calleth us to remember our sins past. Wherefore? That we might repent and ask mercy. And why? That he might forgive us, pardon us, justify us, and make us his children, and so begin to make us like unto Christ here, that we might be like unto him elsewhere, even in heaven, where already we are set by faith with Christ; and at his coming in very deed we shall then most joyfully enjoy, when our sinful and vile bodies shall be made like to Christ's glorious body, according according to the power whereby he is able to make all things subject to himself.

Only study to please him, and to keep your conscience clean, and your bodies pure from the idolatrous service, which now every-where is used, and God will marvellously and mercifully defend and comfort you, for the sake of his holy name in Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

LETTER VII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to ERKINALDE RAWLINS, and his Wife.

GOD our dear and most merciful Father through Jesus Christ, be with you, my good brother and sister, as with his children for ever, and in all things so guide you with his Holy Spirit, the leader of his people, as may be to his glory, and your own everlasting joy and comfort in him, Amen.

As you have often relieved my necessities, (for which I beseech God to make me thankful, and to recompense you both here and hereafter) I cannot but endeavour (as I am in gratitude bound) to write something for your spiritual comfort.

My dearly beloved, look not upon these days, and the afflictions which they bring, as dismal days, and days only of God's vengeance, but rather of good days, or days of God's fatherly kindness towards you, and such as you be, that is, towards such as repent of their past sins, and earnestly purpose to amend their lives, walking not after the way of the world, and the greatest part of men, for the preservation of their self, which, will they nill they, they shall leave sooner or later, and to whom, and how it shall be used, they know not. Indeed to such as walk in their wickedness, and wind on with the world, this time is a time of wrath and vengeance, and their beginning of sorrow is but now, because they condemn the physic of their Father, which by this purging time and cleansing days would work for their health, if they did but consider it: and because they will not have God's blessing, which hath been offered to them both by prosperity and adversity, therefore it shall be kept far enough from them. As when the sick man will receive no kind of physic from the hands of the physician, he is left alone, and so the malady increaseth, and at length destroyeth him. To such men, indeed, these days are, and should be doleful days, and days of woe and weeping, because their damnation draweth nigh.

But unto such as be penitent, and are desirous to live after the Lord's will, (among whom I do not only count you, but as far as a man may judge, I know you are) unto such, I say, this time is, and should be comfortable. For now our Father chastiseth us for our sins; if he had had a mind to destroy us, he would have left us to ourselves, to seek our own ways, and work our own ruin: let us patiently embrace his fatherly visitation, for he chastiseth us in this world, lest with the world we should perish. Therefore, dear friends, call to mind and lament your sins: pray for mercy and forgiveness, and undoubtedly believe that God will hear you; he doth not punish twice for one thing.

So, that, I say, we have cause to rejoice for these days, because our Father suffereth us not to lie in Jezabel's bed, sleeping in our own sins and security, but as mindful of us, doth correct us as his own children; whereby we may be certain that we are no bastards, but sons; for he correcteth every son whom he receiveth. So that they who are not partakers of his chastisements, or that condemn it, declare themselves to be bastards and not sons, as I know you are, who being chastised, improve it accordingly. And therefore, my dear friends be glad, knowing certainly even by these visitations of the Lord, that ye are his dear and chosen children, whose faults your Father doth visit with the rod of correction, but his mercy will he never take away from us. Amen.

You have cause to rejoice for these days, because they are days of trial, wherein you yourselves, and all the world shall know that you belong not to it, but are God's darlings. Before these days came, Lord God!

how many thought themselves in God's bosom, and so were taken, and would be taken by the world? But now we see whose they are. For, whom we obey, his servants we be. If we obey the world, (which God forbid, and hitherto you have not done it) then are we the world's; but if we obey God, then are we God's. Which thing (I mean, that you are God's) these days have declared both to you, to me, and to all others that know you, better than ever we knew it. Therefore you have no cause to be sorry, but rather to rejoice at this assurance of being the Lord's children, and as you are so accounted by all good people.

What though the world repine thereat? what though it kick? what though it seek to trouble and molest you? it doth but according to its nature: he cannot love the Lord who liveth not in the Lord: he cannot brook the child that hateth the Father: he that careth not for the master will not mind the servant. If ye were of the world, the world would love you, you should live quietly, there would be no grief, no molestation. If the devil dwelt in you, (which God forbid) he would not stir up his knights to besiege your house, or suffer his fiends to enter into your swine: but because Christ dwelleth in you, (as he doth by faith) therefore the devil stirreth up his first-begotten son, the world, to seek how to disquiet you, to rob you, to spoil you, and to destroy you: and perchance your dear Father, to try, and to make known to you and to the world, that you are intended for a better habitation that can be found here upon earth, even an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; hath given, or will give power to Satan, and to the world, to take from you the things which he hath lent you, and by taking them away, to try your fidelity, obedience, and love towards him, (for you must not love them above him) as by giving that you have, and keeping it, he hath declared his love towards you.

Satan, it may be, telleth God, (as he did of Job) that you love God for the sake of your goods. What then, if the Lord, to try you with Job, should give him power over your goods and body, would you be dismayed? would you despair? would you be faint-hearted? or would you not rather rejoice, as the apostles did, that they were worthy to suffer any thing for the Lord's sake? O forget not the end that happened to Job: for as it happened to him, so shall it happen unto you. For God is the same God, and cannot long forget to shew mercy to them that look and long for it, as you do, and I pray you still so to do: for the Lord loveth you, and never can nor will forget to shew and pour out his mercy upon you. After he hath afflicted and tried you a little while, (saith St. Peter) he will visit, comfort, and confirm you; as he did to Jacob wrestling with the angel, when at length morning came, and the sun arose; so, doubtless, it will happen unto you. However, do ye as Job and Jacob did, that is, order and dispose the things that God has lent you, as well as you can while you have time: who knoweth but God hath given you power thus long, for that end?

Go, therefore, dispose of your goods, prepare yourselves to trial, that ye may either stand to it like God's champions, or else if you feel such infirmity in yourselves that ye be not able, give place to violence, and go where you may serve the Lord with a free and safe conscience. Think not this counsel to come by chance and fortune, but from the Lord. Other oracles we may not look for now. As God told Joseph in a dream by an angel, that he should fly, so if you feel such infirmity in yourselves, as should turn to God's dishonour, and your own destruction withal, know that at this present I am as God's angel, to admonish you to take time while ye have it, and to see that God's name might not be dishonoured by you. Joseph might have objected the omission of his vocation, as perchance ye will do. But (dear hearts) let vocations and all things else give place to God's name, and the sanctifying thereof.

This I speak, not as though I would not have you rather to tarry, and to stand to it: but I speak it in respect of your infirmity, which if you feel to be so great in you, that you are not certain of this hope, that God will never tempt you above your ability, fly and get you hence, and know that thereby God will have you tried to yourselves and to others. For by it you shall know how to take this world, and that your home here is no home, but that ye look for another, and so give occasion to others less to love this world, and perchance to some to doubt of their religion. Wherein though they be earnest, yet would they not lose so much as ye do for your religion, which ye do confirm to me and others, by your giving place to violence.

Last of all, ye have cause to rejoice over these our days, because they be the days of confirmation, in which and by which, God our heavenly Father maketh us like to Christ's image here, that we may be like unto him elsewhere. For if we suffer with him, then shall we rise with him again; if we accompany with him in all troubles and afflictions, then shall we rejoice with him in glory; if we now sow with him in tears, we shall reap with him in gladness; if we confess him before men, he will confess us before his Father in heaven; if we take his part, he will take our's; if we lose ought for his name's sake, he will give us all things for his truth's sake. So that we ought to rejoice and be glad, for it is not given to every one to suffer loss of country, life, goods, house, &c. for the Lord's sake. What can God the Father do more unto us, than to call us into the camp with the Son? What may Christ our Saviour do more for us, than to make us his warriors? What can the Holy Ghost do to us above this, to mark us with the cognizance of the Lord of Hosts?

This cognizance of the Lord standeth not in forked caps, tippers, shaven crowns, or such other baggage and antichristian pelf, but in suffering for the Lord's sake. "The world shall hate you," saith Christ. Lo, there is the cognizance and badge of God's children; the world shall hate you. Rejoice, therefore, (my dearly beloved) rejoice, that God doth vouchsafe to begin to confirm you, and to make you like to Christ. By the trial of these days ye are occasioned more to repent, more to pray, more to condemn this world, more to desire life everlasting, more to be holy, (for holy is the end for which God doth afflict us (and so to come to God's company. Which thing because we cannot do as long as this body is as it is, therefore by the door of death we must enter with Christ into eternal life and immortality of soul and body; which God of his mercy send shortly, for our Saviour Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

Letter VIII. was addressed to Mrs. A. Warcup, consoling and entreating her to abide in the true faith.

To Mr. LAURENCE SAUNDERS, PRISONER in the MARSHALSEA.

MY good brother, I beseech our good and gracious Father always to continue his gracious favour and love towards us, and by us, as by instruments of his grace, to work his glory and the confusion of his adversaries. "Out of the mouth of infants and babes he will shew forth his praise to destroy the enemy," &c.

I have perused your letters to myself, and have read them to others. For answer whereof, if I should write what Dr. Taylor and Mr. Philpot do think, then I must say, that they think the salt sent unto us by your friend, is unseasonable. And I think they will both declare it heartily, if they should come before men. As for me, if you would know what I think, (my good and most dear brother) because I am so sinful and so defiled (the Lord knoweth that I lie not) with many grievous sins, which I hope are washed away with the blood of Christ, I neither can nor would be consulted withal, but stood as a cypher. Howbeit, to tell you how and what I mind, take this for a sum: I pray God in no case I may seek myself, and indeed I thank God for it, I purpose it not.

The Lord knoweth how to rid out of temptation the godly, &c. O would to God, I were godly, &c. The Lord knoweth how to deliver out of temptation, such as trust in him, &c. I cannot think that they will offer any kind of indifferent or mean conditions: for if we will not adore the beast, we never shall be delivered, but against their will, think I. God our Father and gracious Lord make perfect the good he hath begun in us.

He will do it, my brother, my dear brother, whom I have in my inward bowels to live and die with. O that I were with you. Pray for me, my own heart root in the Lord. For ever your own,

JOHN BRADFORD.

Letter X. was likewise addressed to the same, being a repetition of the former.

From Mr. BRADFORD to the Rev. FATHERS, Dr. CRANMER, Dr. RIDLEY, and Dr. LATIMER.

JESUS Immanuel. My dear fathers in the Lord, I beseech God our sweet Father through Christ, to make perfect the good he hath begun in us all, Amen.

I had thought that every one of your slaves had stood next the door, but now it is otherwise perceived. Our dear brother Rogers hath broken the ice valiantly, as this day, I think, or to-morrow at the uttermost, hearty Hooper, sincere Saunders, and trusty Taylor, end their course, and receive their crown. The next am I, which hourly look for the porter to open me the gates after them, to enter into the desired rest. God forgive me mine unthankfulness for this exceeding great mercy, that amongst so many thousands it pleaseth his mercy to chuse me to be one, in whom he will suffer. For although it be most true, that I justly suffer, (for I have been a great hypocrite, and a grievous sinner, the Lord pardon me, yea, he hath done it, he hath done it indeed) yet what evil hath he done? Christ whom the prelates persecute, his verity which they hate in me, hath done no evil, nor deserved death. Therefore ought I most heartily to rejoice of this tender kindness of the Lord towards me, which useth a remedy for my sin as a testimonial of his testament, to his glory, to my everlasting comfort, to the edifying of his church, and to the overthrowing of Antichrist, and his kingdom.

Letter XII. was addressed by Mr. Bradford to Lord Ruffel, who was then in trouble for the cause of religion, exhorting him to prefer suffering persecutions for Christ's sake, to all worldly possessions.

L E T T E R XIII.

To Mr. WARCUP and his WIFE, Mrs. WILKINSON, and other FRIENDS.

THE same peace our Saviour Christ left with his people, which is not without war with the world, Almighty God work plentifully in your hearts now and for ever. Amen.

I perceive the time is come wherein the Lord's ground will be known; I mean, it will now shortly appear who have received God's gospel into their hearts indeed, to the taking of good root therein; for such will not wither for a little heat or sun burning, but stiffly will stand and grow on, in spite of the malice of all burning showers and tempests.

O how heavy a sentence is this to all such as know the mass to be an abominable idol, full of idolatry, blasphemy, and sacrilege against God and his Christ, (as undoubtedly it is) and yet for fear of men, for loss of life and goods, yea, some for advantage and gain, will honour it with their presence, dissembling both with God and man, as their own heart and conscience doth accuse them.

But, alas, if these men would look into their own consciences, there should they see that they are very dissemblers, and in seeking to deceive others, (for by this means the magistrates think think them of their sort) they deceive themselves. They think at the time of elevation, that the eyes of all men are fixed upon them, to observe how they do. They think others, hearing of such men going to mass, do see or enquire of their behaviour there. O if there were in those men that are so present at the mass either love to God, or to their brethren, they would for the one or both, openly take God's part, and admonish the people of their idolatry. They fear men more than Him who hath power to cast both soul and body into hell-fire: they hasten on both knees; they serve two masters. God have mercy upon such, and open their eyes with his eye salve, that they may see that they who take no part with God are against him; and that they who gather not with Christ, do scatter abroad. O that they would read what St. John saith will be done to the fearful. The advice given to the church of Laodicea, is good counsel for such.

But to return to you again, (dearly beloved) be not ashamed of God's gospel: it is the power of God unto salvation to all those that do believe it. Be therefore partakers of the afflictions, as God shall make you able, knowing for certain that he will never tempt you farther than he will make you able to bear: and think it no small favour from God to suffer for his truth: for the spirit of God resteth upon you, and ye are happy: as one day ye shall see. Read 2 Thessalonians i. Hebrews xii. As the fire hurteth not gold, but maketh it finer, so shall ye be more pure by suffering with Christ, 1 Pet. i. The flail and the wind hurteth not wheat, but cleanseth it from the chaff. And ye (my beloved) are God's wheat; fear not the flail; fear not the fanning wind; fear not the mill-stone; fear not the oven: for all these make you more meet for the Lord's own tooth. Soap, though it blacken, yet it soileth not the cloth, but rather at length maketh it more clean: so doth the black cross help us to more whiteness, if God strike with his battle-axe. Because ye are God's sheep, prepare yourselves to the slaughter, always knowing that in the sight of the Lord our death shall be precious. The souls under the altar look for us to fill up their number; happy are we, if God hath so appointed us. Howsoever it be, dearly beloved, cast your eyes wholly upon the Lord, with whom all the hairs of your heads are numbered, so that not one of them shall perish. Will we, nill we, we must drink God's cup, if he hath appointed it for us. Drink it willingly, and at the first, when it is full, lest peradventure, if we linger, we shall, with the wicked, drink the dregs thereof, if at the beginning we refuse to drink with his children: for with them his judgment beginneth, and when he hath wrought his will on mount Sion, then will he visit the nations round about.

Submit yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of the Lord. No man shall touch you without his knowledge; and whenever they molest you, know that is for your good. God will thereby work to make you like unto Christ here, that ye may be like unto him hereafter. Acknowledge your unthankfulness and your sin, and bless God that correcteth you in the world, because you shall not be damned with the world. Call upon his name through Christ, for his help, as he commandeth us. Believe that he is merciful to you, heareth you, and helpeth you: I am with him in trouble, and will deliver him, saith he. Know that God hath appointed bounds, over which the devil and all the world shall not pass. If all things seem to be against us, let us say with holy Job, "If he kill me, I will trust in him." Read the ninety-first psalm, and pray for me your poor brother and fellow-sufferer for God's gospel's sake; his name therefore be praised; and may he through his infinite mercy and goodness make me and you worthy to suffer with good conscience for the same. Die once we must, and when we know not: happy are they to whom God giveth to pay nature's debt, I mean, to die for his sake.

Here is not our home; therefore let us accordingly consider things, always having before our eyes the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xii. Rev. xxi. xxii. the way thither to be by persecution; the dear friends of God, how they have gone it after the example of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whose footsteps let us follow, even to the gallows, if it please God, not doubting but that as he within the three days rose again immortal, even so we shall do in our time, that is, when the trump shall blow, and the angel shall shout, and the Son of man shall appear in the clouds with innumerable saints and angels, in majesty and great glory: then shall the dead arise, and we shall be caught up into the clouds to meet the Lord, and so be always with him. Comfort yourselves with these words, and pray for me for God's sake. Out of prison, Nov. 19, 1553.

JOHN BRADFORD.

L E T T E R XIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Sir JAMES HALES,
Knight, then PRISONER in the COMPTER.

THE God of mercy, and Father of all comfort, plentifully pour out upon you and in you his mercy, and with his consolations comfort and strengthen you to the end, for his and our Christ's sake.

Although right worshipful sir, many causes might move me to be content with crying for you to your God, and my God, that he would give you grace to persevere well, as he hath right notably begun, to the great glory of his name, and comfort of all such as fear him; as lack of learning, familiarity, yea, acquaintance, (for I think I am unknown to you both by face and name) and other such like things; yet I cannot content myself, but presume to scribble something unto you; not that I think my scribbling can do you any good, but that I might declare my sympathy and compassion, love and affection I bear towards you, who are contented, yea, desirous with us poor sinners, to confess Christ's gospel in these perilous times and days of trial. O Lord God, how good art thou, which dost thus glean out grapes, I mean children for thyself and brethren for Christ? Look, good master Hales, on your vocation; not many judges, not many knights, not many landed men, not many rich men, and wealthy to live as you are, hath God chose to suffer for his sake, as he hath now done you. Certainly I dare say, you think not so of yourself, as though God were bound to prefer you, or had need of you, but rather attribute this as all good things unto his free mercy in Christ. Again, I dare say that you being a wise man do judge of things wisely, that is concerning this your cross, you judge of it not after the world and people, which is the great master of error, nor after the judgment of reason and worldly wisdom, which is foolishness to faith, nor after the present sense, to which it seemeth not to be joyous but grievous, as St. Paul writeth; but after the word of God, which teacheth your cross to be, in respect of yourself between God and you, God's chastising, and your Father's correction, nurture, school, trial, pathway to heaven, glory, and felicity, and the furnace to consume the dross, and mortify the relics of old Adam which yet remain, yea even the frame-house to fashion you like to the dearest saints of God here, yea to Christ the son of God, that elsewhere you might be like unto him.

Now concerning your cross in respect of the world, between the world and you, God's word teacheth it to be a testimonial of God's truth, of his providence, of his power, of his justice, of his wisdom, of his anger against sin, of his goodness, of his judgment, of your faith and religion, so that by it you are to the world a witness of God, that he is true, he ruleth all things, he is just, wise, and at length will judge the world, and cast the wicked into perdition, but the godly

godly he will take and receive into his eternal habitation. I know you judge of things after faith's fetch, and the effects or ends of things, and so you see an eternal weight of glory which this cross shall bring unto you, while you look not on things which are seen, but on the things which are not seen. Let the worldlings weigh things, and look upon the affairs of men with their worldly and corporal eyes, as many did in the subscription of the king's last will: and therefore they did that, for which they afterwards repented. But let us look on things after another manner, as God be praised you did, in not doing that which you were desired; you then beheld things not as a man, but as a man of God, and so you do now in religion, at least hitherto you have done, and that you might do still, I humbly beseech and pray you say with David, "Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, when wilt thou comfort me? Though you be like a bottle in the smoke, (for I hear you want health) yet do not forget the statutes of the Lord; but cry out, How many are the days of thy servant? When wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?" And be certain, "The Lord will surely come, and not stay; though he tarry, wait for him: for he is but a while in his anger, but in his favour is life; weeping may abide at evening, but joy cometh in the morning." Follow therefore Isaiah's counsel, Hide thyself for a little while until his indignation pass over, which is not indignation indeed, but to our sense: and therefore in the six and twentieth chapter of Isaiah, God saith of his church and people, that as he keepeth night and day, so there is no anger in me, saith he.

The mother sometimes beateth the child, but yet her heart melteth upon it, even in the very beating: and therefore she casteth the rod into the fire, and calleth the child, giveth it an apple, and dandleth it most motherly. And to say the truth, the love of mothers to their children, is but a trace to train us to behold the love of God towards us: and therefore, saith he, Can a mother forget the child of her womb? As much as to say, No: but if she should so do, yet will I not forget thee, saith the Lord of hosts. Ah comfortable saying! I will not forget thee, saith the Lord. Indeed the children of God think oftentimes that God hath forgotten them, and therefore they cry, Hide not thy face from me, &c. Forsake me not O Lord. Whereas in very truth it is not so, but only in their present sense: and therefore, saith David, I said in mine agony, I was clean cast away from thy face. But was it so? No verily. Read his psalms, and you shall see. So he writeth also, in other places very often, especially in the person of Christ, as when he saith, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? He saith not, why dost thou forsake me? or why wilt thou forsake me? but, why hast thou forsaken me? whereas, indeed, God had not left him, but that it was so to his sense, and that this psalm telleth us full well, which I pray you sometimes to read; it is the twenty-second psalm, and thereto join the thirtieth, and the hundred and sixteenth, with divers others. Much the same we read in the fortieth chapter of Isaiah, where he reproveth Israel for saying, God hath forgotten them, in these words, "Hast thou not known; hast thou not heard? &c. They that trust in the Lord shall renew their strength." In his fifty-fourth chapter read the following comfortable words, "Fear not, for a little while have I forsaken thee, but with great compassion will I gather thee. For a moment in mine anger I hide my face from thee, for a little season: but in everlasting mercy have I had compassion on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer. For this is unto me as the waters of Noah: for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be angry with thee nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall move, and the hills shall fall down, but my mercy shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace fall away, saith the Lord that hath compassion on thee."

Be certain, be certain, good master Hales, that all the hairs of your head, your dear Father hath numbered, so that not one of them shall perish: your name is written in the book of life. Therefore cast all your care upon God, who will comfort you with his eternal consolations, and make you able to go through the fire, (if need be) which is nothing to be compared to the fire wherein our enemies shall fall, and lie forever; from which the Lord deliver us, though it be through temporal fire, which must be construed according to the end and profit that cometh after it; it shall not then much terrify us to suffer for Christ our master's cause, which the Lord grant us for his mercy's sake. Amen.

From the King's Bench,

Your humble,

JOHN BRADFORD.

Letter XV. In this Mr. Bradford exhorts Dr. Hill, Physician, to abide in the true faith, to fear God, and not to fear man. In Letter XVI. he desires Mrs. M. ### L E T T E R XVIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD, to a faithful WOMAN
Inwardly Afflicted.

GOD our Father, for his mercy's sake in Christ, with his eternal consolation so comfort you, as I desire to be comforted of him in my greatest need: yea, he will comfort you, my good sister, only cast your care upon him, and he never can nor will forsake you. For his calling and gifts are such, that he can never repent of them. Whom he loveth, he loveth to the end: none of his chosen can perish. Of which number I know you are, my dearly beloved sister; God increase the faith thereof daily more and more in you, may he give unto you to depend wholly on him, and on his providence and protection. For whoso dwelleth under that secret thing, and help of the Lord, he shall be happy for evermore.

You complain in your letters of the blindness of your mind and the troubles you feel. My dearly beloved, God make you thankful for that which he hath given unto you; may he open your eyes to see what and how great benefits you have received, that you may be less covetous, or rather impatient, for so (I fear) it should be called, and more thankful. Have you not received at his hands sight to see your blindness, and thereto a desirous and seeking heart to see where it lieth in the mid-day, as his dear spouse speaketh of herself in the Canticles? O Joy, my good Joy, what is this? Many have some sight, but none this sobbing and sighing, none this seeking which you have, I know, but such as he hath married unto him in his mercies. You are not content to kiss his feet with Mary Magdalen, but you would be kissed even with the kiss of his mouth, Canticles i. You would see his face with Moses, not forgetting how he biddeth us to seek his face, Psal. xxvii. yea, and that for ever, Psal. cv. In bringing us to hell, saith he, he bringeth us to heaven; in darkness he beholdeth brightness; in hiding his face from us, he beholdeth his merry countenance. How did Job see God, (but as you would say) under Satan's cloak? For who cast the fire from heaven upon his goods? Who overthrew his house, and stirred up men to take away his cattle, but Satan? And yet Job pierced through all these, and lay God's work, saying, "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away," &c.

In reading of the Psalms, how often do you see that David in the shadow of death saw God's sweet love? And so, I see that you in your darkness and dimness by faith do see clearness and brightness: saith is of things hoped for, of things which I appeal to your conscience whether you desire or not. And can you desire any thing which you know not? and is there any other true knowledge of heavenly things than by faith?

Therefore be thankful, for (before God I write it) you have great cause. Ah, my Joyce, how happy is the stay wherein you are? Verily you are in the blessed state of God's children; for they mourn, and do you not so? And that not for worldly wealth, but for spiritual riches, faith, hope, charity, &c. Do you not hunger and thirst for righteousness? And I pray you, faith not Christ who cannot lie, that happy are such? How should God wipe away the tears from your eyes in heaven, if now on earth you shed no tears? How could heaven be a place of rest, if on earth you find it? How could you desire to be at home, if in your journey you find no grief? How could you so often call upon God, and talk with him, as I know you do, if your enemy should sleep all day long? How should you elsewhere be made like unto Christ, I mean in joy, if in sorrow you fobbed not with him? If you will have joy and felicity, you must first feel sorrow and misery. If you will go to heaven, you must sail by hell; if you will embrace Christ in his robes, you must not scorn him in his rags. If you will sit at Christ's table in his kingdom, you must first abide with him in his temptations. If you will drink of his cup of glory, forsake not his cup of ignominy.

Can the head corner stone be rejected, and the other more base stones in God's building be in this world set by? You are one of his lively stones, be content therefore to be hewn and persecuted, that you might be made more meet to be joined to your fellows who suffer with you Satan's snatches, the world's wounds, contempt of conscience, and threats of the flesh, whereby they are enforced to cry, O wretches that we are, who shall deliver us? You are of God's corn, fear not therefore the flail, the fan, mill-stone, or oven. You are one of Christ's lambs, look therefore to be fleeced, haled at, and even slain.

If you were a market sheep, you should go in more fat and grassy pasture. If you were for the fair, you should be stall-fed, and want no wealth: but because you are God's own occupying, therefore you must pasture on the bare common, abiding the storms and tempests that will fall. Happy, and thrice happy are you, (my dear sister) that God now haleth you whither you would not, that you might come whither you would. Suffer a little and be still. Let Satan rage against you, let the world cry out, let your conscience accuse you, let the law load you and press you down, yet they shall not prevail, for Christ is Emmanuel, that is, God with us. If God be with us, who can be against us? The Lord is with you, your Father cannot forget; your spouse loveth you. If the waves and surges arise, cry with Peter, Lord, I perish; and he will put out his hand and help you. Cast out your anchor of hope, and it will not cease for the stormy surges, till it take hold of the rock of God's truth and mercy.

Think not that he who hath given you so many things corporally, as inductions of spiritual and heavenly mercies, and that without your deserts or desire can deny you any spiritual comfort when you desire it. For if he giveth you a desire, he will give you the enjoyment of a desire. The desire to have, and the going about to ask, ought to certify your conscience, that they be his earnest of the thing which (you asking) he will give you; yea, before you ask, and whilst you are about to ask, he will grant the same, (as Isaiah saith) to his glory, and your eternal consolation. He that spared not his own Son for you, will not, nor can think any thing too good for you, my heartily beloved.

If he had not chosen you, (as most certainly he hath) he would not have so called you, he never would have justified you; he never would have so glorified you with his gracious gifts, which, praised be his name, I know; he never would have so exercised your faith with temptations, as he hath done and doth, if he had not chosen you. If he hath chosen you, you shall never perish; for if you fall, he will lift you up. Never was mother so careful of a child, as he is of you.

Christ and his mercy is the only cause of our election. This Christ, this mercy, and the infallible truth of God remaineth for ever; and if an angel from heaven should tell you the contrary, let him be accursed. Your thankfulness and worthiness are fruits and effects of your election, but they are no causes. These fruits and effects shall be much more fruitful and effectual, as you are more steadfast and sincere.

Arise, and remember from whence you are fallen. You have a shepherd who never slumbereth nor sleepeth: neither man nor devil can pull you out of his hands. Night and day he commandeth his angels to keep you. Have you forgot what I read to you out of the Psalms, "The Lord is my shepherd, I can want nothing!" As God spared Noah in the ark, even so hath he spared you. Ten thousand shall fall on your right hand, and twenty thousand on your left, and yet no evil shall touch you. Say boldly with the Psalmist, "Many a time from my youth up have they fought against me, but they have not prevailed;" no, nor ever shall prevail, for the Lord is round about his people; and who are his people but such as love him, serve him, and hope in him? Happy are all they that do so, as it is manifest you do by what you have written and unfeignedly confessed unto me. And if you once had that hope, as doubtless you had, though you feel it not at present, it is not lost, you shall find it again if you seek it; for the anger of the Lord lasteth but for a moment, but his mercy endureth for ever. Tell me who hath weakened you! Surely not a persuasion from him that called you. Why should you waver and be so heavy-hearted? Whom look you on? on yourself? on your own worthiness? on your own thankfulness? on that which God requireth of you, as faith, hope, love, fear, joy, &c.? then can you not but waver indeed: for what have you as God requireth? Do you believe, hope, and love as much as you ought? No, no, nor never can in this life. Ah, my dearly beloved, have you so soon forgotten that which ever should be had in memory? namely, that when you would and ought to be certain and quiet in conscience, your faith should break through all things that are in earth and heaven, or hell, until you come to Christ crucified, and the eternal mercies and goodness of God in him. Here is the resting place, here is the spouse's bed; creep into it, and in your arms of faith embrace him, bewail your weakness, unworthiness, diffidence, &c. and you shall see he will turn to you; nay, I should rather have said, you shall feel he will turn to you. You know that when Moses went to the mount to talk with God, he entered into a dark cloud; and Elias had his face covered when God passed by. Both these dear friends of God heard him, but they saw him not, but you shall see him when he appeareth in power and great glory. Here is not the time of seeing, but as it were in a glass. Isaac was deceived, because he was not content with hearing only.

Therefore to make an end of these many words, wherewith I fear I do but trouble you from better exercises; inasmuch as you are indeed the child of God, elect in Christ before the beginning of all times; inasmuch as you are given to the custody of Christ, as one of God's most precious jewels; inasmuch as Christ is faithful, and hitherto hath all power, so that you shall never perish, no, one hair of your head shall not be lost: I beseech you, I pray you, I desire you, I crave at your hands with all my heart, I ask of you with hand, pen, tongue, and mind, in Christ, through Christ, for Christ, for his name, blood, mercies, power, and truth's sake, my most intirely beloved sifter, that you admit no doubting of God's final mercies towards you, howsoever you feel yourself; but complain to God, and crave of him, as of your tender and dear Father, all things, and in that time which shall be most convenient, you shall find and feel far above that your heart or the heart of any creature can conceive to your eternal joy, Amen, Amen, Amen.

The good Spirit of God always keep us as his dear children; may he comfort you, as I desire to be comforted, my dearly beloved for evermore, Amen.

I break up thus abruptly, because our common prayer time calleth me. The peace of Christ dwell in both our hearts for ever, Amen.

As for the report of W. P. if it be as you hear, you must prepare to bear it. It is written on heaven's door, DO WELL AND BEAR EVIL. Be content therefore to bear whatsoever the enemy shall imagine to blot you withal. God's Holy Spirit always comfort and keep you, Amen, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

Here follow Letters XIX and XX. to the good lady Vane, wherein he resolveth certain questions which she demanded. This lady Vane was a great supporter of the pious martyrs who were imprisoned in queen Mary's time; unto whom divers letters wrote by Mess. Philpot, Careless, Tiahern, and others, wherein they render unto her most grateful thanks for her exceeding goodness towards them. She died anno 1568.

In letter XXI he addresseth Mr. Royden and Mr. Esing, with their Wives and Families, enjoining them not to waver in their faith. He desires Mrs. Wilkin-son (Letter XXII) to be thankful to the Lord for his great mercies. In Letter XXIII. he encourages certain pious persons to prepare themselves to bear the cross with patience.—

"If ye go to mass, and do as the most part doth, then may you live quietly and at rest: but if you refuse to go thither, then ye shall go to prison, lose your goods, leave your children comfortless, yea, lose your life also. But (my dearly beloved) open the eyes of your faith, and consider the shortness of this life, which is even as a shadow and a smoke. Again, consider how intolerable the punishment of hell-fire is, and that endless. Last of all, look on the joys incomprehensible, which God hath prepared for all them, world without end, who lose either life, land, or goods for his name's sake; and then reason thus: If we go to mass, the greatest enemy that Christ hath, though for a little time we shall live in quiet, and leave to our children something to live upon hereafter, yet we shall displease God, fall into his hands, (which is horrible to hypocrites) and be in wonderful hazard of falling from eternal joy, into eternal misery, first of soul, and then of body, with the devil and all idolaters.

Again we shall want peace of conscience, which surmounteth all the riches of the world: and for our children, who knoweth whether God will visit our idolatry on them in this life? yea, our house and goods, and even our life are in danger of being lost by many casualties: and when God is angry with us, he can when he pleases send one means or other to take all from us for our sins, and to cast us into greater trouble, who will not come into some little for his sake.

On this sort reason with yourselves, and then doubtless God will work otherwise with you, and in you, than ye are aware of. Where now ye think yourselves unable to abide persecution, be most assured, that if you earnestly purpose not to forsake God, that he will make you so able to bear his cross, that you shall rejoice therein. "God is faithful, (saith Saint Paul) who will not suffer you to be tempted above that you are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." Think how great a benefit it is, if God will make you worthy of this honour, to suffer loss of any thing for his sake. He might justly inflict most grievous plagues upon you, and yet now he will correct you with that rod, whereby you shall be made like to his Christ, that ye may for ever reign with him. Suffer yourselves therefore now to be made like to Christ, for else ye shall never be made like unto him. The devil would gladly have you now to overthrow that, which ye have a long time stedfastly professed. O how would he triumph, if he could win his purpose! O how would the papists triumph against God's gospel in you! O how would you confirm them in their wicked popery! O how would the poor children of God be discomforted, if you should now go to mass and other idolatrous service, and do as the world doth."

In Letter XXIV. he admonishes certain Professors of the Gospel to beware they fall not from the truth in consenting to the Romish Religion.

"My dearly beloved, be admonished to remember your profession, how that in baptism you made a solemn vow to forsake the devil, the world, &c. You promised to fight under Christ's standard. You learned Christ's cross before you began with A B C. Go forwards then, pay your vow to the Lord: fight like men, and valiant men under Christ's standard; take up your cross and follow your master, as your brethren Mess. Hooper, Rogers, Taylor, and Saunders, have done, and as now your brethren, Dr. Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Farrar, Bradford, Haukes, &c. are ready to do. The ice is broke before you, therefore be not afraid, but be content to die for the Lord. You have no occasion to waver or doubt of the doctrine thus declared by the blood of the pastors. Remember that Christ saith, "He that will save his life, shall lose it." And what should it profit you to win the whole world, much less a little quietness, your goods, &c. and to lose your own souls? Render to the Lord that he hath lent you, by such means as he would have you render it, and not as you would. Forget not, Christ's disciples must deny themselves, as well concerning their will, as concerning their wisdom. Have in mind, that as it is no small mercy to believe in the Lord, so it is no small kindness of God towards you, to suffer any thing, much more death for the Lord. If they be blessed that die in the Lord, how shall they be that die for the Lord? O what a blessing is it to have death due for our sins, diverted into a demonstration and testification of the Lord's truth? O that we had a little of Moses's faith to look upon the end of the cross, to look upon the reward, to see continually with Christ and his people greater riches than the riches of Egypt. O let us pray that God would open our eyes to see his hid manna, heavenly Jerusalem, the congregation of his first-born, the melody of the saints, the tabernacle of God dwelling with men, and so take the kingdom of heaven as it were by force. God our Father give us for Christ's sake to see a little, what and how great joy he hath prepared for us, he hath called us unto, and most assuredly giveth us for his own goodness and truth's sake, Amen.

L E T T E R XXV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his good BROTHER JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the KING'S-BENCH.

THE father of mercy, and God of all comfort, visit us with his eternal consolation, according to his great mercies in Jesus Christ our Saviour, Amen.

My dear brother, I never received so much consolation by any thing since I came into prison, as I have by your last letter, God be praised. I must confess that for my unthankfulness towards you, and especially to God, I have now more need of his merciful assistance than ever. Ah that Satan envieth us so greatly, ah that our Lord would shortly lay his head under our feet. Ah that I may for ever beware, and be a godly example to you and to others, to beware of unthankfulness. Good Brother, we had more need to take heed of a foil after lightning than before. God therefore is to be praised even when he hideth (for a season) his cheerful countenance from us, lest we, by not knowing how to use it as we ought, do hurt ourselves more thereby, so great is our ignorance and corruption. This, my good brother, I write unto you, as to one whom in the Lord I embrace, and I thank God that you do me in like manner. God our Father more and more give us both his good Spirit, that as by faith we may feel ourselves united unto him in Christ, so by love we may find ourselves linked in the same Christ to one another, I to you, and you to me, we to all the children of God, and all the children of God to us, Amen, Amen.

Commend me to your good brother Skelthorp, for whom I heartily praise God, who hath given him at length grace to see and profess his truth. I doubt not but he will be so wary in all his conversation, that his old acquaintance may thereby ever think themselves astray. Wo, and wo again would be unto us, if we by our example should make men to stumble at the truth. Forget not salutations in Christ, as you shall think good to Trew and his companions. The Lord hath his time (I hope) for them also, although we perchance think otherwise. It is not one or two drops that maketh the stone hollow, but the perpetual dropping; so if with hearty prayer for them, and by our good example gently working upon them, we may at length see the operation of God. I beseech God to make perfect all the good he hath begun in us all, Amen. I desire you all to pray for me the most unworthy prisoner of the Lord.

Your Brother,

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XXVI.

From MR. BRADFORD to MR. JOHN HALL and his WIFE, Prisoners in NEWGATE.

ALmighty God our heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ, be with you both, my dearly beloved as with his dear children for ever, and bless you with his Holy Spirit, that you may rejoice in his cause and this cross, and gladly take it up and bear it so long as he shall think good. I have heard (my good brother and sister) that God hath brought you both into his school-house, that thereby you might see his love and care for you. If it be a token of a loving and careful father, to prevent the purpose and disappoint the intent of his children, while they inconsiderately endeavour to keep from school (which they would not do, if they did but know the advantage of the learning they might there get); how should you take this work of the Lord preventing your purpose, but as an evident sign of that love and fatherly carefulness which he beareth towards you? If he had winked at your faults, you might indeed have escaped beating (I mean the cross) but then you would have lost the advantage of learning that which your Father would have you to learn for your future good. He, I say, hath brought you where you be; and though your wit and reason may tell you, it is by chance or fortune, yet my dearly beloved, whatsoever was the means, know for certain that God your Father was the worker hereof, and for your welfare, though your old Adam doth tell you otherwise; yet I say of truth, that your duty is to think of this cross, that as it is God's sending, and although you deserve otherwise, yet it cometh from him out of pure love and fatherly affection for your welfare and advantage.

You will be apt to object, and say, What advantage can arise from all this? We are now kept close in prison; our families and poor children have nobody to take care of them; our substance by this means is diminished; our poverty approacheth, and perchance more dangers also, yea, and loss of life too. These are no advantages, but the greatest mi-series and misfortunes; so that we may justly inquire, and should be glad to know, what advantage can come from us from this cross, which seems to be attended with nothing but the most miserable inconveniences.

To these things I answer, That indeed what you say is true of your bodies, families, children, substance, poverty, life, &c. But then you must consider these things in another manner, you must view them inwardly as well as outwardly, and then, perhaps, you may find more satisfaction. Doth not you know that you must of necessity part from all these fine things in a very short time? Tell me then, have you not this advantage from the cross, to learn to loath and leave this world, and to long for and desire another, where is perpetuity? You ought of your own head and free will to have (according to your profession in baptism) forsaken the world and all earthly things, using the world as though you used it not. Your heart must entirely set upon your treasure in heaven, or else you can never be Christ's true disciples, nor be saved, and be where he is. The advantage that cometh by this cross, if you rightly and willingly embrace it, will most assuredly bring you to the Lord in endless glory. How doth God now, as it were, fatherly pull you by the ears, to remember your former offences, that repentance and remission might ensue? How doth God now compell you to call upon him, and to be earnest in prayer? Are all these no advantages? Doth not the scripture say, that "God doth correct us in this world, because we shall not be damned with the world? That God chasteneth every one whom he loveth?" Doth not the scripture say, that you are now going the right way to heaven? That your suffering is Christ's suffering? My dearly beloved, what greater advantages than these can a godly heart desire?

Therefore you are commanded to rejoice and be glad when you suffer as you now do; for through the goodness of God great shall be your reward. Where? forsooth on earth, first your children; for now they are in God's immediate protection. Never was father so careful for his children, as God is for your's. God's blessing, which is more worth than all the world, you leave indeed to your children. Though all your providence for them shall be pulled away, yet God is not poor, he has promised to provide for them most fatherly. "Cast thy burthen upon me, saith he, and I will bear it." Do you therefore cast them, and commend them unto God your Father, and doubt not that he will die in your debt. He never was found unfaithful, and he will not now begin with you. The good man's seed shall not go begging their bread, for he will shew mercy upon thousands of the posterity of them that fear him. Therefore, as I said, God's reward, first, upon earth, shall be felt by your children even corporally, and so also upon you, if God see it most for your advantage, at least inwardly you shall feel it by the quietness of your conscience: And secondly, after this life you shall find it so plentifully, as the eye hath not seen, the ear hath not heard, the heart cannot conceive how great and glorious God's reward will be upon your bodies, much more upon your souls. God open our eyes to see and feel this indeed. Then shall we think the cross, which is a means hereto, to be commodious. Then shall we say with David, "Happy am I that thou hast punished me; for before I went astray, but now I keep thy laws."

That we may do this indeed, my dearly beloved, let us first know that our cross cometh from God. Secondly, that it cometh from God as a Father, that is, for our good. Thirdly, let us call to mind our sins, and ask pardon. Fourthly, let us look for certain help at God's hand in his good time; help, I say, such as shall make most to God's glory, and to the comfort and advantage of our souls and bodies eternally. This if we certainly conceive, then will there there proceed from us hearty thanksgiving, which God requireth as a most gracious sacrifice. That we may all offer this through Christ, let us use earnest prayer to our God and dear Father, who bleſs us, keep us, and comfort us under his sweet croſs for ever, Amen, Amen.

My dear hearts, if I could any way comfort you, you ſhould be ſure thereof, though my life lay thereon, but now I muſt do as I may, becauſe I cannot as I would. O that it would pleaſe our dear Father ſhortly to bring us where we ſhall never part, but enjoy continually the bleſſed fruition of his heavenly preſence. Pray, pray, that it may ſpeedily come to paſs.

To morrow I will ſend to you to know your eſtate; ſend me word what are the chiefeſt things they charge you withal.

From the Compter,
by your brother in the Lord,
JOHN BRADFORD.

He alſo addreſſes Mrs. Hall (Letter XXVII.) to the ſame purport. In Letter XXVIII. he answers a woman, who deſired to know if ſhe might be preſent at the Popiſh Mattins, having refrained from maſs.

"Firſt, The mattins and even-ſong is in a tongue forbidden to be uſed in the public congregation, where they underſtand it not. Read what St. Paul ſaith, that to pray in an unknown tongue is againſt God's commandments, 1 Cor. xiv. This one, I think, is ſufficient, if there were no other argument againſt it. For how can God's glory be ſought, where his word and commandment is wilfully broken? How can charity to man ſtand, when charity to God, which is obedience to his word, is broken down?

Again, Both in mattins and even-ſong idolatry is maintained; for there is invocation and prayer made to ſaints departed this life, which robbeth God of that glory which he will give to none other.

Moreover, this ſervice, and ſetters-forth of it condemn the Engliſh ſervice as hereſy, thereby falling into God's curſe, which is threatened to ſuch as call good evil, and evil good: whereof they ſhall partake who communicate with them.

Befides, this Latin ſervice is a plain mark of Antichriſt's catholic ſynagogue; ſo that the communicants and approvers of it thereby declare themſelves to be members of the ſame ſynagogue, and ſo cut off from Chriſt and his church, whoſe exterior mark is the true adminiſtration of God's word and ſacraments.

Furthermore, the example of your going thither to allow the religion of Antichriſt, (as doubtleſs you do indeed, howſoever in heart you think) occasioneth the obſtinate to be utterly untractable, the weak papiſts to be more obſtinate, the ſtrong goſpellers to be much weakened, and the weak goſpellers to be utterly overthrown: the inconveniences that muſt neceſſarily attend it, neither tongue can utter, nor pen deſcribe. All theſe evils thoſe be guilty of that (externally only) accompany theſe in religion; from which you are admoniſhed to fly. If Chriſt be Chriſt, follow him. Gather with him, leſt you ſcatter abroad. Serve God, not only in ſpirit; but alſo in body; make not your body, which is now a member of Chriſt, a member of Antichriſt. Come out from amongſt them, ſaith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing. Confels Chriſt and his truth, not only in heart, but alſo in tongue, yea, in very deed, which too few goſpellers do. Indeed many deny him, and therefore had need tremble, leſt that Chriſt deny them in the laſt day: which day, if it were often ſet before our eyes, the profits and pleaſures of this world would be eſteemed as mere trifles.

Therefore, good ſiſter, often have it before your eyes, daily ſet yourſelf and your doing, as it were, before the judgment ſeat of Chriſt, that hereafter you be not called into judgment. Think that it will be little profit to you to win the whole world, and loſe your own ſoul. Mark well Chriſt's leſſons, "He that will ſave his life ſhall loſe it." The Father of heaven commandeth you to hear Chriſt, who ſaith, follow me: this you cannot do, and follow idolatry, or idolaters. Fly from ſuch, ſaith the ſcripture."

Letter XXIX. is addreſſed to lady Vane on former ſubjects. Letter XXX. to Mr. Richard Hopkins, ſometime ſheriff of Coventry: who, during the time of his ſhrievalty, was accused by certain malignant adverſaries of matters pertaining to religion, and committed to the Fleet priſon, where he remained a long time in great peril of his life. Being at length delivered out of priſon, following Mr. Bradford's counſel, and minding to keep his conſcience pure from idolatry, he was forced with his wife, and eight young children to quit the realm, and went into High-Germany, where he continued in the city of Baſil till the death of queen Mary.

In Letter XXXI. he encourageth Mrs. Brown to perſevere in godlineſs.—In Letter XXXII. he inſtructs a friend how to answer his adverſaries.

"When you ſhall come before the magiſtrates to give an answer of the hope that is in you, do it with all reverence and ſimplicity. And if you are afraid of the power and cruelty of the magiſtrates, ſet before you the example of good father Moſes; for he ſet the inviſible God before the eyes of his faith, and with them he looked upon God and his glorious majeſty and power, as with the eyes of his body he ſaw Pharaoh and all his frightful terrors. So do you, my dearly beloved: let your inward eyes give light unto you, that as you are before the magiſtrates, ſo, and much more, are you and they preſent before the face of God, who will give you ſuch wiſdom as the enemies ſhall be amazed at: and further, he will ſo order their hearts and doings, that they ſhall, whether they will or no, ſerve God's providence towards you, (which you cannot avoid, though you would) as ſhall be moſt to his glory, and your everlaſting comfort.

The chief matter they will trouble you for, and go about to deceive you withal, is the ſacrament, not of Chriſt's body and blood, but of the altar, as they call it, thereby deſtroying the ſacrament which Chriſt inſtituted. I would have you note theſe two things:

Firſt, That the ſacrament of the altar which the prieſt offereth in the maſs, and eateth privately by himſelf, is not the ſacrament of Chriſt's body and blood inſtituted by him, as Chriſt's inſtitution plainly written, and ſet down in the ſcriptures, being compared with their uſing of it, evidently doth declare.

Again, if they talk with you of Chriſt's ſacrament inſtituted by him, whether it be Chriſt's body or no: answer them, That as to the eyes of your reaſon, to your taſte, and corporal ſenſe, it is bread and wine, and therefore the ſcripture calleth it ſo, even after conſecration; but to the eyes, taſte and ſenſe of your faith, which aſcendeth into heaven where Chriſt ſitteth, it is in very deed Chriſt's body and blood, which ſpiritually your ſoul feedeth on to everlaſting life, in faith and by faith, even as your body preſently feedeth on the ſacramental bread and ſacramental wine.

By this means, as you ſhall not allow tranſubſtantiation, nor none of their popiſh opinions; ſo ſhall you declare the ſacrament to be a matter of faith, and not of reaſon, as the papiſts make it. For they deny God's omnipotence, in ſaying that Chriſt is not there if bread be there: but faith looketh on the omnipotency of God, joined with his promiſe, and doubteth not but that Chriſt is able to give us what he promiſeth ſpiritually by faith, the bread ſtill remaining in ſubſtance, as well as if the ſubſtance of bread were taken away: for Chriſt ſaith not in any place, this is bread. But in theſe things God will inſtruct you, if you rely on his promiſe, and pray for the power and wiſdom of his Spirit.

In Letter XXXIII. Mr. Bradford exhorts certain godly men, to continue patient in the cross, and constant in the true doctrine, which they had professed.

L E T T E R XXXIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mr. GEORGE EATON.

ALmighty GOD our heavenly Father, recompense abundantly into your bosom, here and eternally, my dearly beloved, the good which from him by you I have continually received since my coming into prison. Other ways can I never be able to requite your loving kindness here, than by praying for you, and after this life by witnessing your faith declared to me by your fruits, when we shall come and appear together before the throne of our Saviour Jesus Christ, whither I thank God I am even now going, always expecting the officers to come and satisfy the precept of the prelates, whereof though I cannot complain, because I have justly deserved an hundred thousand deaths at God's hands by reason of my sins, yet I may and must rejoice, because the prelates do not persecute in me mine iniquities, but Christ Jesus, and his verity.

And because they can do him no hurt, (for he sitteth in heaven, and laugheth them and their devices to scorn, as one day they shall feel) therefore they turn their rage upon his poor sheep, as Herod their father did upon the infants, Matt. ii. Great cause have I therefore to rejoice, that my dear Saviour Christ will vouchsafe, among many, to chuse me to be a vessel of grace to suffer in me, (who have deserved so often and justly to suffer for my sins) that I might be most assured I shall be a vessel of honour, in whom he will be glorified.

As for the doctrine which I have professed and preached, I do confess unto you in writing, as to the whole world I shall shortly by God's grace in suffering, that it is the very true doctrine of Jesus Christ, of his prophets, apostles, and all good men: so that if an angel should come from heaven and preach otherwise, the same were accursed.

Therefore waver not, dear brother in the Lord, but be confirmed in this truth, and as your vocation requireth, when God so will, confess it, though it be dangerous so to do. The end will evidently shew another manner of pleasure for so doing, than tongue can tell. Be diligent in prayer, and watch therein. Reverently read God's word. Set the shortness of this time before your eyes, and let not the eternity that is to come, depart out of your memory. Practise in your life what you learn by reading and hearing. Decline from evil, and pursue good. Remember them that be in bonds, especially for the Lord's cause, as members of your body, and fellow-heirs of grace. Forget not the afflictions of Sion, and the oppression of Jerusalem; and God our Father will give us his continual blessing through Christ our Lord, who guide us as his dear children for ever. Amen.

And thus I take my farewell of you, dear brother, for ever in this present life, till we shall meet in eternal bliss; whither our good God and Father bring us shortly, Amen. God bless all your babes for ever, Amen.

Out of prison the 8th of February.

Your afflicted brother for the cause of Christ,

JOHN BRADFORD.

L E T T E R XXXV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to Mrs. ANNE WARCUP.

ALmighty God our heavenly Father, for his Christ's sake, increase in us faith, by which we may more and more see what glory and honour is reposed and safely kept in heaven, for all them that believe with the heart, and confess Christ and his truth with the mouth, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I remember that, some time ago, I took my leave of you upon conjecture; but now indeed I bid you farewell, upon certain knowledge. My staff standing at the door, I continually look for the sheriff to come for me, and I thank God I am ready for him. Now I go to confirm that which I have preached. Now I am climbing up the hill, it will cause me to puff and blow before I come to the cliff. The hill is steep and high, my breath is short, and my strength is feeble: pray therefore to the Lord for me, that as I have now, through his goodness, come almost to the top, I may by his grace be so strengthened, as not to rest till I come where I should be. O loving Lord, put out thy hand and draw me unto thee: for no man cometh, but he whom the Father draweth. See, my dearly beloved, God's loving mercy: he knoweth my short breath, and my great weakness. As he sent for Elias in a fiery chariot, so sendeth he for me: for by fire my dross must be purified, that I may be fine gold in his sight. O unthankful wretch that I am! Lord, do thou forgive me mine unthankfulness. Indeed I confess that my sins have deserved hell-fire, much more than this fire. But lo, so loving is my Lord, that he converteth the remedy for my sins, the punishment for my transgressions, into a testimonial of his truth, and a testification of his verity, which the prelates do persecute in me; and not my sins: therefore they persecute not me, but Christ in me, who I doubt not will take my part to the very end, Amen.

O that I had so open an heart, as could receive this great benefit and unspeakable dignity as I should, which God my Father offereth to me! Now pray for me, my dearly beloved, pray for me that I never shrink: for he that always hath taken my part, I am sure will not leave me when I have most need for his truth and mercy's sake; O Lord, help me. Into thy hands I commend me wholly. In the Lord is my trust, I care not what man can do unto me, Amen. My dearly beloved, say you Amen also, and come after if God so call you. Be not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, but keep company with him still. Use hearty prayer, reverently read and hear God's word, put it in practice: look for the cross, lift up your hands, for your redemption draweth nigh; know that the death of God's saints is precious in his sight. Be merry in the Lord, pray for mitigation of his heavy displeasure upon our country. God keep us for ever, God bless us with his spiritual blessings in Christ. And thus I bid you farewell for ever in this present life. Pray for me, for God's sake, pray for me. God make perfect his good work begun in me.

Out of prison the 7th of February.

JOHN BRADFORD.

Letter XXXVI. is addressed to a certain gentlewoman, troubled and afflicted by her parents for not coming to mass; wherein he exhorts her, to be steadfast in the true faith; and encourages her to reject the popish religion.

In Letter XXXVII. he returns thanks to those from whom he had received comfort and relief in his imprisonment.

L E T T E R XXXVIII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to a faithful FRIEND and his WIFE, resolving their DOUBT, why they ought not to come to AURICULAR CONFESSION.

FOR auricular confession, wherein you desire my advice, my dear brother, I am as ready to give it, as you are to desire it; yea more ready, for

I had half a suspicion that you and your wife (especially your wife) were tired of my advice, as if I had given too much; whereas indeed I should lament my too little care in feeding you spiritually, since you have spared no pains, both in prison and out of prison, to feed me corporally.

Auricular confession, as it was first used and instituted (which was by way of asking counsel) I take to be amongst these traditions which are in themselves indifferent, that is, it may be done, or it may be left undone, unless it giveth offence to the weak brethren, and then it ought to be avoided, for we learn by St. Paul that things may be lawful that are not at all times expedient. But to consider it, as it is now used, (I write to you as I think, and what my own mind is; which follow no further than good men by God's word do allow) to consider it, I say, as it is now used, methinks it is plainly unlawful and wicked, and that for these causes.

First, Because they make it a service of God, and a thing which pleaseth God of itself, not to say meritorious; my brother, the bearer, can tell you at large how great an evil this is.

Secondly, Because they make it of necessity, so that he or she that useth it not, is not taken for a good christian.

Thirdly, Because it requireth of itself an impossibility, that is, the numbering and telling of all our sins, which no man can conceive, much less utter.

Fourthly, Because it establisheth and confirmeth, at least alloweth, praying to saints. Precor Sanctam Mariam, you must say, or the priest for you.

Fifthly, Because it is very injurious to the liberty of the gospel, which to affirm in example and fact, I take to be a good work, and dear in the sight of God.

Sixthly, Because (as it is used) it is a note, yea, a very sinew of the popish church; and therefore we should be so far from allowing the same, that we should think ourselves happy to lose any thing in bearing witness against it.

Seventhly, Because instead of counsel, thereat ye shall receive poison, or if you refuse it under Sir John's Benedicite, you shall no less there be wound in the briars.

Eighthly, Because the end and purpose of your going thither is to avoid the cross, that is, for our own cause, and not for Christ's cause or the edification of our brethren. For in that they make it so necessary a thing, and a worshipping of God, it cannot but be against Christ and the freedom of his gospel: and the same thing teacheth us, that it is disadvantageous to our brethren, who either be weak, or strong, or ignorant, or obstinate. If they be weak, by your resorting to it, they be made more weak: if they be strong, you do what you can to decrease their strength: if they be ignorant, thereby you help to keep them so: if they be obstinate, your resorting to it cannot but rock them to sleep in their obstinate error of the necessity of this rite and ceremony.

Letter XXXIX. is from Mr. Bradford, to Mr. Augustine Barriner; in which he begs him to learn what is said of him; and expatiates upon the great probability, of his being soon burnt in Smithfield.

LETTER XL.

From Mr. BRADFORD, describing a Comparison between the OLD MAN and the NEW, &c.

A Man that is regenerate and born of God, (which that every one of us be, our baptism, the sacrament of regeneration, doth require under pain of damnation, and therefore let every one of us say with the Virgin Mary, "Be it unto me, O Lord, according to thy word," according to the sacrament of baptism, wherein thou hast declared our adoption; and let us lament the doubting hereof in us, striving against it as we shall be made able by the Lord) a man, I say, that is regenerate, consisteth of two men, (as one may say) namely of the old man and of the new man. The old man is like to a mighty giant, such a one as was Goliath, for his birth is now perfect. But the new man is like to a little child, such a one as was David, for his birth is not perfect until the day of the general resurrection.

Betwixt these two men there is a continual conflict and a deadly war. The flesh and old man, by reason of his birth being perfect, doth often for a time prevail against the new man, (being but a child in comparison) and that in such a manner, that even the children of God themselves think that they be nothing else but old, and that the spirit and seed of God is lost and gone away; when yet notwithstanding the truth is otherwise, the Spirit and the seed of God at length appearing again, and dispelling the clouds which cover the sun; so that sometimes a man cannot tell by any sense, that there is any sun, the clouds and wind do so hide it from our sight: even so our blindness and corrupt affections do often shadow the sight of God's seed in his children, as though they were downright reprobates. Whereof it cometh that they praying according to their sense, but not according to the truth, desire of God to give them again his Spirit, as though they had lost it, and he had taken it away. Which thing God never doth indeed, although he maketh us to think so for a time; for he always holdeth his hand under his children in their falls, that they lie not still as others do which are not regenerate.

This our inheritor Christ Jesus, God with God, Light of Light, co-eternal and co-substantial with the Father, and with the Holy Ghost, to the end that he might become our husband, (because the husband and the wife must be one body and flesh) hath taken our nature upon him, communicating with it and by it in his own person, to us all his children, his divine majesty, (as St. Peter saith) and so is become flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bones substantially; as we are become flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones spiritually, all that ever we have pertaining to him, yea even our sins; as all that ever he hath pertaineth unto us, even his whole glory. So that if Satan should summon us to answer for our debts or sins, in that the wife is no sueable person, but the husband, we may well bid him enter his action against our husband Christ, and he will make him a sufficient answer.

LETTER XLI.

Mr. BRADFORD's FAREWELL to his MOTHER, when he thought he should have suffered shortly after.

IF I thought that daily, yea almost hourly you did not cry upon God the Father through Jesus Christ, that he would give me his blessing, even the blessing of his children, then would I write more about it. But forasmuch as I am certain you are diligent herein, so I beseech you, good mother, to continue; I think it good to write something, whereby this your crying might be furthered. Furthered it will be, if those things which hinder it be taken away. Among which, in that I think my imprisonment is the greatest and chiefest, I will spend this letter about it, and that briefly, lest it might increase the hindrance, as my good brother, this messenger can tell you. You shall know therefore good mother, that for my body, though it be in an house, out of which I cannot come when I will, yet in that I have confirmed my will to God's, I find herein liberty enough, I thank God. And for my lodging, bedding, meat, drink, pious and learned company, books, and all other necessities for mine ease, comfort, and convenience, I am in much better case than I could wish, and God's merciful providence here is far above my worthiness. Worthiness, said I? Alas, I am worthy of nothing but damnation.

But all this, for my soul I find to my advantage. For God is my Father, I now perceive, through Christ; therefore therefore for imprisoning me for his gospel, he maketh me like to the image of his Son Jesus Christ here, that when he cometh to judgment, I might then be like unto him, as my trust and hope is I shall be. Now he maketh me like to his friends the prophets, apostles, the holy martyrs, and confessors. Which of them did not suffer at the least imprisonment or banishment for his gospel and word?

Now, mother, how far am I unworthy to be compared to them? I (I say) which always have been, and am so vile an hypocrite and grievous sinner. God might have caused me long before this time to have been cast into prison as a thief, a blasphemer, an unclean liver, and an heinous offender of the laws of the realm; but dear mother, his mercy is so great upon you and all that love me, that I should be cast into prison for none of these or for any such vices, but only for Christ's sake, for his gospel's sake, for his church's sake, that thereby as I might learn to lament and bewail my ingratitude and sins, so I might rejoice in his mercy, be thankful, look for eternal joy with Christ, for whose sake, praised be his name for it, I now suffer, and therefore should be merry and glad. And indeed, good mother, so I am, as ever I was, yea never so merry and glad was I, as now I should be, if I could get you to be merry with me, to thank God for me and to pray on this sort: "Ah, good Father, who dost vouchsafe that my son, being a grievous sinner in thy sight, should find this favour with thee, to be one of thy Son's captains and men of war no fight and suffer for his gospel's sake, I thank thee, and pray thee, in Christ's name, that thou wouldst forgive him his sins and unthankfulness, and make perfect in him that good which thou hast begun; yea, Lord, I pray thee make him worthy to suffer not only imprisonment, but even death itself, for thy truth, religion, and gospel's sake. As Anna did apply and give her first child Samuel unto thee, so I, dear Father, beseech thee, for Christ's sake, to accept this my gift, and give my son John Bradford, grace always truly to serve thee and thy people, as Samuel did, Amen, Amen."

Now therefore will I make an end, desiring you to expect no more letters: for if it were known that I had pen and ink, then should I want all other conveniences I have mentioned concerning my body, and be cast into some dungeon in fetters of iron: which thing I know would grieve you, and therefore for God's sake, see that these be burned, when this little prayer in it is copied by my brother Roger: it may be your house may be searched for such things, whereto you little think of it; and look for no more, sweet mother, till either God shall deliver me, and send me out, or till you and I meet together in heaven, where we shall never part asunder, Amen.

LETTER XLII.

From Mr. BRADFORD to his MOTHER, being his last Farewell, a little before he was BURNED.

GOD's mercy and peace in Christ, be more and more perceived of us, Amen.

My most dear mother, in the bowels of Christ I heartily pray and beseech you to be thankful for me unto God, who now taketh me unto himself: I die not as a criminal, but a witness of Christ, the truth of whose gospel I have hitherto confessed, I thank God, both by preaching and imprisonment, and now I am willing to confirm the same by fire. I acknowledge that God might justly have taken me hence from my sins, (which are many, great, and grievous; but the Lord for his mercy in Christ, I hope hath pardoned them all) but now, my dear mother, he taketh me hence by this death, as a confessor and witness, that the religion taught by Christ Jesus, the prophets and the apostles, is God's truth. The prelates in me do persecute Christ, whom they hate, and his truth which they will not abide, because their works are evil. They do not care for the light, lest men thereby should discover their darkness. Therefore my dear mother, give thanks to God for me, that he hath made the fruits of thy womb to be a witness of his glory, and attend to the truth, which I have truly taught out of the pulpit of Manchester. Use often and continual prayer to God the Father, through Jesus Christ. Harken to the scriptures, and serve God according to them, and not according to the custom: beware of the Romish religion in England; defile not yourself with it: carry the cross of Christ as he shall lay it upon your back: forgive them that kill me: pray for them, for they know not what they do: commit my cause to God our Father: be mindful of both your daughters, and help them as well as you can.

I send all my writings to you and my brother Roger, do with them as you will, because I cannot as I would, he can tell you more of my mind. I have nothing to give you, or to leave behind me for you; only I pray God my Father, for Christ's sake, to bless you, and to keep you from all evil. May he make you patient, and thankful that he will take the fruit of your womb to witness his truth; wherein I confess to the whole world, I die, and depart this life, in hope of a much better: which I look for at the hands of God my Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus Christ.

Thus my dear mother, I take my last farewell of you in this life, beseeching the Almighty and eternal Father by Christ, to grant us to meet in the life to come, where we shall give him continual thanks and praise for ever and ever, Amen.

Out of prison, June 24, 1555. Your son in the Lord,
JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XLIII.

Containing a SUPPLICATION sent by Mr. BRADFORD to QUEEN MARY, her COUNCIL, and the whole PARLIAMENT.

IN most humble wise complaineth unto your majesty and honours, a poor subject, persecuted for the confession of Christ's verity: which deserveth your protection and encouragement, as the thing by which you reign and have your honour and authority. Although we that be professors, through the grace of God, the constant professors of the same, are, as it were, the out-sweepings of the world; yet I say, the truth itself is not a thing unworthy for your ears to hear, for your eyes to see, and for your hands to handle, help, and succour, as the Lord hath made you able, and placed you where you are for the same purpose. Your highness and honours ought to know, that there is no innocency in words or deeds, where it is enough and sufficient only to accuse. It behoveth kings, queens, and all that be in authority, to know, that in the administration of their kingdoms they are God's ministers. It behoveth them to know, that they are not kings, but plain tyrants, who reign not to this end, that they may serve and set forth God's glory after true knowledge; and therefore it is required of them that they would be wise, and suffer themselves to kiss their Sovereign lest they perish; as all those potentates, with their principalities and dominions, cannot long prosper, but perish indeed, if they and their kingdoms be not ruled with the sceptre of God, that is, with his word; which whoso honoureth not, honoureth not God, and they that honour not the Lord, the Lord will not honour them, but bring them into contempt, and at length take his own cause, which he hath chiefly committed to them to care for, into his own hands, and so overthrow them, and set up his own truth gloriously; the people also perishing with the princes, where the word of prophecy is wanting, much more is suppressed; as it is now in this realm of England, over which the eyes of the Lord are set to destroy it, your highness, and all your honours, if in time you look not better to your office and duties herein, and not suffer yourselves to be slaves and hangmen to Antichrist and his prelates, who have already brought your highness and honours in the mind to let Barabbas loose, and so hang up Christ: as by the grace and help of God I shall make apparent, if first it would please your excellent majesty, and all your honours, to take to heart God's doctrine, which rather through the malice of the Pharisees, I mean the bishops and prelates, than your consciences, is oppressed; and not for our contemptible and execrable state in the world to pass the less of it. For this doctrine is higher, and of more honour and majesty than all the whole world. It standeth invincible above all power, being not our doctrine, but the doctrine of the ever-living God, and of his Christ, whom the Father hath ordained King, to have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the world. And truly so he doth and will reign, that he will shake all the earth with his iron and brazen power, with his golden and silver brightness, only by the rod of his mouth, to shivers, in such a manner as though they were pots of clay, according to what the prophets write of the magnificence of his kingdom. And thus much for the doctrine, and your duties to hearken, to propagate, and defend the same.

But now will our adversaries mainly cry out against us, because no man may be admitted once to speak against them, that we pretend falsely the doctrine and word of God, calling us the most wicked contemners of it, and heretics, schismatics, traitors, &c. All which their sayings, how malicious and false they are, though I might refer to that which is written by those men whose works they have condemned, and all that retain any of them, publicly by proclamation; yet here will I occasion your majesty and honours by this my writing, to see that it is far otherwise than they report of us. God our father, for his holy name's sake, direct my pen to be his instrument to put into your eyes, ears and hearts, that which most may make to his glory, in the safe-guard of your souls and bodies, and preservation of the whole realm, Amen.

JOHN BRADFORD.

LETTER XLIV.

From Mr. BRADFORD to certain of his FRIENDS, N. S. and R. C.

I Wish to you, my good brethren, the same grace of God in Christ, which I pray the Father of mercies to give me for his holy name's sake, Amen.

Your letter, though I have not read myself, because I would not alienate my mind from conceived things, to write to others, yet I have heard the sum of it, that it is of God's election; wherein I will briefly write to you my faith, and how I think it good and meet for a christian man to wade in it.

I believe, that man, made after the image of God, did fall from that blessed state to the condemnation of himself, and all his posterity. I believe that Christ

(for man being thus fallen) did oppose himself to the justice of God, a mediator, paying the ransom and price of redemption for Adam and his whole posterity that refuse it not finally. I believe, that all who believe in Christ, (I speak of such as be of years of discretion) are partakers of Christ and all his merits. I believe that faith, and to believe in Christ (I speak not now of faith that men have by reason of miracles, John ii. 11. Acts viii. or by reason of earthly conveniences, Matth. xiii. custom and authority of men, which is commonly seen, the hearts of them that so believe, being not right and simple before God; but I speak of that faith which indeed is the true faith, the justifying and regenerating faith) I believe, I say, that this faith and belief in Christ, is the work and gift of God, given to none but those who are the children of God, that is, to those whom God the Father before the beginning of the world hath predestinated in Christ to eternal life.

Thus do I wade in predestination, in such a manner as he hath opened it. Though in God it be the first, yet to us it is the last opened. And therefore I begin with creation, from whence I come to redemption, so on to justification, and then to election. On this manner I am sure, that warily and wisely a man may walk in it easily by the light of God's Spirit, in and by his word, seeing this faith not to be given to all men, 2. Thess. iii. but to such as are born of God, predestinate before the world was made, after the purpose and good will of God, which will we must not call in question, but in fear and trembling submit ourselves to it, as to that which can will nothing otherwise than what is holy, just, and good, how far soever it may seem otherwise to our reason, which must needs be beaten down to be more careful for God's glory, than for man's salvation, which dependeth only thereon, as all God's children shall well see; for they seek not the glory which cometh of men, but the glory which cometh of God, Jer. ix. John v. They know God to be a God which doth on earth, not only mercy, but also judgment, which is his justice, and most just, although our foolish reason cannot see it. And in this knowledge they glory and rejoice, though others, through vain curiosity, grudge and murmur against it. Thus briefly I have sent you my mind and meaning concerning this matter. Hereafter you shall have (I think) your letter particularly answered by Mr. Philpot; as also, if I have time, and you so require, I will do.

JOHN BRADFORD.

Besides these letters, there were others to father Traves, minister of Blackley, long before he came into trouble, the substance of which being fully contained in the foregoing extracts, we think proper to omit. A now we proceed with the history of the martyrs.

CHAP. XI.

An ACCOUNT of the LIVES, EXAMINATIONS, SUFFERINGS, and DEATHS of various PIOUS PROTESTANTS, most of whom were BURNED, and some DIED in PRISON, during the BLOODY PERSECUTION in the REIGN of QUEEN MARY I. A. D. 1555.

A short ACCOUNT of WILLIAM MINGE, who died in PRISON.

THE next day after Mr. Bradford and John Leaf suffered in Smithfield, William Minge, priest, died in Prison at Maidstone, being there in bonds for religion, and would (had he lived a little longer) also have suffered the fury of his adversaries, whose nature was to spare and favour none that favoured Christ's pure gospel. This William Minge, with as great constancy and boldness yielded up his life in prison, as if it had pleased God to have called him to suffer by fire, as other good and godly men had done before at the stake, as himself was ready to do, had it pleased God to have called him thereunto.

An ACCOUNT of JAMES TREVISAM, who was buried in MOORFIELDS.

UPON Sunday the 3d of July, 1555, died one James Trevisam, in the parish of St. Margaret, in Lothbury, who being impotent and lame, kept his bed a long time. This Trevisam had a servant named John Small, who was reading in the bible, when one Berd, the promoter came to the house, and would needs go up stairs, where he found four persons besides him and his wife; to wit, the young man that read, and two men and a woman. All whom the said Berd apprehended and carried to the Compter, where they remained about a fortnight, notwithstanding all the friends they could make. Not only so, but the said Berd intended to carry the poor lame bedridden man to Newgate gate in a cart, (and brought a cart to the door for that purpose) had not the neighbour, who had a little more humanity, prevented that barbarous design. Nevertheless, the poor man was obliged to have two sureties for his forth coming, notwithstanding he could not get out of his bed, being not only lame, but very sick at the same time. In a few days time he grew so ill, that his life was despaired of; and the parson of the parish, one Mr. Farthing, came to visit him, and had communication with him, and they both agreed very well in matters of religion, and so the parson departed. No sooner was he come down into the street, but he was met by one Toller, a founder, who threatened to accuse him, for agreeing with Trevisam; for, said the founder, he denieth the sacrament of the altar. Upon that the parson went to him again, and then they could not agree. And so the parson went to the bishop of London, and told him. The bishop answered, that he should be burnt: and if he were already dead, he should be buried in a ditch. And when he was dead, the parson shewed as much spite and ill-nature to his poor sorrowful widow as possibly he could, not suffering her to put him in a coffin, or any thing else, but insisted on carrying him on a table to Moorfields, and there he was buried. The same night the body was taken up again, and the sheet taken from him, and he left naked above ground. The owner of the field seeing this, buried him again; a fortnight after, the sumner came to his grave, and summoned him to appear at St. Paul's before his ordinary, to answer to such things as should be laid against him. But what became of this affair afterwards, I cannot certainly say.

The HISTORY of Mr. JOHN BLAND, PREACHER and MARTYR.

THE 12th day of July, John Bland, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphry Middleton, were all four burnt at Canterbury together for one cause. Of which number, Frankesh and Bland were ministers and preachers of the word of God, the one being parson of Adesham, and the other vicar of Rolvinton. Mr. Bland was a man so little born for his own advantage, that no part of his life was separated from the common and public utility of all men. For his first doings were then employed to the bringing up of children in learning and virtue. Under whom were trained up several hopeful young men, which afterwards did handsomely flourish. In which number was Dr. Sands, a man of singular learning and worthiness, as may well become a scholar for such a schoolmaster, whom I gladly here name for his singular gifts of virtue and erudition.

After this, he coming to the ministry in the church of God, or rather being called thereto, was inflamed with incredible desire to profit the congregation, which may appear by this, that whereas he was twice cast into Canterbury prison for preaching of the gospel, and delivered once or twice from thence at the intercession of his friends, yet he would preach the gospel again, as soon as he was delivered. Whereupon he being the third time apprehended, when his friends yet once again would have found means to have delivered him if he would promise to abstain from preaching; he stood in it earnestly, that he would admit no such condition, notably well expressing unto us the manner and example which we read in the apostle St. Paul; "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Tribulation, or anguish, or hunger, or nakedness, or persecution, or the sword?" &c. But to express the whole life and actions of this pious martyr, seeing we have his own testimony concerning the same, it is best to refer the reader to his own report, writing to his father the whole discourse of his troubles, from the beginning almost to the latter end, in order and manner as you shall hear.

An ACCOUNT of the whole Proceedings against Mr. BLAND, written by himself to his FATHER.

DEARLY beloved father in Christ Jesus, I thank you for your gentle letters. And to satisfy your mind as concerning the troubles whereof you have heard, these shall both declare unto you all my vexations that have happened unto me since you were with me, and also since I received your last letters. God keep you ever.

Your son,
JOHN BLAND.

FIRST, The 3d of September, being Sunday, after service ended, ere I had put off my surplice, John Austen came to the table, (commonly called the Lord's table) and laid both his hands upon it, saying, Who set this here again? Now they say they took the table down the Sunday before, which I knew not, neither do I know who set it up again. The clerk answered that he knew not. Then said Austen, he is a knave, that set it here. I was then going down the church, wondering what he meant, and said, Goodman Austen, the queen's highness hath set forth a proclamation that you move no sedition: and before I could speak any more, he said, Thou art a knave: and I said, Well, goodman Austen, what I have said, I have said. By God's soul, said he, Thou art a very knave. Then my clerk spoke to him, but what I am not sure. But he said, You are both heretic knaves, and have deceived us too long already, and if you say any service here again, I will turn your table upside down; and in that rage he, with others, took the table and laid it on a chest in the chancel, and set the tressels by it. Soon after I rode to Mr. Isaac, and declared unto him how seditiously Austen had behaved himself. Mr. Isaac directed a warrant to the constable, which was immediately served, so that he was brought before him the same night, and was bound by recognizance, with sureties, to appear if he were called. But then we agreed so well, that it was never called for: the table was brought down, and was permitted as before.

The 26th of November, being Sunday, Richard Austen and his brother Thomas came to the aforesaid table after the communion was done, and as I was going by them, Richard said unto me, Mr. Parson, we want to speak with you. And I said, What is your will? And he said, You know that you took down the tabernacle wherein the rood did hang, and such other things: we would know what recompence you would make us: for the queen's proceedings are (as you know) that such things must be put up again.

Said I, I know no such proceedings as yet; and as for what I did, I did it by commandment.

No, said Thomas Austen, you will not know the queen's proceedings.

Yes, said I, I refuse not to know them.

Then, said Richard, You are against the queen's proceedings; for you say there are abominable uses and devilishness in the mass.

Goodman Austen, said I, if I so said, I will say it again, and God willing, stand to the proof of it.

Masters all, said Richard Austen, bear record of these words, and went his way.

Said Thomas Austen, Thou wilt as soon eat this book as stand to them.

No, said I, not so soon.

Tell us, said he, what devilishness is in the mass?

I have often preached it unto you, said I, and you have not believed it, nor borne it away, neither will you now, though I should tell you.

Thou (said he) hast told us always like an heretic as thou art. Now you lie, goodman Austen, said I, by your leave. Marry, said he, thou liest. And I said, And you lie, for I have taught you Christ and his truth.

Said he, Thou art an heretic, and hast taught us nothing but heresy: for thou canst say nothing that is true.

Yes, goodman Austen, I can say that God is in heaven, and you will say (I hope) that it is true, and so have I taught you truly.

Said he, thou hast taught us like an heretic, and hast said, that there is no devil in hell.

Well, said I, lie on; methinks you can say little truth.

truth. Many other taunts he gave, too long to write. And at last he said, You pulled down the altar, will you build it again? No, said I, except I be commanded; for I was commanded to do that I did.

Well, if you will not, said he, then will I. For I am churchwarden.

I charge you, said I, that you do not, except you have authority. I will not, said he, be hindered by your charge. For we will have a mass here on Sunday, and a preacher that shall prove thee an heretic, if thou dare abide his coming.

Yes, said I, God willing, I will abide and hear him; for sure I am, that he cannot disprove any doctrine that I have peached.

Yes, said he, and that thou shalt hear, if thou run not away ere then.

No, Mr. Austen, I will not run away.

Marry, said he, I cannot tell; thou art as like as not; with many more words we came out of the church, and so departed.

When Sunday came I looked for our preacher, and at the time of morning prayer I said to the clerk, Why do you not ring? You forget that we shall have a sermon to-day. No, said he, Mr. Miles's servant hath been here this morning, and said, his master hath letters from my lord chancellor, that he must go to London, and cannot come. That day I preached a sermon in his stead. Now have they slandered me, that I prepared a company from divers places to have troubled him; but they agreed not in their lie. For some said, I had them at Adesham, and that Richard Austen had knowledge, and sent for the constable to see the peace kept, which is found a lie. Others said, I had them from Canterbury and Adesham. Others said, I had them in both places, that if the one missed, the other should not. God forgive them all. Now upon these two matters they boast that they sent two bills of complaint to the council. Wherefore by the advice of friends, I made this testimony, and sent it up by Mr. Wiseman.

The BEHAVIOUR of Mr. JOHN BLAND, Parson of ADESHAM, in the COUNTY of KENT, on Sunday the 3d Day of December last, containing the WORDS which he spake there unto the PEOPLE.

WHEREAS upon certain communication had between the said parson and Richard Austen, and Thomas Austen, in the presence of all the parish of Adesham, the Sunday before St. Andrew's day last, the said Austen then declared, That the said parson had taught there in times past great heresies, which to confound, they would prepare a preacher against the next Sunday following, if so be the said parson would abide, and not run away: upon which rumour, divers persons resorted out of the country, unto the said parish church, at the day appointed, there to hear the preacher; and at the time in which the sermon ought to be made, no man appeared there to preach; but it was reported to the parson that the preacher appointed, had urgent business and could not come. So that the multitude being now come together, the same parson perceiving that the people's expectation was defrauded, said, Forasmuch as you are willingly come to hear some good advertisement of the preacher, who cannot be now present, I think it not convenient to let you depart without some exhortation for your edification. And further declaring that he had no licence to preach, said, That he would not meddle with any matter in controversy. And then he began the epistle for the day, desiring the audience to mark three or four places in the said epistle, which touched of quietness and love to one another: and there briefly reading the epistle, he noted the same places, and so making an end thereof, desired all men to depart quietly and in peace, as they did, without any manner of disturbance, or token of evil.

Another MATTER of TROUBLE wrought against Mr. JOHN BLAND, as appeareth by his own Narration.

UPON Innocents day, being the 28th of December, they had procured the priest of Stodmarsh to say mass: he had nigh made an end of mattins ere I came; and when he had ended them, he said to me, Mr. Parson, your neighbours have desired me to say mattins and mass; I hope you will not be against the queen's proceedings. No (said I) I will offend none of her majesty's laws, God willing. What say you? quoth he, and made as though he had not heard. Then I spake the same words to him again with an higher voice; but he would not hear, though all the rest in the chancel heard: I spoke so loud the third time, that all the church might hear, That I would not offend the queen's laws, and then he went to mass; and when he was reading the epistle, I called the clerk unto me, with the beckoning of my finger, and said unto him, I pray you desire the priest, when the gospel is done, to tarry a little, I have something to say to the people; and the clerk did so.

And the priest came down into the stall where he sat; and I stood up in the chancel door, and spake to the people of the great goodness of God always shewed unto his people, unto the time of Christ's coming; and in him and his coming, what benefit they past, we present, and our successors have; and among other benefits I spake of the great and comfortable sacrament of his body and blood. And after I had briefly declared the institution, the promise of life to the good, and damnation to the wicked, I spake of the bread and wine, affirming them to be bread and wine after the consecration, as yonder mass book, saying, Holy bread of eternal life, and the cup of perpetual salvation. So that like as our bodily mouths eat the sacramental bread and wine, so doth the mouth of our souls (which is our faith) eat Christ's flesh and blood. And when I had made an end of that, I spake of the misuse of the sacrament in the mass; so that I judged it in that use no sacrament, and shewed how Christ bade us all eat and drink; and in the mass one only eateth and drinketh, and the rest kneel, knock, and worship: and after these things ended, as briefly as I could, I spake of the benefactors of the mass, and began to declare who made the mass, and recited every man's name, and the patch that he put on the mass; but before I had rehearsed them all, the churchwarden and the constable his son-in-law, violently came upon me, and took my book from me, and pulled me down, and thrust me into the chancel, with an exceeding roar and cry. Some cried, Thou heretic; some, Thou traitor; some, Thou rebel; and when every man had said his pleasure, and the rage was somewhat past, Be quiet, good neighbours, said I, and let me speak to you quietly. If I have offended any law, I will make answer before them that are in authority to correct me. But they would not hear me, and pulled me, one on this side, and another on that, and began again. Then Richard Austen said, Peace masters, no more till mass be done, and they ceased. Then I said to the churchwarden and constable, each holding me by the arm: Masters, let me go into the church-yard till your mass be done. No, said the churchwarden, thou shalt tarry here till mass be done. I will not, said I, but against my will. And they said, Thou shalt tarry, for if thou go out thou wilt run away. Then I said to the constable, lay me in the stocks, and then you will be sure of me, and turned my back to the altar. By that time Richard Austen had devised what to do with me, and called to the constable and the churchwarden, and bade them put me into a side chapel, and shut the door on me, and there they made me tarry till mass was ended. When the mass was ended, they came into the chapel to me, and searched what I had about me; and found a dagger, and took it from me. Then said Thomas Austen, churchwarden, after many brabblings that they made with me, Thou keepst a wife here amongst us, against God's law and the queen's. You lye, Goodman Austen, said I, it is not against God's law, nor as I suppose, against the queen's. Thus they brought me out of the church, and without the door they railed on me me without pity or mercy; but anon the priest came out of the church, and Ramsey, that of late was clerk, said unto him, Sir, where dwell you? And therefore Thomas Austen took him by the arm, and said, Come on, firrah, you are of his opinion, and took his dagger from him, and said, he should go with him. I am content, said he, and a little mocked them in their envious talk. By this time John Gray of Wingham, servant to John Smith, came in at the church stile, and seeing them hold Ramsey by the arms, said to him, How now Ramsey, have you offended the queen's laws? No, said he. Then there is no transgression. Therewith Thomas Austen took him, and said, You are one of their opinions, you shall go with them for company, and took his dagger from him, and then demanded what he did there? But after (I think) for very shame they let him go again. But they carried me and Ramsey to Canterbury, guarded by eighteen persons. A sheet of paper would not contain the talk that we had that night with Mr. Hardes, justice, Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Spilman, and Mr. Tutsam.

The next day they made a bill against me, but it served not their purpose, which was, that they would have had me to prison. But James Chapman, and Bartholomew Joyes, were bound in twenty pounds each of them for my appearance at the next general sessions, or in the mean time to appear, if I were sent for before the queen's majesty's council, or any other commissioners sent by the queen's authority. And Ramsey was bound to the peace, and to be of good behaviour till the next sessions. His sureties were Thomas Hokeking, and Simon Barrat.

Now on the 23d or 24th of February Sir Thomas Finch, knight, and Mr. Hardes, sent for me and my sureties to Mr. Finch's place, and took me from my sureties, and sent me to the castle of Canterbury, by Sir Thomas Moyles's order, as they said, where I lay ten weeks, and then was bailed, and bound to appear at the next sessions holden at Canterbury: but after, they changed it to be at Ashford on Thursday in Whitsun-week, being the nineteenth of May: but in the mean time the matter was exhibited to the spiritual court.

The First EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN BLAND in the Spiritual Court, before Dr. HARPSFIELD, ARCHDEACON of CANTERBURY, and Mr. COLLINS, COMMISSARY.

THE 18th day of May, Mr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of Canterbury, obliged the mayor's serjeant to bring me before him and Mr. Collins, commissary, into Christ's church, and they took me into a chamber in the suffragan of Dover's house.

Then the archdeacon said, Art thou a priest? And I said, I was one. And he said, Art thou a graduate of any university? and I said, Yea. What degree, said he, hast thou taken? The degree, said I, of Master of Arts. The more pity, replied he, that thou shouldst behave thyself as thou hast done. Thou hast been a common-licensed preacher, hast thou not? and I said, I have been so. Mary, said he, so I understand.

Harpsfield. What hast thou preached?

Bland. God's word, to the edifying of his people.

Harpsfield. No; no, to the destruction both of thy soul and their's too, if the mercy of God be not speedily extended towards you. I pray thee tell me what thou hast preached?

Bland. I told you already what I have preached.

Harpsfield. Nay, but tell me what one matter hast thou preached to the edifying of the people, as thou sayest?

Bland. I will tell you no particular matter: for I perceive you would have some matter against me.

Harpsfield. No, by my faith, I only desire to win thee from the heresies thou art bewrapt in, and hast infected others withal. For thou hast preached, as I am informed, that the blessed sacrament of the altar is not the real body and blood of Christ after the consecration. Tell me, hast thou not thus preached? and is not this thy opinion?

Bland. Sir, I perceive, as I said before, that you seek some matter against me. But seeing that I am bound in the sessions to my good behaviour for preaching, which may be broken with words, and well I know not with what words, and also both mine authority to preach, and my living taken from me, I think I am not bound to make you an answer.

Collins. Mr. Bland, do you not remember, that Sr. Peter biddeth you make answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the faith that is in you?

Bland. I know that, and I am content so to answer as that text biddeth: but I know that Mr. Archdeacon did not ask me after that manner, but rather to bring me into trouble. Then they said, No, you shall not be troubled for any thing that you say here.

Bland. I am content for knowledge sake to commune with you in any matter, but not otherwise. And so they fell to reasoning for the space of an hour, of the sacrament, both against me. At last Mr. Collins said, Mr. Bland, will you come and take in hand to answer such matters on Monday next as shall be laid to you?

Bland. Sir, you said I should not be troubled for any thing that should be said here for learning's sake. And they said, You shall not, but it is for other matters.

Bland. Sir, I am bound to appear, as some tell me, on Thursday next at Ashford, I am in doubt whether I can or no: yet have I purposed to be there, and so to go to London to Mr. Wiseman, for an obligation that he hath, whereby I should receive some money to pay my debts withal. Then said Mr. Archdeacon, I will write to Mr. Wiseman, that you shall sustain no loss.

Bland. That shall not need: for I can sustain no great loss if I go not. But I pray you let me have a longer day. No, said he.

Bland. Sir, I cannot well come on Monday.

Harpsfield. Wilt thou not come when he so gently speaketh to thee, where he may command thee?

Bland. I do not deny to come, but I desire a longer day.

Harpsfield. Thou shalt have no other day: I charge thee to come on Monday.

Bland. Sir, I perceive it shall be for this or like matters: will it please you, or Mr. Collins, for God's sake, to confer scriptures privately with me in this manner, seeing you say you would so gladly win me.

Harpsfield. With all my heart will I take the pains, and I will also borrow my lord of Dover's library, to have what book thou wilt: and thus they departed. Now the 17th of May at Ashford I could not be released, although I was called to the Spiritual Court for that purpose, but was bound to appear at the sessions held at Cranbroke the third of July.

Another APPEARANCE of Mr. BLAND, before the ARCHDEACON and his FELLOWS:

ON the 21st of May I appeared in the chapter-house, where was a great multitude of people, unlooked for by me, and Mr. Archdeacon said thus to me: You are come here according as you were appointed; and the cause is, that it hath pleased the queen's highness here to place me, to see God's holy word set forth, and to reform those that are here fallen into great and heinous errors, to the great displeasure of God, and the decay of Christ's sacraments, and contrary to the faith of the catholic church, whereof thou art notably known to be one that is sore poisoned with the same, and hast infected and deceived many with thy evil preaching; which if thou wilt renounce, and come home again to the catholic church, both I and many others would be very glad: and I for my part shall be right glad to shew you the favour that lieth in me, as I said unto you when you were appointed hither, because you then refused to satisfy again the people that you had deceived. And whereas it is feigned by you, that I should openly dispute the matter with you this day; although I did neither so intend nor appoint, yet I am content to dispute the matter with thee, if thou wilt not without disputation help to heal the souls that are brought hellward by thee. What sayest thou?

Bland. I do protest before God and you all, that neither is my conscience guilty of any error or heresy, neither neither that I ever taught any error or heresy willingly. And where your mastership faith, That I have feigned an open disputation with you, it is not true, as I can thus prove: Upon Saturday I was at Ugden's, and there Mr. Bingham laid it to my charge, that such an open disputation, as you have here offered, should be this day between you and me. Whereat I much marvelled, and said to him, that before that present I never heard any such word; neither would I answer nor dispute: And Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Oxendon, Mr. Seth, of Overland, and Mr. Uxden can witness to this; and further I said to them, that I never spake to you of any disputation, nor you to me. Now if your mastership have any thing to say to me by the law, I will make answer to it.

Harpsfield. Hear ye what he saith? His conscience is clear. I pray thee, whereon groundest thou thy conscience? Let me hear what thy faith is.

Bland. I know not why you should ask me a reason of my faith, more than any other man in this open audience.

Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, art thou ashamed of thy faith? If it were a christian belief, thou needest not be ashamed of it.

Bland. I am not ashamed of my faith. For I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord, &c. with all the other articles of the creed; and I do believe all the holy scriptures of God to be most certain and true.

Harpsfield. Wilt thou declare no more than this?

Bland. No.

Harpsfield. Well, I will tell thee whereon I ground my faith: I do believe and ground my faith and conscience upon all the articles of the creed, and upon all the holy scriptures, sacraments, and holy doctors of the church, and upon all the general councils that ever were since the apostles time. Lo, herupon ground I my faith; with many more words which I do not well remember.

And when he could get no other answer from me, than what I had said before, he called for a scribe to make an act against me. And after much communication, I said, By what law and authority will you proceed against me? Mr. Collins said, By the canon law.

Bland. I doubt whether it be in strength or no. Yet I pray you let me have a counsellor in the law, and I will make answer according to the law.

Harpsfield. Why, thou heretic, thou wilt not confess thy faith to me, that have authority to demand it of thee; and yet I have confessed my faith to thee before all this audience. As concerning the blessed sacrament of the altar, thou hast taught, that after the consecration it is bread and wine, and not the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. How sayest thou, hast thou not thus taught?

Bland. Sir, as concerning this matter of the sacrament, when I was with you and Mr. Collins, you said then it was for other matters that I should come hither: and further, that you would be content at my desire, to confer scriptures with me, to see if you could win me; and you said, you would borrow my lord of Dover's library, that I should have what book I would; and now you require me thus to answer, contrary to your promise before any conference be had, and seek rather to bring me in trouble, than to win me.

Harpsfield. I will, as God shall help me, do the best to thee that I can, if thou wilt be any thing conformable; and I hope to dissolve all thy doubts, if thou be willing to hear. And I also will desire these two worshipful men, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins, to hear us.

Bland. No, you shall pardon me of that: there shall be no such witness. But when we agree, set to our hands. Here the people made a great noise against me, for refusing the witness: and here we had many more words than I can rehearse. But at last I said, Sir, will you give me leave to ask you one question? And he said,

Yea, with all my heart. For in that thou askest any thing, there is some hope that thou mayest be won.

Bland. Sir, when it pleased Almighty God to send his angel unto the virgin Mary to salute her, and said, "Hail, full of grace," &c. came any substance from God our Father into the virgin's womb to become man? Whereat Mr. Archdeacon, my lord of Dover, and Mr. Collins were silent. But my lord spake first, and said, The Holy Ghost came to her; and ere he had brought out his sentence, Mr. Syriac Peters said, "The power of the Most High overshadowed her." Truth, said Mr. Archdeacon, it was the power of God sent by the Holy Ghost. They had forgot, that He was begotten of the substance of his Father; or else they perceived whereunto this question tended: and so both I and they left it, by what words I cannot tell. But I said, Sir, shall I ask one other? And he said, Yea. Is there in the sacrament, after the consecration, Christ's natural body, with all the qualities of a natural body, or no?

Harpsfield. Hark, said Mr. Archdeacon, hear you this heretic? He thinks it an absurdity to grant all the qualities of Christ's natural body to be in the sacrament. But it is no absurdity: for even that natural body that was born of the virgin Mary is glorified, and that same body is in the sacrament after the consecration. But perceive you not the arrogancy of this heretic, that will put me to answer him, and he will not answer me? He thought to put me to a pinch with his question; for I tell you it is a learned question.

Bland. If you be so much disconcerted with me, I will say no more; yet I would all men heard, that you say the glorified body of Christ is in the sacrament after the consecration.

Harpsfield. I may call thee gross ignorant. Thou gross ignorant, is not the same body glorified, that was born of the virgin Mary? Is it then any absurdity to grant that to be in the sacrament? And while he spake many other words, I said to Mr. Petit, That the sacrament was instituted, delivered, and received of his apostles, before Christ's body was crucified; and it was crucified before it was glorified; which saying Mr. Petit partly recited to Mr. Archdeacon.

Harpsfield. Thou hast no learning. Was not Christ's body given to his apostles, as in a glorified act? And yet no inconvenience, although his natural body was not crucified; for when he was born of the virgin Mary without pain, was not that the act of a glorified body? and when he walked on the water, and when he came into the house to his apostles, the doors being shut fast, were not these acts of a glorified body?

Then my lord of Dover helped him to a better place, and said, When Christ was in mount Tabor, he was there glorified in the sight of his apostles.

Harpsfield. You say truth, my lord, he was glorified in the sight of three of his apostles.

Bland. This methinks is new doctrine.

Harpsfield. Well, seeing he will by no other way be reformed, let the people come in and prove these matters against him. And thereupon the Archdeacon brought forth a copy of the bill of complaint that was put up against me at Christmas, and about that we had a little talk. And then Mr. Archdeacon rose up, and said, See ye, good people that know this matter, that ye come in, and prove it against him. Whereunto answered Thomas Austen, I pray you let us be no more troubled with him, and then spake John Austen, and Heath a one-eyed man, and began to accuse me; but I gave them no other answer, but do to me what ye can by law, and I will answer it. Then said Thomas Austen, Bland, you were once abjured. You say not truly, Goodman Austen, said I, I was never abjured. Either, said he, you were abjured, or else you had the king's pardon. Neither of both, said I; you speak this of mere malice, with many other babbling words. Then Mr. Archdeacon departed, and left Mr. Collins to command me to appear the next day. However, for certain other urgent business that I had, I did not appear, but wrote a letter to Mr. Commissary, desiring him to respite the the matter till my coming home again; and if he would not, I would contentedly submit myself to the law when I came home.

Now about the 28th day of June I came to Mr. Commissary to let him know of my return, and offered myself to satisfy the law, if it were proceeded against me, before Mr. Cocks of Surry, and Marks the apparitor; but Mr. Commissary gently said, that he had done nothing against me; and so appointed me to appear before him the Friday seven-night after. In the mean time a sessions was held at Cranbroke, where I was bound to appear; and carrying surety with me to be bound again, for I expected no other, did appear the third day of July.

Then said Sir John Baker, Bland, we hear that you are a Scot; where was you born and brought up? I said, I was born in England. And he said, Where? I replied, In Sedber, and brought up by one Dr. Lupton, provost of Eaton college. Well, said he, I know him well. Remain to your bond till afternoon.

Then said Sir Thomas Moyle, Ah Bland, thou art a stiff-necked fellow. Thou wilt not obey the law, nor answer when thou art called. Then said Sir John Baker, Mr. Sheriff take him to your ward: and the bailiff set me in the stocks, with others, and would not hear me speak one word; and so we remained in the gaol of Maidstone, till a fortnight before Michaelmas, or thereabouts: and then we were carried to Rochester, to the assize held there, where we were two days among the prisoners: and when we were called, and the judges asked our causes, when my cause was rehearsed, Mr. Barrow, clerk of the peace, said, that I was an excommunicate person.

Then the judges of assize remanded us to Maidstone again, ordering us to be brought to the next sessions that should be held at the town of Malden: however the sheriff never sent for us; so we tarried at Maidstone till the sessions held at Greenwich, the 18th and 19th of February. I and others being within the bar amongst the felons, and irons upon our arms, were called out the latter day by the jailor and bailiffs, and eased of our irons, and carried by them into the town to Sir John Baker, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and two others whom I knew not.

Another EXAMINATION of Mr. BLAND.

Baker. BLAND, wherefore were you cast into prison?

Bland. I cannot well tell. Your mastership cast me in.

Baker. Yea, but for what were you in before that time?

Bland. For an unjust complaint against me.

Baker. What was the complaint?

Bland. I told him as truly and as briefly as I could.

Baker. Let me see thy book?—And I gave him a Latin testament.

Baker. Will you go to the church, and obey and follow the queen's proceedings, and do as an honest man should do?

Bland. I trust in God to do no otherwise but as an honest man ought to do.

Baker. Will you do as I said?

Bland. Will it please your mastership to give me leave to ask you a question?

Baker. Yes.

Bland. Sir, may a man do any thing that his conscience is not satisfied in to be good?

Baker. Away, away; and threw down the book, and said, it is no testament. And I said, Yes.

Baker. Yea, sayest thou so? by St. Mary, and hold thee there, I will give six faggots to burn thee, ere thou should be unburned: hence, knave, hence. And so were we returned into our place again within the bar. And at night, when judgment of felons and all was done, we were called, and the judge ordered the jailor to deliver us to the ordinary. And if, said the judge, they will not be reformed, let them be delivered to us again, and they shall have judgment and execution. And one of our company said, My lord, if we be killed at your hands for Christ's sake, we shall live with him for ever.

Another APPEARANCE of Mr. BLAND in the SPIRITUAL COURT.

THEN we came to the castle of Canterbury, and there we remained till the second day of March, on which day we were brought into the chapter-house of Cree-church, where were sitting the suffragan of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, Mr. Milles, with others, and then went to them Mr. Oxenden, Mr. Petit, Mr. Webb, and Mr. Harges, justices. And when I was called, Mr. Webb said, Here we present this man unto you, as one vehemently suspected of heresy.

Bland. Mr. Webb, you have no cause to suspect me of heresy. I have been a prisoner this whole year, and no matter proved against me. I pray you, what is the reason that I have been kept so long in prison?

Webb. Leave your arrogant asking of questions, and answer to that that is laid to your charge.

Bland. I do so; for I say you have no cause to suspect me of heresy.

Webb. Yes; you denied to Sir John Baker, to be conformable to the queen's proceedings.

Then stood up Mr. Petit, and said, You were cast into prison, because you fled away from your ordinary.

Bland. Then have I had wrong: for I never fled nor disobeyed mine ordinary, nor did any thing contrary to the law. If I did, let them now speak; but they said nothing. And when I saw they held their peace, I said, Mr. Commissary, have you been the cause of this my imprisonment? No, says he; you know that when you went from me, you were appointed to appear the Friday after the sessions. Here I was suffered to speak no more, but shut up in a corner till my companions were presented, and then we were sent to Westgate into prison, and were put into several close holds, so that we could not speak to one another, neither was any man permitted to come to us. We appeared four times in this manner: but one they dispatched, by what means I cannot tell, whose name was Cornwall, a tanner.

The ANSWER of Mr. BLAND at his Appearance before the COMMISSARY, and others in the Spiritual Court.

MR. Collins said: Mr. Bland, you know that you are presented unto us as one suspected of heresy. How say you, be you contented to reform yourself to the laws of this realm, and of the holy church?

Bland. I deny that I am justly suspected of heresy.

Collins. You were convented before Mr. Archdeacon and me, and matter of heresy laid to your charge.

Bland. That matter was done and said a whole year ago, for I have been in prison this year and more. If you have any thing against me by law, I desire that you let me know the law and matter, and I will answer according to the law.

Then said my lord suffragan; But that I am one of the judges I would rise, and stand by thee, and accuse thee to be a sacramentary, and bring witness to prove it; yea, and further, that thou hast called the mass an abominable idol.

Bland. You, my lord, never heard me say so: but I heard you once say, That in your conscience you had abhorred the mass three years.

Collins. Thou liest: this is but a drift. You had better answer now, else you shall go to prison again, and be called on Monday, and have articles laid to you, and if you answer not then directly, you shall be condemned as an heretic, and that will be worse for you.

Bland. Sir, I do not now, nor will then deny to answer any thing that you can lay to my charge by law: wherefore I trust you will let me have the benefit of the law.

Collins. Well, on Monday at nine of the clock you shall see the law, and have articles laid unto you.

Then they espied Mr. Cox the lawyer, and called him in, and said, Here is a lawyer can tell you are bound by law to answer: and he said as they had said.

After some conversation, my lord of Dover cried, No more, I command you to hold your peace. Have him away, and bring in another.

The Monday after we were brought to the same place again; but as I did before, I demanded what they had to lay to my charge, and to see the law, which they said before I should see.

Then they brought forth a decretal, a book of the bishop of Rome's law, to bind me to answer, which my heart abhorred to look upon. The effect was, that the ordinary had authority to examine, and that those whom they so examined must needs answer. But I said that it meant such as were justly suspected, as I was not. And here we had much communication; for I charged them with unjust imprisonment, which they could not avoid.

Collins. Are you willing to confer with some? It will be better for you; now we offer it, because you would not desire it.

Bland. As I did not refuse before, no more will I now. But I did not perceive before, but that one thing might have come, without any leave-asking, to confer the scriptures: and therefore I expected Dr. Faucer would have come to me without desiring, if any profit to me had been in conference; for though I was never able to do him good, yet once I was his tutor.

Collins. Will you come to his chamber in the afternoon?

Bland. Sir, I am a prisoner, it is meet that I obey, and come whither you will, and so departed. At this time we were three. But they took another to appear before them the Tuesday seven-night after. And when he came, I knew not what was done, but I hear they excommunicated him, and let him go. His name was Miller, a clothier.

Here followeth a certain CONFUTATION of Mr. BLAND, against false and manifest Absurdities granted by Mr. MILLES, Priest of Christ-church in Canterbury.

MILLES. We say that Christ is in or under the sacrament really and corporally, which are the forms of bread and wine, and that there is his body contained invisibly, and the qualities which we do see, as whiteness and roundness, be there without substance by God's power, as quantity and weight be there also by invisible measure.

Bland. This is your own divinity, to make accidents the sacrament, and Christ's real body invisibly contained in them, and so to destroy the sacrament. And yet the doctors say, the matter of the sacrament is bread and wine. And God by his power worketh no miracles with "This my body," so as to change the substance of bread and wine into his body and blood, in that he maketh accidents to be without their substance by invisible measure.

Milles. We eat Christ's flesh and blood spiritually, when we receive it with faith and charity. And we also do eat it corporally in the sacrament; and the body that we so receive hath life. For the Godhead is annexed thereto: which although it be received with the body of Christ, yet it is not visible after a gross sort, and the flesh of Christ that we receive is lively; for it hath the Spirit of God joined to it. And if a man be drunken, it is not by receiving of the blood of Christ: for it is contrary to the nature of Christ's blood. If he be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without substance of blood.

Bland. I am glad that you are so much against all men, to say that Christ's body is alive in the sacrament; it may chance to bring you to the truth in time to come. And you say truth, that it is not the natural receiving of Christ's blood that maketh a man drunken; for it is the nature of wine that doth that; which you deny not.

And a greater truth you confess than you did think, when you said, If a man be drunken, it is by the qualities and quantities, without the substance of blood; for indeed blood hath no such qualities with it: by which it is evident that there is no natural blood.

If a man be drunken with wine consecrated, it must be a miracle, as I think you will have it, that the said accidents should be without their natural substance, and work all the operations of both substance and accidents: and so it followeth that a man may be drunken by miracle. The body that you receive, you say, is alive, because it is annexed to the Godhead; and the flesh that you receive is lively, because it hath the Spirit of God joined to it.

This division is of your new inventions, to divide the body and the flesh, the one alive by the Godhead, the other lively by God's Spirit, and both one sacrament: you imagine a body without flesh, and flesh without a body; as you do qualities and quantities without substance, and a living body without qualities and quantities.

Milles. If case so require, and there be a godly intent in the minister to consecrate, after the consecration, there is present the body and blood of Christ, and no other substance, but accidents without substance to a true believer.

Bland. You grant three absurdities, that in a tun of wine consecrated is nothing but accidents: and to increase it withal, you have brought in two inconveniences; first, that it is not the word of God that doth consecrate, but the intent of the priest must help it; and if that fail, you seem to grant no consecration, though the priest speak the word; and yet your doctors say, that the wickedness of the priest diminisheth not the sacrament.

Milles. The substance of Christ's body doth not fill the mouse's belly. For although he doth receive the outward forms of bread and wine, yet he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation. And a mouse doth not eat the body of Christ, to speak properly; for it doth not feed him spiritually or corporally; as it doth man, because he doth not receive it to any inducement of immortality to the flesh.

Bland. You make not your doctrine plain to be understood: we must know how a mouse can receive the substance inwardly and outwardly. You say he doth not receive the substance inwardly, but without violation: Therefore, with violation he receiveth the substance inwardly. You say that the mouse cannot violate Christ's body; but he violateth the substance that he eateth. And this your proper speech doth import as much, as that the mouse should eat the sacrament to as great effect, and the same thing, as doth the unworthy receiver. For if that be the cause that she properly eateth not the body of Christ, because she doth not feed upon it spiritually nor corporally, nor receiveth it to any inducement of immortality, as you say; then it followeth, that the unbeliever and the mouse receive both one thing. And yet it cannot be denied, but the mouse will live with consecrated bread, and then you must grant this absurdity, that a substance is nourished and fed only with accidents.

Milles. Men's bodies be fed with Christ's body, as with immortal meat, by reason of the Godhead annexed, to eternal life; but men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine: and we deny that by the sacramental eating any gross humour turned into blood is made miraculously in the body.

Bland. Where it cannot be denied that a man may live, and naturally be nourished in his natural body with the sacramental bread and wine consecrated; you cannot avoid that: but then you turn to the spiritual nourishing of man's body, by Christ's body and Godhead annexed, which is nothing to put away the absurdity, that either a man's natural body should be fed naturally with accidents, or else to have them changed into gross humours. But you say, men's bodies be corporally nourished with qualities and forms of bread and wine; and then must you needs grant, that qualities and quantities must be made made substance in man. For by them our bodies are nourished, or else is all that is the nutriment in man accidents, and no substance.

Mills. If the forms of bread and wine be burned, or worms ingendered, it is no derogation to the body of Christ, because the presence of his body ceaseth to be there, and no substance cometh again.

Bland. Ye grant here, that a substance may be made of accidents, as ashes or worms: but I think you will have it by your miracles, and this I count a greater absurdity than the other, that Christ's body should cease to be there, and no substance to come again; for no word in all the whole bible seems to serve you for the ceasing of his presence, though we granted you, which we do not, that it were there. God Almighty open your heart, if it be his will and pleasure, to see the truth. And if I thought not my death to be at hand, I would answer you to all the rest, in these and all other my doings.

The Last APPEARANCE and EXAMINATION of Mr. BLAND.

MR. Bland was brought before the bishop of Dover, the commissary, and the archdeacon, at Canterbury, Monday the 13th day of June. The name of this bishop was Richard Thornton. The commissary was Robert Collins, whom the cardinal by his letters patent had substituted his agent, before his coming over to England. The archdeacon was Nicholas Harpsfield. Under these a great many were cruelly treated and barbarously slain at Canterbury, amongst whom Mr. Bland was the first; who, being brought before the first bishop, and colleagues, viz. John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Thomas Thacker, Humphrey Middleton, and William Cocker, were examined of articles. To whom it was objected by the commissary, Whether he believed, that Christ is really in the sacrament, or not, &c. To this he answered and said, that he believed, that Christ is in the sacrament, as he is in all other good bodies; so that he judged not Christ to be really in the sacrament.

He was bid to appear again on Wednesday next, and from thence he was deferred again to Monday following, being the twentieth of June, in the same chapter-house, then to hear further what should be done, in case he would not relent to their mind. Which day and place he appearing as before, was required to speak his mind plainly and fully to the aforesaid articles, being again repeated to him.

His answers and confession taken, respite was given him yet a few days to deliberate with himself. And on the 25th day of the said month of June he appeared again in the chapter-house, and there boldly and firmly withstood the authority of the pope; whereupon he was condemned and committed to the secular power.

The HISTORY of JOHN FRANKESH, HUMPHREY MIDDLETON, and NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

HAVING now passed over the examination of Mr. Bland, let us further proceed to the rest of his fellow prisoners, being joined the same time with him in the like cause and like affliction. The names of whom were, John Frankesh, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphrey Middleton, Thacker, and Cocker, of whom Thacker only gave back. The rest constantly standing to the truth, were altogether condemned by the suffragan of Canterbury, the 25th day of June, the year above expressed. Whose examinations I need not long dwell upon, forasmuch as the articles ministered against them were all one, so in their answers they little or nothing disagreed. Sheterden's first examination was with Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield, and Mr. Collins, the commissary. The commissary, after many impious declarations, was at length compelled to grant, that Christ's testament was broken, and his institution was changed from that he left it: but he said, they had power so to do.

My First ANSWERING after their LAW was established.

HAVING been called before the suffragan, and seven or eight of the chief priests, and examined of certain articles, I required to see their commission. They shewed it to me, and said, there it is, and the king and queen's letters also. Then I desired to have it read: and so in reading I perceived, that on some notable suspicion he might examine upon two articles; Whether Christ's real presence were in the sacrament, and whether the church of England be Christ's catholic church?

To that I answered, that I had been a prisoner three quarters of a year, and, as I thought, wrongfully; reason would therefore that I should answer to those things for which I was imprisoned.

The suffragan said, his commission was, that I must answer directly, yes or no.

This commission, said I, was not general to examine whom he will, but on just suspicion.

He said, I was suspected, and presented to him.

Sheterden. Prove your suspicion, or shew what cause you have to suspect.

Suffragan. Thou wert cast into prison for that cause.

Sheterden. Because I had suffered imprisonment contrary to God's law and realm, I must now for amends be examined of suspicion without cause, to hide all the wrong done to me before. For when I was cast into prison, there was no law that hindered me from speaking as I did: therefore in that point I could be no more suspected than you, who preached the same yourself not long before.

Suffragan. That was no matter to thee what I preached.

Sheterden. Well, yet in the king and queen's name I must answer directly: and therefore I require as a subject, that you do not extend beyond your commission, but prove me suspected, more than yourself.

Suffragan. Well, I myself did suspect thee, and it is no matter whereby.

Sheterden. But your commission doth not serve you so to do without cause of suspicion. It is not meet for you to be my accuser and my judge also, for that is too much for one man.

Mills. If you were a christian man, you would not be ashamed of your faith being required.

Sheterden. I am not ashamed indeed, I thank God, and if any man did come to me, either to teach or learn, I would declare it; but forasmuch as I perceive you come neither to teach nor to learn, I hold it best not to answer you.

Mills. If you will not, then will we certify the king's council.

Sheterden. I am therewith content that you should certify that I had suffered three quarters of a year wrongfully in prison, and therefore I desire to be justified or condemned, first for that I suffered such imprisonment; and then I will not refuse to answer your articles, though they were a bushel of them. But to say that I would answer, whereby you should heal all your wrong done to me against the law of God and the realm, I will not.

They then said, it was obstinacy in him that he would not answer, and a token that his faith was naught, seeing he was ashamed to utter it: and that he should answer to the articles, or else be condemned upon suspicion.

Sheterden. I am content with that, yet all men shall know, that as you suspect and can prove no cause, so shall you condemn me without a matter, and then shall all men know you seek my blood, and no justice.

Suffragan. No, we seek not thy blood, but thy conversion.

Sheterden. That we shall see. For then shall you prove my perversion first, before you condemn me on your suspicion without proof of the same: and by that I shall know whether you seek blood or no.

At last stept up one Lovels, a lawyer, who would prove prove his imprisonment not to be wrong, but right, by old statutes of Edward the fourth, and Henry, &c. but at last he was compelled to forsake those statutes from Michaelmas to Christmas, and then he said it was no wrong.

To this Mr. Sheterden said, if he could prove that men might wrongfully imprison before a law, and in the mean while make laws, and then under that hide the first wrong, then he said true, or else not.

His EXAMINATION before the BISHOP of WINCHESTER, then LORD CHANCELLOR.

I WAS called into a chamber before the lord chancellor, the suffragan, and others. He stood by the table, and because I saw the cardinal was not there, I bowed and drew near.

Then said he, I have sent for you because I hear you are indicted of heresy; and being called before the commissioners, you will not answer nor submit yourself.

I said, I did not refuse to answer; but I did plainly answer that I had been in prison a long time, and reason it was that I should be charged or discharged of that, and not to be examined of articles to hide my wrong imprisonment, neither did I know any indictment against me. If there were any, it could not be just, for I have not been abroad since the law was made.

Then said the bishop of Winchester, Well, yet if such a suspicion be of you, if you be a christian, you will declare that it is not true, and so clear yourself.

Sheterden. I thought it sufficient to answer to mine offences, &c. trusting that they would lay no such burden upon me, whereby the wrong done to me might be covered, but I would be proved to have wrong or right.

Winchester. If thou wilt declare thyself to the church to be a christian, thou shalt go, and then have a writ of wrong imprisonment, &c.

Sheterden. I have no mind to sue now, but require right justice: but to make a promise, I will not; and if I offend the law, then punish me accordingly. For it might be that my conscience was not persuaded, nor would be, in prison: seeing these things which I have learned, were by God's law openly taught and received by the authority of the realm. And he said, it was never received, that I might speak against the sacrament; I said that against some opinion of the sacrament it was openly taught.

Winchester. By no law, and that was not able to consider, that all that while God preserved that, so that no law could pass against it.

Sheterden. I said their law did not only persuade me, but this most; when they preached unto us, they took pains to set out the word of God in our tongue, so that we may read and judge whether they say true or no, but now they take the light from us, and would have us believe it, because they say so, which is to me a great persuasion.

Winchester. It was not a few that could be your guides in understanding, but the doctors and the whole church; now whom wouldst thou believe? either the few or the many?

Sheterden. I did not believe for the few or for the many, but only for him that bringeth the word, and shewed it to me to be so, according to the process thereof.

Winchester. Well, then, if an Arian come to thee with scripture, thou wilt believe him, if he shew this next, "My Father is greater than I."

Sheterden. No, my lord, he must bring me also the contrary place, and prove them both true, where he saith, "My Father and I are one."

Winchester. Yea, that is by charity, as we are one with him.

Sheterden. That gloss will not stand with the rest of the scripture, where he said, "I am the very same that I say to you;" he said the truth, and the truth was God, with more such like. And here he made many words, but very gently, of the sacrament. Likewise Christ said, said he, it was his body; yea, that is to say, a figure of his body; and how men did not consider that the Word was God, and God the Word, and so provoked me with such temptation; but I let him alone, and said nothing. So after many words, he came to the church's faith, and comely order of ceremonies and images. And then I joined to him again with the commandments.

Winchester. That was done that no false things should be made, as the heathen would worship a cat because she killed mice.

Sheterden. It is plain that the law forbids not only such, but even to make an image of God to any manner of likenesses.

Winchester. Where find you that?

Sheterden. Forsooth, in the law where God gave them the commandments: for he said, "Ye saw no shape, but heard a voice only:" and added a reason why; "lest they should after make images and marr themselves;" so that God would not shew his shape, because they should have no image of him who was the true God, &c.

Winchester. You have made a goodly interpretation.

Sheterden. No, it is the text. A Latin bible was then brought.

Winchester. Why, can you read no Latin?

Sheterden. No. Then was the English bible brought. He bade me find it; and so I read it aloud: and then he said, Lo here thou mayest see; this is no more to forbid the image of God, than of any other beast, fowl, or fish, (the place was Deut. iv.) I said it did plainly forbid to make any of these as an image of God, because no man might know what shape he was of. Therefore might no man say of any image, this is an image of God.

Winchester. Well, yet by your leave, so much as was seen we may, that is, of Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and the Father appeared to Daniel like an old man.

Sheterden. That is no proof that we may make images contrary to the commandment; for though the Holy Ghost appeared like a dove, yet was he not like in shape, but in certain qualities; and therefore when I saw the dove, which is God's creature, indeed I might remember the Spirit to be simple and loving, &c. and with that he was somewhat moved, and said, I had learned my lesson, and asked who taught me, with many words; and he said he would prove how good and profitable images were to teach the unlearned, &c. At last I said, My lord, although I were able to make ever so good a gloss upon the commandments, yet obedience is better than all our good intents, and much ado we had. At last he said, he saw what it was, and that he had sent for me for charity sake to talk with me, but now he would not meddle; and said, my wrong imprisonment could not excuse me, but I must clear myself. I said that was easy for me to do, for I had not offended.

Winchester. He said I could not escape so, there I was deceived.

Sheterden. Well, then, I am under the law, &c.

The archdeacon was then called in, and he said, that I behaved myself before him with such arrogancy and stoutness, as never was heard: whereas he was minded with such mercy towards me, &c. and many other lies he laid to me, that I was sent home till another time, and I would not be contented, but went out of the church with such an outcry as was notable.

Sheterden. I declare that herein he falsely reported me, and brought in the laws then in the realm, and the queen's proclamation, that none of her subjects should be compelled till the law were to compel; and that I rehearsed the same in the court for me, and I did use him then, said I, as I use your grace now, and no otherwise.

Winchester. He said that I did not use myself very well now.

Sheterden. I said I had so offered myself to be bailed, and to confer with them when and where they would.

Winchester. He said I should not confer, but be obedient. I said, let me go, and I will not desire to confer neither: and when offended, let them punish me, and so departed.

The last EXAMINATION, with the CONDEMNATION of Mr. JOHN BLAND, J. FRANKESH, N. SHETERDEN, and H. MIDDLETON.

AND thus much touching the particular and several examinations of Mr. Sheterden and Mr. Bland. Now to touch something also of the other martyrs, who were examined the same time, and suffered together with them, to wit, Humphry Middleton, of Ashford, and John Frankesh, vicar of Rolvynden, in the diocese of Kent, above-mentioned; here first should be declared the articles, which publicly in their last examinations were jointly and severally ministered unto them by the aforesaid Thornton, bishop of Dover; but forasmuch as these articles being ordinary and of course, are already expressed in the story of Mr. Bland, it is not therefore needful to make any new rehearsals thereof.

The seven articles being propounded to the persons above-named, to wit, John Frankesh, John Bland, Nicholas Sheterden, Humphry Middleton, and one Thacker; John Frankesh first answered somewhat doubtfully, desiring further respite to be given him of fourteen days to deliberate with himself, which was granted. Mr. Bland answered flatly and roundly, as you heard before. Nicholas Sheterden, and Humphry Middleton answered to the first and second articles affirmatively. To the third concerning the catholic church after a sort they granted. To the fourth, fifth, and sixth, concerning the real presence, and the sacrament to be administered in the Latin tongue, and in one kind, they utterly refused to answer. Sheterden said, he would not answer thereto, before the cause were determined why he was imprisoned, and so still remained prisoner, before the laws of parliament received, &c. Middleton added moreover and confessed, that he believed in his own God, saying, My living God, and no dead god, &c. Thacker only relented, and was content to take penance. Thus the aforesaid four upon these answers were condemned by the bishop of Dover the 25th day of June, 1555.

And being delivered to the secular power, they were all four burnt together at Canterbury the 12th of July, at two several stakes, but in one fire, where they in sight of God and of his angels, and before men, like true soldiers of Jesus Christ, gave a constant testimony to the truth of his holy gospel.

Mr. SHETERDEN's PRAYER before his DEATH.

O LORD my God and Saviour, who art Lord in heaven and earth, maker of all things visible and invisible, I am the creature and work of thy hands; Lord God, look upon me and other thy people, who at this time are oppressed by the worldly-minded for thy law's sake; yea, Lord, thy law itself is now trodden under foot, and men's inventions exalted above it, and for that cause do I, and many thy creatures, refuse the glory, praise, and conveniences of this life, and do chuse to suffer adversity, and to be banished, yea, to be burnt with the books of thy word, for the hope's sake, that is in store. O Father, I do not presume to come unto thee trusting in mine own righteousness, no, but only in the merits of thy dear Son my Saviour: and when the time of resurrection cometh, then let me enjoy again these members glorified, which now be spoiled and consumed by fire. O Lord Jesus, receive my spirit into thy hands. Amen.

Sheterden, some few days before he suffered, wrote an affectionate letter to his wife, two to his mother, wishing her increase of grace, and godly wisdom, and two to his brother, Walter Sheterden, expatiating on the true faith and doctrine of Christ. In the prayer which he offered up to the throne of grace before his death, he evinced consummate meekness, exemplary resignation, and a lively hope in God's mercy!

The next day after the condemnation of these aforesaid, which was the 26th day of July, W. Coker, W. Hopper, of Crambrooke, Henry Laurence, Richard Wright, of Ashford, and W. Stere, of Ashford, were likewise condemned for the same articles. But because the execution of these martyrs pertaineth not to this month, more shall be said of them when we come to the following month of August.

A brief Account of NICHOLAS HALL and CHRISTOPHER WAID.

THE same month of July, Nicholas Hall, bricklayer, and Christopher Waid, of Dartford, suffered death, who were condemned by Maurice bishop of Rochester about the last day of June. The six articles administered to them were of the same ordinary course and effect with the other articles above specified, the brief sum whereof were these.

1. First, That they were christian men and professed the catholic determinations of our holy mother church.

2. That they which maintain or hold otherwise than our holy mother the catholic church doth, are heretics.

3. That they hold and maintain, that in the sacrament of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, is not the very body and blood of Christ. And that the said very body of Christ is verily in heaven only, and not in the sacrament.

4. That they have and do hold and maintain, that the mass, as it is now used in the catholic church, is naught and abominable.

5. That they have been, and be amongst the people of that jurisdiction vehemently suspected upon the premises, and thereupon indicted, &c.

To these articles they answered as follows: First, Granting themselves christian men, and acknowledging the determination of the holy church, that is, of the congregation or body of Christ; save that Hall denied to call the catholic and apostolic church his mother, because he found not this word Mother in the scriptures.

To the second they granted. To the third article as touching the very body and blood of Christ to be under the forms of bread and wine in substance, they would not grant, only affirming the very body of him to be in heaven, and the sacrament to be a token or remembrance of Christ's death; Nicholas Hall adding moreover, and saying, That whereas before he held the sacrament to be but only a token or remembrance of Christ's death, now he said, that there is neither token nor remembrance, because it is now misused and clean turned from Christ's institution, &c. And concerning the mass in the fourth article, to be abominable, Christopher Waid, with the other, answered, that as they had confessed before, so they would not now go from what they had said. To the fifth article, for the people's suspicion, they made no great account nor sticking to granting the same.

And thus much concerning the articles and answers of these good men. Which being received, immediately sentence of condemnation was pronounced by the said Maurice the bishop against them, the copy of which sentence as it runneth much after the common course in condemning all the other servants of Christ, so the same being exemplified before, needeth not here to be repeated. Nicholas Hall was burnt at Rochester about the 19th day of July.

Furthermore, with the aforesaid Hall and Waid, in the same month of July, three others were condemned by Maurice, bishop of Rochester, whose names were Joan Beach, widow, John Harpol, of Rochester, and Margery Polley. Of which Margery Polley, touching her examination and condemnation here followeth an account.

The CONDEMNATION of MARGERY POLLEY, Widow and Martyr.

Margery Polley, widow, sometime wife of Richard Polley of Pepingbery, was accused and brought before the said Maurice bishop of Rochester, about the beginning of the month of June. Which bishop, according to the pontifical solemnity of that church, rising up out of the chair of his majesty, in the high swelling stile after his ordinary manner to dash the silly poor woman, began in these words:

"We Maurice, by the sufferance of God, bishop of Rochester, proceeding of our mere office in a cause of heresy, against thee Margery Polley, of the parish of Pepingbery, of our diocese and jurisdiction of Rochester, do lay and object against thee all and singular these articles ensuing. To which, and to every parcel of them, we require of thee a true, full, and plain answer, by virtue of thine oath thereupon to be given," &c.

Thus the oath being first administered, and the articles commenced against her, which articles were the same that were ministered to Nicholas Hall and Waid before, she so framed her answers again, especially answering to the third and fourth article, that she neither allowed the deity of their sacrament, nor the absurdity of their mass. For which sentence was read against her about the beginning of June, and she condemned for the same. But because her death followed not upon the same, we will therefore defer the transaction thereof to the due place and time, first setting down in order of history the execution of Christopher Waid before mentioned.

The MARTYRDOM of CHRISTOPHER WAID, Linen Weaver, of DARTFORD.

Christopher Waid, of Dartford, in the county of Kent, linen-weaver, was condemned, by Maurice bishop of Rochester, and appointed to be burnt at Dartford aforesaid. At the day appointed for his execution, which was in the month of July, there was carried out of town betimes in the morning in a cart, a stake, and therewith many bundles of reeds, to a place a quarter of a mile out of town, called the Brimth, into a gravel pit thereby, the common place for the execution of felons. Thither also was brought a load of broom faggots, with other faggots and tall wood. Unto which place the people of the country resorted in great numbers, and there waited his coming; insomuch that divers fruiterers came thither with horse-loads of cherries, and sold them. About ten o'clock the sheriff came riding with a great many other gentlemen and retinue, appointed to assist him therein, and with them Christopher Waid, Margery Polley, of Tunbridge, riding pinioned by him, both singing of a psalm; which Margery, as soon as she espied afar off the multitude gathered about the place where they should suffer, waiting their coming, she said unto Waid very loud and cheerfully, You may rejoice, to see such a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day.

And so passing by the place, which joined to the highway, they were straightway carried down to the town, where she was kept till the sheriff returned from Waid's execution. Mr. Waid being made ready, and stripped off his cloaths in an inn, a fair long white shirt was brought unto him from his wife, which being put on, and he pinioned, was led up on foot again to the aforesaid place. When he was come to the stake, he took it in his arms, and kissed it, setting his back unto it, and standing in a pitch barrel which was taken from the beacon, being hard by; then a smith brought a hoop of iron, and with two staples made him fast to the stake under his arms.

As soon as he was thus settled, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, he spake with a cheerful and loud voice the last verse of the 86th Psalm; "Shew some good token upon me, O Lord, that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou, Lord, hast helped me, and comforted me." Near to the stake was a little hill, upon the top whereof were set up four staves, quadrangle-wise, with a covering round about like a pulpit: into which place as Waid was thus praying at the stake, entered a friar with a book in his hand; whom when Waid espied, he cried earnestly unto the people, to take heed of the doctrine of the whore of Babylon, exhorting them to embrace the doctrine of the gospel preached in King Edward's days. While he was thus speaking to the people, the sheriff interrupted him, saying, Be quiet, Waid, and die patiently. I am quiet, said he, I thank God, Mr. Sheriff, and so trust to die.

All this while the friar stood still looking over the coverlet, as though he would have uttered somewhat: but Waid mightily admonished the people to beware of that doctrine; which when the friar perceived, whether he was amazed, or could have no audience of the people, he withdrew out of the place immediately, without speaking any word, and went away down to the town. Then the reeds being set about him, he pulled them, and embraced them in his arms, always with his hands making a hole against his face, that his voice might be heard, which his tormentors perceiving, they cast faggots at the same hole; but notwithstanding he still, as he could, put them off, his face being hurt with the end of a faggot cast thereat. Then fire being put unto him, he cried unto God often, Lord Jesus receive my soul; without any token or sign of impatience in the fire, till at length after the fire was thoroughly kindled, he was heard by no man to speak, still holding up his hands together over his head towards heaven, even when he was dead and altogether roasted, as though they had been stayed up with a prop standing under them.

This sign did God shew upon him, whereby his very enemies might perceive, that God had, according to his prayer, shewed such a token upon him, even to their shame and confusion. And thus was the order of this godly martyr's execution, this was his end. Whereby God seemed to confound and strike with the spirit of dumbness the friar, that locust which was risen up to have spoken against him; and also no less wonderfully sustained those hands which he lifted up to him for comfort in his torment.

*The APPREHENSION, EXAMINATION, CON-DEMNATION, and BURNING of DIRICK
CARVER, Beer-Brewer of BRIGHTHELMSTONE, and JOHN LAUNDER, Husbandman of GODSTONE,
SURRY, who suffered MARTYRDOM for the Testimony of the Gospel.*

THE 22d day of July, Dirick Carver, late of the parish of Brightelmstone in the county of Suffex, was burnt at Lewes in the said county. And the day following John Launder, late of Godstone in the county of Surry, was burnt at Stening. These two men were, with others, about the latter end of the month of October, in the year 1554, apprehended by Edward Gage, gentleman, as they were at prayers in the dwelling-house of the said Dirick, and by him were sent up to the queen's council, who, after examination, sent them as prisoners to Newgate, there to attend the leisure of Bonner bishop of London. From whence (upon the bishop's receipt of a letter from the lord marquis of Winchester, now lord treasurer) they were brought by the keeper of the prison on the 8th of June next after into the bishop's chamber at his house in London; and there (being examined upon divers points of religion) they made their several confessions, subscribing and signing with their own hands: which being read, the bishop objected unto them certain other articles, causing them to swear truly and directly their answers thereunto; which articles they confessed to be true, referring themselves chiefly to their former confession.

This done, after long persuasions and fair exhortations, they were demanded whether they would stand to their answers. To whom Launder said, I will never go from these answers as long as I live. The other also confirmed the same, and therefore they were commanded to appear again before the bishop in the consistory at St. Paul's the tenth day of the same month. Which articles and confession, with the forementioned letter, do here ensue.

A L E T T E R

From the Marquis of WINCHESTER, Lord Treasurer, to BONNER, Bishop of LONDON, touching the Examination of the said Prisoners.

AFTER my commendations to your good lordship, I shall not forget your livery of black against this time; no more I shall Mr. Dean, to whom I wrote to make the the sermon, who must now assuredly do it: for my lord of Chichester cannot attend it. To whom I have given like knowledge by my letter now sent: and your lordship must command the sextons of your church to be in readines for ringing in the time of service. And if you be not furnished with black apparel for the altar, and for the priest, deacon, and subdeacon, I must have knowledge thereof, that it may be taken of the queen's stuff, whereof I pray you let me be advertised.

And you have sent Bradford to Newgate, as a man convicted of heresy before you: but as I perceive you have not sent me a Significavit, and therefore you must send me one, that I may proceed with him, and that shall I do, as soon as I am answered by you.

There be divers like prisoners that came from Suffex, that be not yet examined before you, lying now in Newgate, who must be examined by you, since they be come to London, and so I pray they may be, and I certified of your proceedings, that I may follow, which I shall do, thanking your lordship heartily for my conies, trusting to recompense your lordship again shortly with twice as many. From my house this seventh of June, 1555.

Your loving friend,
WINCHESTER.

The CONFESSION of DIRICK CARVER.

DIRICK CARVER, beer-brewer, of Brighthelmstone, in the county of Suffex, where he hath dwelt about eight or nine years, born in the village of Dilson by Stockom, in the land of Luke, about forty years of age, and now prisoner in Newgate, where he hath remained and continued at the council's commandment, since Alhallows-day last past, being examined concerning his faith and belief in the sacrament of the altar, faith, that he hath and doth believe, that the very substance of the body and blood of Christ is not in the said sacrament, and that there is no other substance remaining in the said sacrament after the words spoken by the priest, but only the substance of bread and wine.

Item, Being examined concerning the mass in Latin now used in the church of England, he believeth, that there is no sacrifice in the mass, and that there is in it no salvation for a christian man, except it should be said in the mother tongue, that he might understand it; and concerning the ceremonies of the church, he faith and believeth, that they be not profitable to a christian man.

Item, Being examined concerning auricular confession, he answereth, That he hath believed, and doth believe, that it is necessary to go to a good priest for good counsel: but the absolution of the priest, laying his hand upon any man's head, as is now used, is nothing profitable to a christian man's salvation. And further he faith, that he hath not been confessed, nor received the sacrament of the altar, since the coronation of the queen that now is.

Item, Concerning the faith and religion now taught, set forth, and believed in the church of England, he answereth and believeth, that the faith and doctrine now taught, set forth, and used in the said church of England, is not agreeable to God's word. And furthermore he faith, that bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, Rogers, and others of their opinion, who were lately burnt, were good christian men, and preached the true doctrine of Christ, as he believeth; and faith, that they shed their blood in the same doctrine, which was by the power of God, as he faith and believeth.

And further being examined, he faith, That since the queen's coronation, he hath had the bible and psalter read in his house at Brighthelmstone divers times, and likewise since his coming to Newgate: but the keeper hearing thereof, took them away; and also said, that about a twelvemonth ago, he had the English profection said in his house, with other English prayers. And further said, That Thomas Iveson, John Launder, and William Vefie, being prisoners with him in Newgate, were taken with this examine in his house at Brighthelmstone, as they were hearing the gospel then read in English, a little before Alhallows-day last, and brought into the court: and being examined thereupon by the council, were committed by them to prison in Newgate.

The CONFESSION of JOHN LAUNDER.

JOHAN LAUNDER, of the parish of Godstone, in the county of Surry, husbandman, aged 25 years, born at Godstone aforesaid, being examined, doth confesse and say, That about two days before last Alhallows-tide, this examine and one Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson, William Vefie, with divers other persons, to the number of twelve, (being altogether at their prayers, saying the service in English, set forth in the time of king Edward the Sixth, in the house of the said Dirick Carver, situated at Brighthelmstone in Suffex) were apprehended by one Mr. Gage, and by him sent up to London to the king and queen's council, and by them (upon his examination) committed to Newgate, where he and his said fellows have ever since remained.

And further being examined, he doth confesse and say, that the occasion of his coming to the said Brighthelmstone, was upon some business there to be done for his father: and so being there, and hearing that the said Dirick was a man that did much favour the gospel, this examine did resort to his house and company, whom before that time he did never see or know, and by reason of that his resort he was apprehended as before. And further doth confesse and believe, that there is here in earth one whole and universal catholic church, whereof the members be dispersed through the world; and doth believe also, that the same church doth set forth and teach only two sacraments, namely, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of our Lord. And whosoever doth teach or use any more sacraments, or yet any ceremonies, he doth not believe that they be of the catholic church, but doth abhor them from the bottom of his heart. And doth further say and believe, that all the service, sacrifices and ceremonies, now used in this realm of England (yea, and in all other parts of the world, which have been used after the same manner) be erroneous and naught, and contrary to Christ's institution, and the determination of Christ's catholic church, whereof he believeth that he himself is a member.

Also he doth confesse and believe, that in the sacrament, now called the sacrament of the altar, there is not really and truly contained, under the forms of bread and wine, the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance: but his belief and faith therein is as followeth, to wit, That when he doth receive the material bread and wine, he doth receive the same in a remembrance of Christ's death and passion; and so receiving it, he doth eat and drink Christ's body and blood by faith, and none otherways as he believeth.

And moreover he doth confesse, say, and believe, that the mass now used in the realm of England, or elsewhere in all Christendom, is naught and abominable, and directly against God's word, and his catholic church; and that there is nothing said or used in it good and profitable. For he faith, that albeit the Gloria in excelsis, the creed, Sanctus Pater-noster, Agnus, and other parts of the mass, be of themselves good and profitable, yet the same being used among other things that be naught and superfluous in the mass, the same good things do become naught also, as he believeth.

Also he doth believe and confesse, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made to any priest, or to any other creature, but every person ought to confesse his sins only to God, and also that no man hath any authority to absolve any one from his sins; and also believeth, that the right and true way (according to the scripture) after a man hath fallen from grace to sin, to arise to Christ again, is to be sorry for his offences, and to do the same or the like no more; and not to make any any auricular confession of them to the priest, or to take absolution of them at the priest's hands.

On Monday, June 10, these two persons, with others, were brought by the keeper unto the bishop's consistory, at one o'clock in the afternoon, where the bishop first beginning with the said Dirick Carver, caused his confession to be openly read unto him, asking him whether he would stand to the same. To whom the said Dirick answered, that he would: for your doctrine, said he, is poison and forcery.

The bishop seeing his constancy, and that neither his accustomed flatteries; nor yet his cruel threatenings could once move this good man to incline to their idolatry, pronounced his usual and general blessing on Dirick Carver and John Launder, severally; therefore they were both delivered to the sheriffs, who were there present, and afterwards conveyed to the places above-named, where they most joyfully gave their bodies to be burned in the fire.

An Account of THOMAS IVESON, JOHN ALEWORTH, JAMES ABBES, JOHN DENLEY, JOHN NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM.

THOMAS IVESON, of Godstone in the county of Surry, carpenter, was burnt about the same month at Chichester; whose apprehension, examination, constancy, and condemnation, was at the same time, and in the same form with Dirick Carver's and John Launder's.

In the latter end of the month of July, John Aleworth died in prison at the town of Reading; being there in bonds for the testimony of the gospel. Whom although the catholic prelates (according to their usual solemnity) excluded him from catholic burial, yet we see no cause to exclude him from the number of Christ's holy martyrs, and heirs of his holy kingdom.

Among many that endeavoured in these troublesome days to keep a good conscience, there was one James Abbes, a young man who was forced to have his part with his brethren in wandering, and going from place to place, to avoid the peril of apprehension. At length he was caught by the hands of wicked men, and brought before Dr. Hopkins, bishop of Norwich: who examining him of his religion; and charging him therewith both with threats and fair speeches, at last James Abbes did yield to their persuasions.

When he was dismissed, the bishop calling him again, gave him a piece of money, which when James had received, and was gone from the bishop, his conscience began to throb, and he went immediately to the bishop again, threw him his money; and said, he repented that he ever gave his consent to their wicked persuasions. Hereupon the bishop with his chaplains laboured afresh to win him again, but in vain; for he would not yield to their persuasions, but stood manfully in his master's quarrel to the end, and abode the force of the fire in the consuming of his body to ashes, which tyranny of burning was done in Bury, the second of August, 1555.

In the midst of this tempestuous rage of malignant adversaries, among the cruel murderers of God's saints, there was one Edmund Tyrel, Esq; at that time a justice of the peace within the county of Essex, who as he came from the burning of some pious martyrs, met with John Denley, gentleman, and John Newman, (both of Maidstone in Kent) travelling upon the way, and going to visit some of their friends in the said county of Essex. And upon the sight of them, as he bragged, apprehended them upon suspicion, and searched them; and finding the confession of their faith about them in writing, sent them up with a letter unto the queen's commissioners. These commissioners dispatched them to bishop Bonner, who June 28 caused Denley and Newman, with one Patrick Packingham, to be brought into his chamber, there examining them upon their confessions, to which they all answered in effect one thing: thereupon they were commanded to appear in the bishop's consistory the fifth day of July then next coming.

ARTICLES objected by EDMUND BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON, against JOHN DENLEY, JOHN NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM, jointly and severally, the 28th of June, 1555.

FIRST, That the said Denley now is of the diocese of London, and the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

Secondly, That the said Denley hath not believed, nor doth believe, that there is any catholic church of Christ here in earth.

Thirdly, That the said Denley hath not believed, nor doth believe, that this church of England is any part or member of the said catholic church.

Fourthly, That the said Denley hath believed and doth believe, that the mass now used in this realm of England is naught, and full of idolatry and evil, and plain against God's word, and therefore he, the said Denley, hath not heard it, nor will hear it.

Fifthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that auricular confession now used in this realm of England, is not good, but contrary to God's word.

Sixthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that absolution given by the priest hearing confession, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but contrary to the same.

Seventhly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that christening of children, as it is now used in the church of England, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but against it: likewise confirming of children, giving of orders, saying of mattins and even-song, anointing of sick persons, making of holy bread and holy water, with the rest of the church.

Eighthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that there are but two sacraments in Christ's catholic church; that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the altar.

Ninthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe; that forasmuch as Christ is ascended up into heaven, therefore the very body of Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar.

Tenthly, That thou Patrick Packingham, now being of the age of twenty-one at least, being within the house of the bishop of London at St. Paul's, and by him brought to the great chapel to hear mass there, the said 23d day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1555, didst unreverently stand in the said chapel, having thy cap on thy head all the time of mass; and didst also refuse to receive holy water and holy bread at the hands of the priest, there contemning and despising both the mass, and the said holy water and holy bread.

ANSWERS to the foregoing ARTICLES.

TO the first article I answer, It is very true.

To the second article, I answer; That it is not true: for I believe the holy catholic church, which is built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head; which holy church is the congregation of faithful people dispersed through the whole world, which church doth truly preach God's holy word; and doth also administer the two sacraments, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord, according to the blessed word.

To the third article I answer, That I do believe that this church of England, using the faith and religion which is now used, is no part or member of the aforesaid catholic church, but is the church of Antichrist, the bishop of Rome being the head thereof: for it is plain, that they have altered the testament of God, and set up a testament of their own devising, full of blasphemy and lies: for Christ's testament is, that he would have all things done to the edifying of the people; as it appeareth when he taught them to pray, Matth. vi. and also it appeareth by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv. for he saith, that "He that prophesieth, speaketh unto men for their edifying, for their exhortation, and for their comfort; he that speaketh with the tongue, profiteth himself; he that prophesieth, edifieth the congregation."

Also he saith, "Even so likewise when you speak with tongues, except you speak words that have signification, how shall it be understood what is spoken? for you shall but speak in the air, that is as much as to say, in vain."

To the fourth article I answer, and I do believe (as I said before), That the mass now used in this realm of England, is naught, and abominable idolatry and blasphemy against God's holy word; for Christ in his holy supper instituted the sacrament of bread and wine to be eaten together in remembrance of his death till he come, and not to have them worshipped, and make an idol of them: for God will not be worshipped in his creatures, but we ought to give him praise for his creatures, which he hath created for us. For he saith in the second commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them."

To the fifth article I answer, That I do believe that auricular confession is not good as it is now used. Touching my sins wherein I have offended God, I must seek to him for remission thereof; for our Saviour saith, in the 11th of St. Matt. "Come unto me all ye that labour and are laden, I will ease you," &c. The prodigal son, Luke xv. saith, "I will arise and go to my Father, and I will say unto him, Father I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son," &c. Psal. xxxi.

To the sixth article, I the said John Denley have answered in the fifth.

To the seventh article I answer, that as touching the sacrament of baptism, which is the christening of children, it is altered and changed; for St. John used nothing but the preaching of the word and the water, as it doth appear when Christ required to be baptized of him, and others also who came to John to be baptized, as it appeareth, Matth. iii. Mark i. Luke iii. and Acts viii. the chamberlain said, See here is the water, what hindereth me to be baptized? It appeareth here that Philip had preached unto him; for he said, Here is water. We do not read, that he asked for any cream, oil, or spittle, or conjured water, or conjured wax, or crosom, or salt, for it seemeth that Philip had preached no such things to him: for he would as well have asked for them as for water: and the water was not conjured, but even as it was before.

To the eighth article I answer shortly, That there be no more sacraments than two; baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; except you will make the rainbow a sacrament: for there is no sacrament but what hath a promise annexed to it.

To the ninth article I answer you, That you have my mind written already; for it was found about me when I was taken: and you also know my mind in the fourth article, plainly expressed, concerning the bodily presence: for Christ's body is in heaven, and will not be contained in so small a piece of bread. And as the words which Christ spake are true indeed, so must they also be understood by other places of scripture which Christ spake himself, and also the apostles after him. And thus I make an end.

By me, JOHN DENLEY.

The first day of the month of July, the said three prisoners were brought into the consistory in St. Paul's, where Bonner proceeded against them after the usual form and manner of law, reading first their confessions, articles, and answers, and then tempting them sometimes with fair promises, at other times with threatenings, which indeed were generally his chief arguments and reasons. In the end, seeing their unmoveable constancy, upon the 5th of July he condemned them as heretics, and delivered them to the sheriffs of London, as to his common executioners, who kept them till they were commanded by writ to send them to their several places of suffering; and accordingly Mr. Denley was sent to Uxbridge, where he was burned on the 8th day of August; and being set in the fire, with the burning flames about him, he sung a psalm.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Denley at Uxbridge, which was the 8th of August; Mr. Patrick Packingham also suffered at the same town, about the 28th of the said month. This Packingham was charged by Bonner, (as you heard before in the tenth article) for his behaviour in the bishop's chapel; who at the mass time there standing, would not pull off his cap, which was taken for a heinous offence. Packingham being much persuaded by Bonner to recant, protested in these words to the bishop; That the church which he believed was no catholic church, but was the church of Satan, and therefore he would never turn to it; &c.

Furthermore as concerning the other, which was John Newman, pewterer, at Maidstone in Kent, he was burnt the last day of August, at Saffron-walden, in the county of Essex, whose examination and confession of his faith and belief, for which he was cruelly persecuted and burnt, here followeth.

The EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN NEWMAN.

JOHN NEWMAN, when apprehended, was first examined by Dr. Thornton, suffragan of Dover, at Tenterden. From thence he was carried to Bonner, and there condemned with Denley and Packingham. But because his examinations and answers came not then to my hands, I thought here in this place to bestow them, rather than they should be utterly suppressed.

First one of the doctors began, whose name John Newman doth not express, asking in this wise.

Doctor. How say you to this? "This is my body which is given for you?"

Newman. It is a figurative speech, one thing spoken, and another meant; as Christ saith, "I am a vine, I am a door, I am a stone, &c." Is he therefore a material stone, a vine, or a door?

Doctor. This is no figurative speech. For he saith, "This is my body which is given for you," and he saith not so of the stone, vine, or door; but that is a figurative speech.

Newman. Christ saith, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." If you will have it so meant, then let them take and eat the cup.

Doctor. Nay, that is not so meant: for it is a common phrase of speech among ourselves: we say to our friend, drink a cup of drink, and yet we mean he should drink the drink in the cup.

Newman. Why, if you will have the one so understood, you must so understand the other.

Doctor. Well, we will not stand hereabout. How say you of the real presence? Is not Christ's natural body there that was born of the virgin Mary?

Newman. No, I do not so believe; neither can I so believe; for the soul of man doth not feed upon natural things as the body doth.

Doctor. Why, how then doth it feed?

Newman. I think the soul of man doth feed as the angels in heaven, whose feeding is only the pleasure, joy, felicity, and delectation that they have of God: and so the soul of man doth feed and eat, through faith, the body of Christ.

Collins. Yea, but if the body do not feed upon natural things, the soul cannot continue with the body: therefore the body must needs feed upon natural things, that both may live together.

Newman. I grant it to be true: but yet the soul doth live otherwise than the body which doth perish: therefore natural things do but feed the body only. I pray you, what did Judas receive at the supper?

Collins. Marry, Judas did receive the very body of Christ, but it was to his damnation.

Newman. Why, was the devil entered into him before? Then he had the devil and Christ in him at one time.

Collins. Nay, the devil did enter into him afterwards.

Newman. Yea, and before too: what, do you think he had but one devil? Nay, I think he had rather a legion of devils at the latter end.

Collins. We grant that they were both in Judas at that time: for Christ may be where the devil is, if he will; but the devil cannot be where Christ is, except it please Christ.

Newman. Christ will not be in an unclean person that hath the devil.

Thornton. Why, will you not believe that Christ was in hell? and you will grant that the devil is there; and so might he be in Judas, if it pleased him.

Newman. Christ would not suffer Mary Magdalen to touch him, who sought him at his grave, and did love him intirely; much less will he suffer an ungodly man to receive him into his unclean body.

Thornton. Yes, seeing God may do all things, he may do what he list, and be where he will. And doth not the Psalm say, He is in hell, and in all places? Why should we then doubt of his being there?

Newman. Though his Godhead be in all places, yet that is not sufficient to prove that his humanity is in all places.

Thornton. No? do you not believe that God is omnipotent, and may do all things?

Newman. I do believe that God is almighty.

Thornton. Nay, but if he be omnipotent, he may do all things, and there is nothing impossible for him to do.

Newman. I know God is almighty, and can do all that he will: but he cannot make his Son a liar, he cannot deny himself, nor can he restore virginity once violated and defiled.

Thornton. What is that to your purpose? God doth not defile virginity; we speak but of things that God doth.

Newman. Why, will you have the humanity of Christ in all places as the Deity is?

Thornton. Yea, he is in all places as the Deity is, if it please him.

Newman. I promise you, that seemeth to me a very great heresy, for heaven and earth are not able to contain the divine power of God, for it is in all places, as here and in every place; and yet you say, that where-soever the Deity is, there is also the humanity; and so you will make him nobody, but a fantastical body, and not a body indeed.

Thornton. Nay, we do not say he is in all places as the Deity is, but if it please him he may be in all places with the Deity.

Newman. I promise you, that seemeth to me as great an heresy as ever I heard in my life, and I dare not grant it, lest I should deny Christ to be a very man, and that were against all the scriptures.

Thornton. Do you believe that Christ rose from death, and came through the stone?

Newman. I do believe that Christ rose from death; but I do not believe he came through the stone.

Thornton. Well, let us not stand any longer about this. Back again to the real presence. How say you, is the body of Christ really in the sacrament, or no?

Newman. I have answered you already.

Thornton. Well, do you not believe that it is there really?

Newman. No, I believe it not.

Thornton. Well, will you stand to it?

Newman. I must needs stand to it, till I be persuaded by a further truth.

Thornton. Nay, you will not be persuaded, but stand to your own opinion.

Newman. Nay, I stand not to mine own opinion, God I take to witness, but only to the scriptures of God, and that can all those that stand here witness with me, and nothing but the scriptures.

Thornton had many other questions which I did not bear away: but as I do understand, these are chief: as for taunts foolish and unlearned, he lacked none. Praise God for his gift, and God increase in us strength.

John Newman and Richard Hook suffered martyrdom about the same time at Chichester.

The EXAMINATIONS, ANSWERS, and CONDEMNATION of WILLIAM COKER, WILLIAM HOPPER, HENRY LAURENCE, RICHARD COLLIAR, RICHARD WRIGHT, and WILLIAM STERE, before the BISHOP of DOVER, and Dr. HARPSFIELD, ARCHDEACON of CANTERBURY.

MENTION was made a little before in the story of Mr. Bland, and Nicholas Sheterden, of certain other Kentish-men, who being the same time with them called forth and examined by Thornton, bishop of Dover, Dr. Harpsfield, Richard Faucet, and Robert Collins: yet notwithstanding because the condemnation and execution of them was deferred a little longer, till the latter end of the month of August; coming therefore now to the time of suffering, we will briefly touch some part of their examinations and answers as we find them in the registers. The names of these were W. Coker, W. Hopper, H. Laurence, R. Colliar, Richard Wright, and William Stere. What the articles objected to Mr. Bland and them were, you heard before. To which articles they severally answered for themselves in effect as followeth.

First, William Coker said, he would answer no otherwise than he had already answered; and being offered to have a longer respite of six days more, he refused to take it; and so upon the same, sentence of condemnation was read against him, the 11th of July.

William Hopper seemed first to grant to the faith and determination of the Roman church, but calling himself better to mind, constantly stuck to the truth, and was condemned the next week after, the 16th of July.

Henry Laurence, examined the said 16th of July, and partly deferred to the 2d of August, answered to the articles objected against him; first denying auricular confession, and that he neither had, nor would receive the sacrament, because, faith he, the order of the holy scripture is changed in the order of the sacrament.

Moreover, this said Laurence was charged for not putting off his cap, when the suffragan made mention of the sacrament, and did no reverence to the same: the said Laurence answered in these words, What? you shall not need to put off your cap: for it is not so holy that you need to put off your cap thereunto.

Further, being opposed concerning the verity of the sacrament given to Christ's disciples, he affirmed that even as Christ gave his very body to the disciples, and confessed it to be the same; so likewise Christ himself said, he was a door, &c. adding moreover, that as he had said before, so he saith still, that the sacrament of the altar is an idol, and no remembrance of Christ's passion, and contrary he knoweth not. At last being required to subscribe his answers, he wrote these words under the bill of their examinations, "You are all of Antichrist, and him you fol—and here his hand was hindered from writing any further: belike he would have written out [follow], &c. And so upon the same, sentence was given against him the 2d of August.

Richard Colliar, of Ashford above-mentioned, having the 16th of August to appear, examined of the sacrament of the popish altar, answered and said, that he did not believe, that after the consecration there is the real and substantial body of Christ, but only bread and wine, and that it is most abominable, most detestable, and most wicked to believe otherwise, &c. Upon this, sentence was read against him, and he condemned the 16th of August. After his condemnation he sung a psalm. Wherefore the priests and their officers railed at him, saying he was out of his wits.

Richard Wright, the same place and day above-mentioned, appearing, and being required of the judge what he believed of the real presence in the sacrament, answered again, that as touching the sacrament of the altar and the mass, he was ashamed to speak of it, or to name it, and that he allowed it not, as it was used in the church. Against whom the sentence was also read the day and place aforesaid.

William

William Stere, of the aforesaid parish of Ashford, likewise detected and accused, was brought to appear the said 16th day of August, where he in the chapter-house of Canterbury, being required to answer to the positions laid unto him by the judge, made answer again, That he should command his dog, and not him: and further declared, that Dick of Dover had no authority to sit against him in judgment; and asked, where was his authority? who then shewed him certain bulls and writings from Rome, as he said. William Stere denying that to be of sufficient force, the said Dick also said, he had authority from the queen. Then the martyr alledging that the archbishop of Canterbury (who was then in prison) was his diocesan, urged him to shew his authority from the archbishop, or else he denied his authority to be sufficient. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, he found it not, he said, in the scripture, and therefore he would not answer thereunto.

And moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar with reverence, and putting off his cap, William Stere told him, that he needed not to reverence that matter so highly. And thus (saying to the judge, that he was a bloody man, &c.) the sentence was pronounced against him; and after the sentence was read, he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the most blasphemous idol that ever was, &c.

And thus these six heavenly martyrs and witnesses to the truth, being condemned by the bloody suffragan and archdeacon of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Faucet, were burnt all together in the same town of Canterbury, at three stakes in one fire, about the latter end of August.

The HISTORY of ELIZABETH WARNE, Widow, Burnt at STRATFORD-BOW.

ELIZABETH WARNE, widow, was burnt in the month of August, at Stratford-Bow, near London: she was late wife of John Warne, upholsterer, and martyr, who was also burnt the latter end of the May before, as in his story is recorded.

This Elizabeth Warne had been apprehended amongst others, the first day of January, in a house in Bow-church-yard, in London, as they were gathered together in prayer, and at that present was carried to the Compter, where she remained till the 11th day of June: at which time she was brought to Newgate, and was confined there till the 2d day of July. Then was she sent by the king and queen's commissioners unto Bonner, bishop of London, who on the 6th day of the said month caused her with divers others (as Robert Smith, George Tankerfield, &c.) to be brought before him into his palace, and there examined her upon sundry articles. She was condemned as an heretic, the 12th day of the same month of July, and so delivered to the secular power, to be by them put to death, which was done in the same month.

An ACCOUNT of GEORGE TANKERFIELD, MARTYR.

GEORGE TANKERFIELD, of London, cook, born in York, about the age of twenty-seven or twenty-eight years, was in the days of king Edward a papist, till the time queen Mary came in, and then perceiving the great cruelty which the papists used, was brought into a misdoubt of their doings, and began in his heart to abhor them. His tenets being discovered, he was brought to Newgate about the last day of February, 1555, by Mr. Beard, yeoman of the guards, and Simon Ponder, pewterer, constable of St. Dunstan's in the west, sent in by Roger Chomley, knight, and Dr. Martin.

At length he was examined (with the others before mentioned) by bishop Bonner, who having endeavoured in vain, to dissuade him from his professed opinion of the idolatry and abominations of the mass; pronounced condemnation, and gave him over to the secular power.

This good man was accordingly taken, August 26, to St. Alban's to be burnt: while the faggots were set about him, there came a priest, and persuaded him to believe on the sacrament of the altar, and he would be saved. But George Tankerfield cried out vehemently, and said, I defy the whore of Babylon: fie on that abominable idol: good people, do not believe him. And then the mayor of the town commanded to set fire to the heretic, and said, if he had but one load of faggots in the whole world, he would give them to burn him. Then fire was set unto him, and he desired the sheriff and all the people to pray for him; the most part did so. And so embracing the fire, he bathed himself in it, and calling on the name of the Lord Jesus, he was quickly out of pain.

The HISTORY and EXAMINATION of ROBERT SMITH, MARTYR.

ROBERT SMITH was brought to Newgate the 5th of November, by John Matthew, yeoman of the guard of the queen's side, by the command of the council. Robert Smith first gave himself to service in the house of Sir Thomas Smith, knight, being then provost of Eaton: from thence he was preferred to Windsor, having there in the college a clerkship of ten pounds a year. Of stature he was tall and slender, active about many things, but chiefly delighting in the art of painting, which many times rather for his mind's sake, than for any gain, he did practise and exercise. In religion he was fervent, after he had once tasted the truth; wherein he was much confirmed by the preaching of Mr. Turner, of Windsor, and others. Whereupon at the coming in of queen Mary he was deprived of his clerkship by her visitors; and not long after he was apprehended, and brought to examination before Bonner.

The First EXAMINATION of ROBERT SMITH before BISHOP BONNER. Written by HIMSELF.

Bonner. HOW long is it since you were confessed to any priest?

Smith. Never since I had years of discretion. For I never saw it needful, neither commanded by God to come to shew my faults to any of that sinful number whom you call priests.

Bonner. Thou shewest thyself even at thy first speech to be a rank heretic. How long is it since you received the sacrament of the altar, and what is your opinion in the same?

Smith. I never received the same since I had years of discretion, nor ever will, by God's grace; neither do esteem the same in any point, because it hath not God's ordinance.

Bonner. What say you to the catholic church? Do you not confess there is one in earth?

Smith. Yes verily, I believe that there is one catholic church, or faithful congregation, which, as the apostle saith, is built upon the prophets and apostles, Christ Jesus being the head corner stone: which church in all her words and works maintaineth the word, and bringeth the same for her authority, and without it doth nothing, nor ought to do, of which I am assured I am by grace made a member.

Bonner. You shall understand, that I am bound when my brother offendeth, and will not be reconciled, to bring him before the congregation: now if your church be the same, where may a man find it, to bring his brother before the same?

Smith. It is written in the Acts of the apostles, that when the tyranny of the bishops was so great against the church in Jewry, they were faine to assemble in houses and secret places, as they now do; and yet were they nevertheless the church of God: and seeing they had their matters redressed being shut up in a corner, may not we do the like now-a-days?

Bonner. Yea, their church was known full well. For St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, to have the man punished and excommunicated, that had committed evil with his father's wife. Whereby we may well perceive it was a known church; but your's is not known.

Smith. Then could you not persecute it as you do: but as you say the church of God at Corinth was manifest both to God and St. Paul; even so is this church of God in England, which you persecute, both known to God, and also even to the very wicked, although they know not, nor will know their truth nor conversation.

Bonner. Well, thou sayest that the church of God was only at Corinth, when St. Paul writ unto them, and so will I put in writing, shall I?

Smith. I do greatly marvel, my lord, that you are not ashamed to lay snares for your brethren on this manner. This is now the third snare you have laid for me. First, to make me confess that the church of England is not the church of Christ. Secondly, to say it is not known. Thirdly, to say the church of God is not universal, but particular. And this is not the office of a bishop. For if an innocent had come in your way, you would have done your best, I see, to have entangled him.

Well, friend, said Dr. Harpsfield, you are no innocent, as it appeareth.

Smith. By the grace of God I am that I am; and this grace in me, I hope, is not in vain.

Well, said Bonner, laughing, tell me, how sayest thou of the church?

Smith. I told you whereon the true church is built, and I affirm in England to be the congregation of God, and also in omnem terram; as it is writen, "Their sound is gone forth into all lands," and this is the afflicted and persecuted church, which ye cease not to imprison, slay, and kill. And in Corinth was not all the congregation of God, but a number of those holy and elect people of God. For neither Paul nor Peter were present at Corinth when they wrote, and yet were they of the church of God, as many thousands more which also communicate in that Holy Spirit.

Bonner. What call you catholic, and what call you church?

Smith. Catholic is universal, and church is a congregation knit together in unity.

Then after much like talk, it was laid to my charge that my fellow and I spake one thing. For which I praised God, and was sent again to the garden. Where, after a while, as I and brother Harwood had been together, came one of my lord's chaplains, that much desired to commune with me, demanding first if I were a prisoner.

Smith. I am in this flesh a prisoner, and subject to my master and your's; but I hope yet the Lord's free man through Christ Jesus.

Doctor. I do much desire to talk to you lovingly, because you are a man that I much lament.

To which I answered, Sub melle latet venenum. And after much ado about his god, I compelled him to say, that it must needs enter into the belly, and so fall into the draught.

Doctor. What derogation was it to Christ, when the Jews spit in his face?

Smith. If the Jews, being his enemies, did spit in his face, and we being his friends throw him into the draught, which of us have deserved the greatest damnation? Then by your argument, he that doth injury to Christ, shall have a most plenteous salvation.

Then the doctor started away, and would have his humanity incomprehensible, making a comparison between the soul of man and the body of Christ, bringing in to serve his turn, which way Christ came in among his disciples, the doors being shut?

Smith. Although it be said, that when he came the doors were shut, yet have I as much to prove, that the doors opened at his coming as you have to prove he came through the door. For that almighty God who brought the disciples out of prison, which yet when search was made was found shut, was able to let Christ in at the door, although it were shut: and yet it maketh not for your purpose.

At which answer when he had made many scoffings, he went from me, and we were carried into my lord's hall, where we were baited by my lord's band of servants almost all the day, until our keeper seeing their rudeness, shut us all up in a handsome chamber, while my lord went into his synagogue to condemn Mr. Denley and John Newman.

Then they brought my lord mayor up into the chamber where my lord intended to sup, to hear the matter; and I was the first that was called; where my lord mayor being set with the bishop and one of the sheriffs, wine was flowing on every side, whilst I stood before them like a mute; which made me remember how Pilate and Herod were made friends, but no man was sorry for Joseph's hurt. But after my lord had well drank, my articles were sent for and read, and he demanded whether I did say as was written?

Smith. That I have said, I have said, and what I have said I do mean.

Bonner. Well, my lord mayor, your lordship hath heard in some measure, what a stout heretic this is, and that his articles have deserved death: yet nevertheless, forasmuch as they report me to seek blood, and call me bloody Bonner, whereas God knoweth, I never sought any man's blood in all my life, I have kept him from the consistory this day, whither I could have brought him justly; I desire him to turn, and I will with all speed dispatch him out of his trouble; and this I profess before your lordship and all this audience.

Smith. Why, my lord, do you put on this fair vizard before my lord mayor, to make him believe that you seek not my blood, to cloak your murders, through my stoutness, as you call it? Have you not had my brother Tomkins before you, whose hand when you burned most cruelly, you burned also his body, and not only him, but a great many of the members of Christ, men that feared God, and lived virtuously, and also the queen's majesty's most true subjects, as their goods and bodies have made manifest? And seeing in these saints you have shewed so little mercy, shall it seem to my lord and this audience that you shew me more favour? No, no, my lord. But if you mean as you say, why then do you examine me of what I am not bound to answer you?

Bonner. Well, what sayest thou by the sacrament of the altar? Is it not the very body of Christ; flesh, blood, and bone, as it was born of the virgin?

Smith. I have answered that it is none of God's order nor a sacrament, but man's own vain invention, and shewed him the Lord's institution. But when he was so earnest before the audience, declaring that we knew nothing, bringing out his Hoc est corpus meum to lay in my dish; I proved before the audience that it was a dead god, declaring the distinction appointed between two creatures of bread and wine, and that a body without blood hath no life. At which Harpsfield found himself much offended, and took the tale out of my lord's mouth, saying,

Harpsfield. I will prove by the scriptures, that you blasphemous God in so saying: for it is given in two parts, because there are two things shewed, that is to say, his body and his passion, as saith St. Paul; and therefore the bread is his body, and the wine the representation of his death and blood-shedding.

Smith.

Smith. You falsify the word, and rack it to serve your purpose. For the wine was not only the shewing of his passion, but the bread also. For our Saviour saith, "So often as you do this, do it in remembrance of me." And St. Paul saith, "So oft as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you shall shew the Lord's death till he come." And here is as much reverence given to the one as to the other. Wherefore if the bread be his body, the cup must be his blood, and as well you make his body in the cup, as his blood in the bread.

Then my lord rose up, and went to the table, where the lord mayor desired me to save my soul. To whom I answered, I hope it was saved through Christ Jesus; desiring him to have pity on his own soul, and remember whose sword he carried.

On which I was carried into the garden, and there abode till the rest of my friends were examined, and then were we sent away to Newgate with many foul farewells, my lord bishop giving the keeper a charge to lay me in limbo.

Second EXAMINATION of ROBERT SMITH, before BISHOP BONNER.

UPON Saturday, at eight o'clock, I was brought to his chamber again, and there examined by him as followeth.

Bonner. Thou Robert Smith, &c. sayest that there is no catholic church here on earth.

Smith. You have heard me both speak the contrary, and you have writing as a witness of the same.

Bonner. Yes, but I must ask this question: how sayest thou?

Smith. Must you of necessity begin with a lie? It maketh manifest that you determine to the end with the same. But there shall no liars enter into the kingdom of God. Nevertheless, if you will be answered, ask mine articles that were written yesterday, and they shall tell you that I have confessed a church of God, as well in earth as in heaven, and yet all one church, and one man's members, even Christ Jesus.

Bonner. Well, what sayest thou to auricular confession? Is it not necessary to be used in Christ's church? and wilt thou not be confessed by the priest?

Smith. It is not needful to be used in Christ's church, as I answered yesterday. But if it be needful for your church, it is to pick men's pockets; and such pick-pocket matters is all the whole rabble of your ceremonies: for all that you maintain is but money-matters.

Bonner. Why, how art thou able to prove that confession is a pick-pocket matter? Art thou not ashamed to say so?

Smith. I speak by experience: for I have both heard and seen the fruits of the same. For first it hath been, we see, a betrayer of king's secrets, and the secrets of other men's consciences; who being delivered, and glad to be discharged from their sins, have given great sums of money to priests to absolve them, and sing masses for their souls' health.

And for example, I began to bring in a pageant, that by report was played at St. Thomas of Acres, and where I was when a child, waiting on a gentleman of Norfolk, which being bound in conscience, through the persuasion of the priest, gave away a great quantity of his goods, and forgave unto one Mr. Gresham a large sum of money, and to another as much. The priest for his part had a good share, and the house had an annuity to keep him: which thing when his brother heard, he came to London, and after a declaration made to the council, how by the subtilty of the priest he had robbed his wife and children, recovered a great part again, to the value of two or three hundred pounds, of Mr. Gresham and his other friend; but what he gave to the house could not be recovered. This story I began to tell; but when my lord saw it favoured not to his purpose, he began to revile me, and said, By the mass, if the queen's majesty were of my mind, thou shouldst not come to talk before any man, but shouldst be put in a sack, with a dog in the same, and be thrown into a river.

Smith. I know you speak by practice, as much as by speculation, for both you and your predecessors have sought all possible means to kill Christ secretly; witness Mr. Hunne, whom your predecessor caused to be thrust in at the nose with hot burning needles, and then to be hanged, and gave it out that the said Hunne hanged himself: and also a good brother of your's, a bishop of your profession, having in his prison an innocent man, whom, because he could not overcome by scripture, he caused to be privately strangled, and his flesh to be torn and plucked away with a pair of pincers; and bringing him before the people, said, the rats had eaten him. Thus according to your oath is all your dealing, and hath been; and as you, taking upon you the office, do not without oaths open your mouth, no more do you without murder maintain your traditions.

Bonner. Ah, you are a generation of liars; there is not one true word that cometh out of your mouths.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I have said that Jesus Christ is dead for my sins, and risen for my justification, and this is no lie.

Then Bonner made his man to put in my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and would have me recite it again: which when I would not do, he made his man to put in such fums as he imagined. At the end of this fir John Mordaunt came in, and sat down to hear my examination. Then said my lord, How sayest thou, Smith, to the seven sacraments? Believest thou not that they be of God's order, that is to say, the sacrament of, &c.

Smith. I believe that in God's church are but two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of regeneration, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper: and as for the sacrament of the altar, and all your sacraments, they may well serve your church, but God's church hath nothing to do with them, neither have I any thing to do to answer them, nor you to examine me of them.

Bonner. Why, is God's order changed in baptism? In what point do we dissent from the word of God?

Smith. First, in hallowing your water; in conjuring of the same; in baptizing children with anointing and spitting in their mouths, mingled with salt, and with many other lewd ceremonies, of which not one point is able to be proved in God's order.

Bonner. By the mass, this is the most unshame-faced heretic that ever I heard speak.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you catch me at my words: but I will watch thee as well, I warrant thee.

By my troth, my lord, said fir John Mordaunt, I never heard the like in all my life. But I pray you, my lord, mark well his answer for baptism. He disalloweth therein holy ointment, salt, and such other laudable ceremonies, which no christian man will deny.

Smith. That is a shameful blasphemy against Christ, so to use any mingle mangle in baptizing young infants.

Bonner. I believe, I tell thee, that if they die before they be baptized, they be damned.

Smith. You shall never be saved by that belief. But I pray you, my lord, shew me, are we saved by water, or by Christ?

Bonner. By both.

Smith. Then the water died for our sins: and so must you say, that the water hath life, and it being our servant, and created for us, is our Saviour. This, my lord, is a good doctrine, is it not?

Bonner. Why, how understandest thou the scriptures? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

And again, "Suffer (saith our Saviour) these children to come unto me:" and if thou wilt not suffer them to be baptized after the laudable order, thou hindereest them to come unto Christ.

Smith. Where you alledge St. John, "Except a man be born," &c. and will thereby prove the water to save, and so the deed or work to save and put away sins, I will send you to St. Paul, who asketh of the Galatians, "Whether they received the Spirit by the deeds of the law, or by the preaching of faith? and there concludeth that the Holy Ghost accompanieth the preaching of of faith, and with the word of faith entereth into the heart. So now if baptism preacheth to me the washing in Christ's blood, so doth the Holy Ghost accompany it, and it is unto me as a preacher and not a Saviour. And where you say, I hinder the children to come unto Christ, it is manifest by our Saviour's words that you hinder them to come, that will not suffer them to come unto him without the necessity of water. For he saith, Suffer them to come unto me, and not unto the water; and therefore if you condemn them, you condemn both the merits and words of Christ. For our Saviour saith, "Except ye turn and become as children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And so I brought out many other examples, to make manifest that Christ hath cleansed original sin, bringing in examples out of the scriptures for the same.

Bonner. Then thou makest the water of none effect, then put away water.

Smith. "It is not (saith St. Peter) the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience consenteth unto God." And to prove that water only bringeth not the Holy Ghost, it is written in Acts viii. that Simon received water, but would have received the Holy Ghost for money. Also that the Holy Ghost hath come before baptism. Yea, and although your generation have set at nought the word of God, and like swine turned his words upside down, yet must his church keep the same in that order which he left them, which his church dare not break; and to judge children damned that be not baptized, it is wicked.

Mordaunt. By our lady, sir, but I believe that if my child die without water, he is damned.

Bonner. Yea, and so do I, and all catholic men, good Mr. Mordaunt.

Smith. Well, my lord, such catholic, such salvation!

Bonner. Well, sir, what say you to the sacrament of orders?

Smith. You may call it the sacrament of mis-orders: for all orders are appointed of God. But as for your shaving, anointing, greasing, poling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not so disfigure yourself as you do.

Bonner. Sayest thou so? Now, by my troth, I will go shave myself to anger thee withal; and so he sent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber, he shaved himself, desiring me before he went, to answer to these articles.

Bonner. What say you to holy bread and holy water, to the sacrament of anointing, and to all the rest of such ceremonies of the church?

Smith. I say they be baubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in, and therefore they may go among the refuse. Then Mr. Mordaunt went away, and my lord went to be shaved, leaving there certain doctors, as he called them, to try what they could do, by whom I was baited for half an hour; of whom I also asked this question, Where were you all the days of king Edward, that you spake not that which you speak now?

Doctors. We were in England.

Smith. Yea, but then you had the faces of men, but now you put on lions' faces again, as saith St. John, "Ye shew yourselves as full of malice, as ye may be." For you have for every time a vizor; yea, and if another king Edward should arise, you would then say, Down with the pope, for he is Antichrist, and so are all his angels.

Then I was reviled and sent away, and brought in again before these men; and one of them that baited me before, asked me if I disallowed confession?

Smith. Look in mine articles, and they shall shew you what I allow.

Doctor. Your articles confess that you allow not auricular confession.

Smith. I allow it not, because the word alloweth it not, nor commandeth it.

Doctor. Why, it is written, thou shalt not hide thy sins, and offences.

Smith. No more do I when I confess them to Almighty God.

Doctor. Why you cannot say that you can hide them from God, and therefore you must understand the words are spoken to be uttered to them that do not know them.

Smith. You have made a good answer, then the priest must confess himself to me, as well as I to him; for I know his faults and secrets no more than he knoweth mine. But if you confess to the priest and not unto God, you shall have the reward that Judas had: for he confessed himself to the priest, and presently went and hanged himself; and so many as do not acknowledge their faults to God, are said to hide them.

Doctor. What did they that came to John to be baptized?

Smith. They came and confessed their sins to Almighty God.

Doctor. And not unto John?

Smith. If it were unto John, as you are not able to prove, yet it was to God, before John and the whole congregation.

Doctor. Why, John was alone in the wilderness.

Smith. Why, and yet the scriptures say he had many disciples, and that many pharisees and sadducees came to his baptism. Here the scriptures and you agree not. And if they confessed themselves to John, as you say, it was to all the congregation, as St. Paul doth to Timothy, and to all that read his epistle, in opening to all the hearers, that he was not worthy to be called an apostle, because he had been a tyrant. But as for ear-confession, you never heard it allowed by the word. For the prophet David made his confession unto God, and saith, "I will confess my sins unto the Lord." Daniel maketh his confession unto the Lord; Judith, Toby, Jeremy, Manasseh, with all the forefathers, did even so. For the Lord hath said, "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee." Knock, ask, seek, with such like; and this is the word of God: now bring somewhat of the word to help yourself withal. Then they raged, and called me dog, and said I was damned.

Smith. Nay, you are dogs, that because holy things are offered, will slay your friends. For I may say with St. Paul, "I have fought with beasts in the likeness of men." For here I have been baited these two days, of my lord, and his great bulls of Basan, and in his hall beneath have I been baited of the rest of his band. With this came my lord from shaving, and asked me how I liked him.

Smith. Forsooth, you are even so wise as you were before you were shaven.

Bonner. How standeth it, Mr. Doctors, have you done any good?

Doctor. No, by my troth, my lord, we can do no good.

Smith. Then it is fulfilled which is written, "How can an evil tree bring forth good fruit?"

Bonner. Nay, naughty fellow, I set these gentlemen to bring thee home to Christ.

Smith. Such gentlemen, such Christs! and as truly as they have that name from Christ, so truly do they teach Christ.

Bonner. Well, wilt thou neither hear them nor me?

Smith. Yes, I am compelled to hear you; but you cannot compel me to follow you.

Bonner. Well, thou shalt be burnt at a stake in Smithfield, if thou wilt not turn.

Smith. And you shall burn in hell, if you repent not: but, my lord, to put you out of doubt, because I am weary, I will strain courtesy with you: I perceive you will not with your doctors come unto me, and I am determined not to come unto you, by God's grace. For I have hardened my face against you as hard as brass. Then after many railing sentences I was sent away.

And thus have I left the truth of mine answers in writing, gentle reader, being compelled by my friends to do it: that you may see how the Lord hath according to his promise given me a mouth and wisdom to answer in

The Last EXAMINATION of Mr. SMITH.

THE 12th of July I was with my brethren brought into the consistory, and mine articles read before my lord mayor and sheriffs, with all the assistants; to which I answered, as followeth.

Bonner. By my faith, my lord mayor, I have shewed him as much favour as any man living might do: but I perceive all is lost, both in him and all his company.

At this word, which was coupled with an oath, Mr. Smith came in, and said to the bishop, My lord, it is written, "You must not swear."

Bonner. Ah, Mr. Controller, are you come? Lo, my lord mayor, this is Mr. Speaker, pointing to my brother Tankerfield; and this is Mr. Controller, pointing to me. And then beginning to read my articles, he persevered till he came to my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and then demanded of my lord mayor, if he had heard of the same before. To which he answered, No. To whom I said:

Smith. My lord mayor, will it please you to hear me recite it, as I heard it, and told it, and then you shall hear the truth? For this tale that my lord hath told is untrue.

Bonner. How say you, good Mr. Mordaunt, spake he not this here as it is written? Were you not by?

Mordaunt. Yes, my lord, that it is: I heard him say it.

Smith. How heard you me say it, and were not present when I spake it? It is manifestly proved what the prophet saith: "Even as the king saith, so saith the judge, that he may do him a pleasure again." And then my jailor was brought out for proof thereof, who there openly professed that neither Mr. Mordaunt, nor the doctors before-mentioned, were present when I spake it.

At which Mr. Mordaunt, with blushing cheeks, said, he heard them read, and heard me affirm the same; which also was not true. Then my lord proceeded with the rest of my articles, demanding of me if I said not as was written. To which I answered, No. And turning to my lord mayor, I said, I require you, my lord mayor, in God's behalf, unto whom pertaineth your sword and justice, that I may here before your presence answer to these objections that are laid against me, and have probation of the same; and if any thing that I have said, or will say, be proved (as my lord saith) heresy, I shall not only with all my heart forsake the same, and cleave to the truth, but also recant wheresoever you shall assign me, and all this audience shall be witnesses to the same.

Lord Mayor. Why, Smith, thou canst not deny but this thou saidst.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I deny that which he hath written, because he hath both added to, and diminished from the same: but what I have spoken I will never deny.

Lord Mayor. Why thou speakest against the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Smith. I denied it to be any sacrament, and I do stand here to make probation of the same; and if my lord or any of his doctors be able to prove either the name or usage of the same, I will recant mine error. Then spake my brother Tankerfield, and defended the probation of things which they call heresy. To which the bishop answered, By my troth, Mr. Speaker, you shall preach at a stake.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, I am no faint.

Smith. No, my lord, nor yet a good bishop. For a bishop, saith St. Paul, should be faultless, and a vessel dedicated unto God; and are you not ashamed to sit in judgment and be a blasphemer, condemning innocents?

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you are faultless.

Smith. My lord mayor, I require you in God's name, that I may have justice. We be here to-day a great many innocents wrongfully accused of heresy. And I require you, if you will not seem to be partial, let me have no more favour at your hands, than the apostle had at the hands of Festus and Agrippa, who being heathens and infidels, gave him leave not only to speak for himself, but also heard the probation of his cause. This require I at your hands, who being a christian judge, I hope will not deny me that right, which the heathen have suffered: if you do, then shall all this audience, yea, and the heathen, speak shame of your fact. For all that do well come to the light, and they that do evil hate the light. Then the lord mayor hanging down his head, said nothing, but the bishop told me, I should preach at the stake, and so the sheriff cried with the bishop, away with me.

Then I came in before them four times, desiring justice, but could have none: and at length my friends required the same with one voice, and could not have it; so we had sentence; and then being carried out, were brought in again, and received it separately. But before the bishop gave me sentence, he told me, in derision of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I answered, My lord, you fill the people's ears with fantasies and foolish tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if you were a true bishop, you would leave these railing sentences, and speak the words of God.

Bonner. Well, I have offered to that naughty fellow, Mr. Speaker, your companion the cook, that my chancellor should here instruct him, but he hath with great disdain refused it. How sayest thou, wilt thou have him instruct thee, and lead thee into the right way?

Smith. My lord, if your chancellor will do me any good, and take any pains, as you say, let him take mine articles in his hands, that you have objected against me, and either prove one of them heresy, or any thing that you do to be good: and if he be able so to do, I stand here with all my heart to hear him; if not, I have no need, I praise God, of his sermon: for I come to answer for my life, and not to hear a sermon.

Then began the sentence, "In the name of God," &c. To which I answered, that he began in a wrong name, requiring of him, where he learned in scripture to give sentence of death against any man for his conscience sake. To which he made no answer, but went forward to the end, and immediately cried, Away with him. Then I turned to the mayor, and said, Is it not enough for you, my lord mayor, and you that are the sheriffs, that you have left the straight way of the Lord, but you must condemn Christ causeless?

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, now you cannot say, but I have offered you fair, to have instruction. And now, I pray thee, call me Bloody Bishop, and say I seek thy blood.

Smith. Well, my lord, if neither I nor any of this congregation do report the truth of your fact, yet shall these stones cry it out, rather than it shall be hidden.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

Woodrofe. Away with him, take him away.

Smith. Well, good friends, you have seen and heard the great wrong that we have received this day, and you are all witnesses that we have desired the probation of our cause by God's book, and it hath not been granted: but we are condemned, and our cause not heard. Nevertheless, my lord mayor, forasmuch as you have here exercised God's sword causeless, and will not hear the right of the poor, I commit my cause to Almighty God, who will judge all men according to right, before whom we shall both stand without authority; and there will I stand in the right, and have judgment, to your great confusion, except you repent, which the Lord grant you to do, if it be his will. And then I was with the rest of my brethren carried away to Newgate.

While he was in prison, he wrote several letters to his friends, some in verse, and others in prose. A specimen of which follows.

LETTER I.

THE God that giveth life and light,
 And leadeth into rest:
 That breaketh bonds, and bringeth out
 The poor that are opprest:
 And keepeth mercy for the meek,
 His treasure and his store:
 Increase thy life in perfect love,
 Both now and evermore.
 That as thou hast begun to ground
 In faith and fervent love,
 Thou may'st be made a mighty mount,
 That never may remove.
 That thine ensample may be shew'd,
 Among all thine increase;
 That they may live and learn the like,
 And pass their time in peace.
 Thy salutations that were sent,
 I heartily retain;
 And send thee seventy times as much,
 To thee and thine again.
 And now because I know the gaol
 That thou dost most desire;
 I send thee here a paper full,
 As fired in the fire.
 In hope thou wilt accept it well,
 Although it be but small;
 Because I have no other good,
 To make amends withal.
 For all thy free and friendly facts,
 Which thy good will hath wrought,
 I send thee surely for a shift
 The thing that cost me nought.
 Abstain from all ungodliness,
 In dread direct your days:
 Possess not sin in any wise;
 Beware of wicked ways.
 Hold fast your faith unfeignedly;
 Build as you have begun:
 And arm yourself in perfect faith,
 To do as ye have done:
 Lest that the wicked make a mock
 At what ye take in hand,
 In leaving of the perfect rock,
 To build upon the sand.
 Beware of filthy pharisees,
 Their building is in blood:
 Eat not with them in any wise,
 Their leaven is not good.
 Their salt is all unsavory:
 And under good intents
 They maintain all their knavery,
 And murder innocents.
 They seek to sit in Christ his seat,
 And put him out of place:
 And make all means that may be made,
 His doings to deface.
 They keep him down with bills and bats,
 That made the blind to see:
 They make a god for mice and rats,
 And say the same is he.
 They look like sheep, and act like wolves,
 Their baits be all for blood:
 They kill and slay the simple souls,
 And rob them of their good:
 The dark illusions of the devil
 Have dimmed so their eyes,
 That they cannot abide the truth
 To stir in any wise.
 And if ye keep the perfect path,
 (As I have hope you do)
 Ye shall be sure to have such shame
 As they may put you to.
 For all that lead a godly life,
 Shall surely suffer loss:
 Likewise the world will seek their shame,
 And make them kiss the cross.

Ye shall be killed all, faith Christ:
 Your sorrows shall not cease:
 And yet in your afflictions
 I am your perfect peace.
 For in the world ye shall have woe,
 Because ye are unknown:
 Also because ye hate the world,
 The world will love his own.
 Be fervent therefore to the death,
 Against all their decrees:
 And God shall surely fight for thee,
 Against thine enemies.
 Commit your cause unto the Lord,
 Revenge not any ill;
 And thou shalt see the wicked want,
 When thou shalt have thy will.
 For all afflictions that may fall,
 That they can say or do:
 They are not sure of all the wealth,
 That we attain unto.
 For I have seen the sinners spread
 Their branches like a bay;
 And yet ere one could turn his head,
 Were wither'd clean away.
 Beware that money make you not
 In riches to arise!
 Against the goodness of the Lord,
 Among the worldly wise.
 For many mischiefs it hath made,
 That may not be express'd:
 And many ills it hath begun,
 Which may not be redress'd.
 For money maketh many a one
 In riches to rebel,
 And he that maketh gold a god,
 He hath a soul to sell.
 It maketh kings to kill and slay,
 And waste their wits in war;
 In leaving of the wolf at home,
 To hunt the fox afar.
 And where they should see justice done,
 And set their realm in rest;
 By money they be made a means
 To see the poor opprest.
 It maketh lords obey the laws,
 That they do ill and naught;
 It maketh bishops suck the blood,
 That God hath dearly bought.
 And where they should be faithful friends,
 And fathers to their flock,
 By money they do turn about,
 Ev'n like a weather-cock.
 The priest doth make a money mean,
 To have again his whores,
 To put away his wedded wife,
 And children out of doors.
 It holdeth back the husbandman,
 Which may not be forboren;
 And will not suffer him to sow,
 And cast abroad his corn.
 In like case it doth let again,
 When that the seed they sow;
 It choaketh up the corn again,
 So that it cannot grow.
 The husband he would have a wife,
 With nobles new and old:
 The wife would have the husband hang'd,
 That she might have his gold.
 It maketh murd'ers many a one,
 And beareth much with blood:
 The child would see the parents slain,
 To seize upon their good.
 And though it be a blessed thing
 Created in the kind;
 It is a necessary ill
 Annexed to the mind.
 For whoso playeth with the pitch,
 His fingers are defil'd;

And he that maketh gold a god,
 Shall surely be beguil'd.
 Be friendly to the fatherless,
 And all that are oppress'd:
 Assist them always out of hand,
 And see them set at rest.
 In all your doings and your deeds,
 Let mercy still remain;
 For with the measure that you mete,
 Shall ye be met again.
 Be always lowly in your life;
 Let love enjoy her own:
 The highest trees are seldom sure,
 And soonest overthrown.
 The lions lack and suffer sore,
 In hunger and in thirst:
 And they that do oppress the poor
 Continue still accurst.
 The bee is but a little beast
 In body or in fight,
 And yet she bringeth more increase
 Than either crow or kite.
 Therefore beware in any wise
 Keep well your watch alway:
 Be sure of oil within your lamp;
 Let not your light decay.
 For death despiseth them that lack,
 And hateth them that have;
 And treadeth down the rich and poor
 Together in the grave.
 Exhort your children to be chaste,
 Rebuke them for their ill,
 And let them not in any wise
 Be wedded to their will.
 Laugh not with them, but keep them low
 Shew them no merry cheer,
 Lest thou do weep with them also;
 But bring them up in fear.
 And let your light and living shine,
 That ye be not suspected
 To have the same within yourself,
 For which they are corrected.
 Be meek and modest, in a mean
 Let all your deeds be done,
 That they which are without the law
 May see how right ye run.
 Keep well the member in your mouth,
 Your tongue see that ye tame;
 For out of little sparks of fire
 Proceedeth forth a flame.
 And as the poison doth express
 The nature of the toad;
 Ev'n so the tongue do manifest
 The heart that feareth God.
 For therewith blest we God above,
 And therewith curse we men;
 And thereby murders do arise,
 Through women now and then.
 And seeing God hath given a tongue,
 And put it under power,
 The surest way it is, to set
 A hatch before the door.
 For God hath set you in a seat
 Of double low degree;
 First unto God, and then to man,
 A subject for to be.
 I write not that I see in you
 These things to be suspected,
 But only set before your face,
 How sin should be corrected.
 For flesh and blood I know ye are,
 As other women be;
 And if ye dwell in flesh and blood,
 There is infirmity.
 Receive a warning willingly,
 That to thy teeth is told:
 Account the gift of greater price
 Than if he gave thee gold.

A wise man will, saith Solomon;
 A warning soon embrace:
 A fool will sooner (as he saith),
 Be smitten on the face.
 And as your members must be dead
 From all things that are vain;
 Ev'n so by baptism ye are born
 To live with Christ again.
 Thus farewell free and faithful friend;
 The Lord that is above
 Increase in thee a perfect faith,
 And lead thee in his love.
 And as I pray with perfect love,
 And pour out bitter tears
 For you and all that are at large
 Abroad among the briers;
 Ev'n so I pray thee to prefer
 My person and my bands,
 Unto the everlasting God
 That hath me in his hands.
 That I may pass out of this pond,
 Wherein I am oppress'd,
 Inclosed in a clod of clay,
 That here can have no rest.
 That as he hath begun in me—
 His mercies many one,
 I may attain to overtake
 My brethren that are gone.
 That when the death shall do his worst,
 Where he shall point a place,
 I may be able like a man
 To look him in the face.
 For though he catch away my cloak,
 My body unto dust:
 Yet am I sure to have a soul,
 When death hath done his worst.
 And though I leave a little dust
 Dissolved without blood;
 I shall receive it safe again,
 When God shall see it good.
 For my Redeemer I am sure
 Doth live for evermore,
 And sitteth high upon the heavens,
 For whom I hunger sore.
 Ev'n as the dear with deadly wounds
 Escaped from the spoil,
 Doth haste by all the means he may
 To seek unto the soil.
 Of whom I hope to have a crown,
 That always shall remain;
 And to enjoy a perfect peace,
 For all my woe and pain.
 The God that giveth all increase,
 And seeketh still to save,
 Abound in thee that perfect peace,
 Which I do hope to have.
 And I beseech the living God
 To hold thee in his hands,
 And wish thee ev'n with all my heart,
 The blessing of my bands;
 Which I esteem of higher price
 Than pearl or precious stone;
 And shall endure for evermore,
 When earthly things are gone.

Letter II. is a poetical exhortation to his children: and Letter III. another to his brother, respecting the education of his daughter.

L E T T E R IV.

To all who love GOD unfeignedly, and intend to lead a GODLY LIFE according to his GOSPEL.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.
 Be not afraid, most dearly beloved in our Saviour
 Jesus Christ, at these most perilous days, wherein by 3 W the

the sufferance of God, the prince of darkness is broken loose, and rageth in his members against the elect of God with all cruelty, to set up the kingdom of anti-christ: against whom see that you be strong in faith, to resist his most devilish doctrine with the pure gospel of God, arming yourselves with patience to abide whatsoever shall be laid to your charge for the truth's sake, knowing that thereunto you be called, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him. O how happy are you that in the sight of God are counted worthy to suffer for the testimony of Christ! Quiet therefore yourselves, O my loving brethren, and rejoice in him for whom you suffer: for unto you do remain the unspeakable joys, which neither the eye hath seen, nor the ear hath heard, neither the heart of man is able to comprehend in any wise. Be not afraid of bodily death, for your names are written in the book of life. And the prophets do record, that in the sight of the lord precious is the death of his saints. Watch therefore and pray, that you be not prevented in the day of temptation. Now cometh the day of your trial, wherein the waters rage, and the stormy winds blow. Now shall it appear whether you have built upon the fleeting sand, or upon the immoveable rock Christ, which is the foundation of the apostles and prophets: whereon every house that is built, groweth into an holy temple of the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost. Now approacheth the day of your battle, wherein it is required that you shew yourselves the valient soldiers of Christ Jesus, with the armour of God, that you may stand fast against the crafty assaults of the devil. Christ is your captain, and you be his soldiers, whose cognizance is the cross, to which he willingly humbled himself even unto death, and thereby spoiled his enemies, and now he triumpheth over them in the glory of his Father, making intercession for them that here do remain to suffer the afflictions that are to be fulfilled in his mystical body.

It behoveth, therefore, every one that would be counted his scholar, to take up his own cross and follow him, as you have him for example: and I assure you that he being on your side, nothing shall be able to prevail against you. And that he will be with you even to the world's end, you have his promise in Matth. xxviii. He will go forth with his host as a conqueror to make a conquest. He is the man that sitteth on the white horse, crowned with immortality, and you brethren are his fellowship, whereof he is the head. He hath your heart in his hand, as a bow bent after his godly will; he shall direct the same according to the riches of his glory, into all spiritual and heavenly cogitations. He is faithful, and will not suffer you to be further assaulted, than he will give you strength to overcome, and in the most danger he will make a way that you may be able to bear it.

Shrink not therefore, dear hearts, when you shall be called to answer for the hope that is in you: for we have the Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, which was sent from the heavens to teach us: he shall speak in us, he shall strengthen us: what is he then that shall be able to confound us? Nay, what tyrant is he that now boasteth himself of his strength to do mischief, whom the Lord shall not with the same Spirit, by the mouth of his servants, strike down to hell-fire? Yea, suddenly will the Lord bring down the glory of the proud Philistines, by the hands of his servant David. Their strength is in the spear and shield, but our help is in the name of the Lord, which made both heaven and earth. He is our buckler and wall, and a strong tower of defence. He is our God, and we are his people. He shall bring the counsels of the ungodly to nought. He shall take them in their own net. He shall destroy them in their own inventions.

Acquit yourselves like men against the enemies of God in all humility of mind; be strong in spirit to acknowledge one God, one holy Saviour Jesus Christ, one only, everlasting and sufficient sacrifice for the remission of sins, even the precious body of the Lord Jesus once offered for all and for ever. Who now sitteth at the right hand of God, and from thence shall he come to judge both the quick and the dead at the last day; and until that time occupieth the blessed body none other place to dwell in, to be kept in, to be enclosed in, but only in the heavens, even in the glorious Majesty of God, personally abiding there in the flesh, not coming down from thence till the last hour. And as he never ceaseth to be man, so doth he never lose the similitude of man; his body there hath his lineaments, he leaveth them not, so hath that body there his highness, and shrinketh not, and his bodily shape he altereth not at any time. He is, in that he took of the virgin Mary, a natural man in all conditions, except sin.

And what he took of his blessed mother, by the working of the Holy Ghost, he took it for ever, and will not exchange the same for any other. He took the shape of man with the substance of his manhood, in one sacred womb. There were they two coupled together by the Holy Ghost, never to be divided asunder. He retaineth the one with the other inseparably. As he will not alter the substance of his flesh into the substance of bread, no more will he alter the shape of his body into the form of bread. There cannot be a greater absurdity against the truth, than to think that he would leave the shape that he took in the virgin's womb, being an accident unto his manhood, and join unto the same a wafer cake baked in an oven, or between a pair of irons. As he is in heaven very man, but only mediator between God and man, even the man Christ Jesus, he it is that is the propitiation for our sins. Be bold therefore, to confess this most pure and apostolical doctrine; and also that all favour, mercy, and forgiveness cometh only by him. He only of God the Father was made for us all wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. All these are the gifts of God the Father, freely given unto us by Christ Jesus, God and man, through faith in his blood, and not by the merits of men; gifts they are, I say, freely given unto us of favour, without our desert, by believing and not by deserving. To this do the law and prophets witness.

This doctrine have all the blessed martyrs of Christ's church witnessed with their blood to be true. To this truth have all the consciences of all true believers subscribed ever since the ascension of Christ. This witness is not of man, but of God. What better quarrel then can ye have to give your lives for, than the truth itself? That man that giveth his life for the truth, taketh the readiest way of life. He that hath the pope's curse for the truth, is sure of Christ's blessing. Well then, my brethren, what shall now hinder you from going forward as ye have begun? Nay, rather run with the runners, that ye may obtain the appointed glory. Hold on the right way, look not back; have the eye of your heart fixed upon God, and so run, that ye may get hold of it. Cast away all your worldly pelf, and worldly respects, as the favour of friends, the fear of men, sensual affection, respect of persons, honour, praise, shame, rebuke, wealth, poverty, riches, lands, possessions, carnal fathers and mothers, wife and children, with the love of your own selves; and in respect of that heavenly treasure ye look for, let all these be denied, and utterly refused of you, so that in no condition they do abate your zeal, or quench your love towards God. In this case make no account of them, but rather repute them as vile in comparison of everlasting life. Away with them as thorns that choke the heavenly seed of the gospel, where they be suffered to grow. They are burdens of the flesh, which encumber the soul. Exchange them therefore for advantage. Doth not he gain, that findeth heavenly and immortal treasure, for earthly and corruptible riches? Loseth that man any thing, who is forsaken of his carnal father and mother, when he is received of God the Father, to be his child and heir in Christ? Heavenly for earthly, immortal for mortal, permanent for transitory, is infinite gain for a christian conscience.

Therefore, as I began, I exhort you in the Lord, not to be afraid. Shrink not, my brethren; mistrust not God; be of good comfort; rejoice in the Lord; hold fast your faith, and continue to the end. Deny the world, and take up your crosses, and follow him who is your leader, and is gone before. If you suffer with him, you shall reign with him. What way can you glorify the name of your heavenly Father better, than by suffering death for his Son's sake? What a spectacle shall it be to the world to behold so godly a fellowship as you servants of God, in so just a quarrel as the gospel of Christ is, with so pure a conscience, so strong a faith, and so lively a hope, to offer yourselves to suffer most cruel torments at the hands of God's enemies, and so to end your days in peace, to receive in the resurrection of the righteous, life everlasting!

Be strong therefore in your battle: the Lord God is on your side, and his truth is your cause; and against you be none but the enemies of the cross of Christ, as the serpent and his seed, the dragon with his tail, the marked men of the beast, the offspring of the pharisees, the congregation malignant, the generation of vipers, murderers, as their father the devil hath been from the beginning. To conclude, such are they as the Lord God hath always abhorred, and in all ages resisted and overthrown. God, from whom nothing is hid, knoweth what they are. He that searcheth the hearts of men, hath found out them to be crafty, subtle, full of poison, proud, disdainful, stiff-necked, devourers, raveners, and barkers against the truth, filthy and shameless: and therefore doth the Spirit of God, by the mouths of his holy prophets and apostles, call them by the names of foxes, serpents, cockatrices, lions, leopards, bulls, bears, wolves, dogs, swine, beasts, teaching us thereby to understand, that their natural inclination is, to deceive, poison, and destroy (as much as in them lieth) the faithful and elect of God; but the Lord with his right arm shall defend his little flock against the whole rabblement of these worldlings, who have conspired against him: he hath numbered all the hairs of his children's head, so that one of them shall not perish without his fatherly will. He keepeth the sparrows, much more will he preserve them whom he hath purchased with the blood of the immaculate Lamb. He will keep them unto the hour appointed, wherein the name of God shall be glorified in his saints. In the mean time let them work their wills, let them envy, let them malign, let them blaspheme, let them curse, betray, whip, scourge, hang and burn: for by these means God will try his elect as gold in the furnace; and by these fruits shall they also bring themselves to be known what they be, for all their sheepskins. For as he that in suffering patiently for the gospel of God, is thereby known to be of Christ; even so is the persecutor of him known to be a member of Antichrist. Besides this, their extreme cruelty shall be a means the sooner to provoke God to take pity upon his servants, and to destroy them that so tyrannically treat his people; as we may learn by the histories, as well in the bondage of Israel under Pharaoh in Egypt, as also in the miserable captivity of Judah in Babylon: where, when the people of God were in most extreme thraldom, then did the Lord stretch forth his mighty power to deliver his servants. Though God for a time suffer them to be exalted in their own pride, yet shall they not escape his vengeance. They are his rods, and when he hath worn them to the stumps, he will cast them into the fire; this shall be their final reward. In the mean while our duty is, patiently to abide the will of God, which worketh all things for the best.

Thus dealeth he with us, partly for our trial, partly also for our sins, which we most grievously have committed to the great slander of his gospel, whereby the name of God was evil spoken of among his enemies; for which he now punisheth us with his fatherly corrections in this world, that we should not be damned with the world. By this means he seeketh his sheep that were lost, to bring them home to the fold again. By this way seeketh he to reform us, that we may be like unto him after the image of his Son Jesus Christ, in all holiness and righteousness before him. Finally, this way he useth his godly wisdom, to make us thereby know him, and ourselves in him, that aforetime had in a manner forgotten him, praised be his name therefore. And as for those Balaamites who now molest us, commit them to the hands of God, give him the vengeance, and he will reward them. Fall ye to prayer, and let those belly-gods prate. For he is in heaven, and sleepeth not, that keepeth Israel. He is in heaven that made the seas calm, when the disciples were afraid. Let us now faithfully call upon him, and he will hear us. Let us cry unto the Lord, for he is gracious and merciful. When we are in trouble, he is with us, he will deliver us, and he will glorify us. If we come unto him, we shall find him turned unto us. If we repent of our wickedness done against him, then shall he take away the plague that he hath devised against us.

Let us therefore earnestly repent, and bring forth the worthy fruits of repentance. Let us study to be his, then shall we not need to fear what these hypocrites do against us, who with their pretended holiness deceive the hearts of the simple, and abuse the authority of God in his princes, causing them (by their procurement) to testify their ambitious prelacy, and to erect up their idol again with the Romish mass. God, in whose hands are the hearts of kings, open the heart of the queen's highness, to espy them out what they be, and so to weed them out, that they be no longer suffered to trouble the congregation of God, and to poison the realm with pope-holy doctrine. God Almighty, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, deliver the queen's highness, and this her church and her realm from the proud prelates, who are as profitable in the church of Christ as a polecat in the midst of a warren of conies.

To conclude, my brethren, I commit you to God, and to the power of his word, which is able to establish you in all truth. His Spirit be with you, and work always that ye may be mindful of your duties towards him, whose ye are both body and soul. Whom see that ye love, serve, dread, and obey, above all worldly powers, and for nothing under the heavens defile your conscience before God. Dissemble not with his word; God will not be mocked, nay, they that dissemble with him deceive themselves. Such shall the Lord deny, and cast out at the last day: such, I say, as bear two faces in one hood; such as deny the known truth; such as obstinately rebel against him. All such, with their partakers, shall the Lord destroy. God defend you from all such, and make you perfect unto the end. Your sorrow shall be turned into joy.

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER V.

From Mr. ROBERT SMITH to his WIFE.

THE God and Father eternal, who brought again from death our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee, dear wife, now and ever, Amen; thy parents, and all thy friends. I praise God for his mercy, I am in the same state that you left me in, rather better than worse, looking daily for the living God, before whom I hunger full sore to appear, and receive the glory, of which I trust thou art willing to be partaker. I give God most hearty thanks therefore, desiring thee of all things to stand in that faith which thou hast received; and let no man take away the seed that Almighty God hath sown in thee, but lay hands on everlasting life which shall ever abide, when both the earth and all earthly friends shall perish, desiring them also to receive thankfully our trouble which is momentary and light, and as St. Paul saith, not worthy to be compared with those things which God hath prepared for us; that we patiently carrying our crosses, may attain to the place where our Saviour Christ is gone before, to which I beseech God of his mercy bring us speedily. I have been much troubled about your deliverance, fearing much the persuasions of worldlings, and have found a friend, who will (I trust) find a means for you, if you be not already provided, desiring you in any case to abide such order, as those my friends shall appoint in God. And bear well in mind the words which I spake at our parting, that as God hath found us, and also elected us as worthy to suffer for him, we may endeavour ourselves to follow uprightly in this our vocation, desiring you to present my hearty commendations to all our friends, and especially to your parents, keeping your sentiments close in any wise. Give most hearty thanks to my friend, who is come to Windsor only for our cause. Continue in prayer. Do well. Be faultless in all things. Beware of abominations. Keep yourself clean from sin. Pray for me, as I do for you. I have sent you a piece of gold for a token, and most intirely desire you to send me word if you lack any thing. The Lord Jesus preserve you and your's, Amen. From Newgate, April 15.

By your husband here and in heaven,

ROBERT SMITH,

The said Robert Smith, the valiant and constant martyr of Christ, being thus replenished, as ye have heard, with the fortitude of God's Spirit, was condemned at London by Bonner their bishop on the 12th day of July; and suffered at Uxbridge the 8th day of August; who as he had been before a comfortable instrument of God to all them that were in prison with him; so now also being at the stake, he did no less comfort the people, there standing about him, willing them to think well of his cause, and not to doubt but that his body dying in that quarrel, should rise again to life. And, said he, I doubt not but God will shew you some token thereof. At length he being well nigh half burnt, and all black with fire, clustered together as in a lump like a black coal, all men thinking him for dead, suddenly rose upright before the people, lifting up the stumps of his arms, and clapping the same together, declaring a rejoicing heart unto them; and so bending down again, and hanging over the fire, slept in the Lord, and ended this mortal life.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. SMITH to his WIFE.

SEEK first to love God, dear wife, with your whole heart, and then shall it be easy to love your neighbour. Be friendly to all creatures, and especially to your own soul.

Be always an enemy to the devil and the world, but especially to your own flesh.

In hearing of good things, join the ears of your head and heart together.

Seek unity and quietness with all men, but especially with your conscience; for it will not be easily intreated.

Love all people, but especially your enemies.

Hate the sins that are past, but especially those to come.

Be as ready to further your enemy, as he is to hinder you, that you may be a child of God.

Defile not that which Christ hath cleansed, lest his blood be laid to your charge.

Remember that God hath hedged in your tongue with the teeth and lips, that it might speak under correction.

Be ready at all times to look at your brother's eye, but especially in your own eye: for he that warneth others of what he himself is guilty, doth give his neighbour the clear wine, and keepeth the dregs to himself.

Beware of riches and worldly honour; for without understanding, prayer, and fasting, it is a snare; and also poverty, all which are like to a consuming fire, of which if a man take a little, it will warm him, but if he take too much, it will consume him. For it is hard for a man to carry fire in his bosom, and not be burnt.

Shew mercy to the saints for Christ's sake, and Christ shall reward you for the saints' sake. Among all other prisoners visit your own soul, for it is inclosed in a perilous prison.

If you will love God, hate evil, and you shall obtain the reward of well-doing.

Thus fare you well, good Anne. Have me heartily commended to all that love the Lord unfeignedly. I beseech you, have me in your prayer whilst I am living, and I am assured the Lord will accept it. Bring up my children and your's in the fear of God, and then I shall not fail to receive you together, in the everlasting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.

If you will meet with me again,
Forfake not Christ for any pain.

LETTER VII.

From the SAME to the SAME.

THE grace of Almighty God be always with you, and comfort, strengthen, and establish you in all things, that what his blessed will is, you may follow faithfully, to his honour, my comfort, and your own salvation, and the good example to our posterity.

I have received your letter, and I praise God, without any danger: nevertheless, if God's marvellous goodness had not brought it to my hands by Peter, the keeper, there might have risen great trouble upon the same. For you well know, George is a wicked man, utterly without all fear of God; and if he had gotten it, the council would surely have seen it. But Peter, like an honest man, never opened it. Wherefore I desire you from henceforth, let your letters be delivered at Chancery-lane end, to my sister Tankerfield, and she may deliver them safe into my hand. We are very straitly kept, I praise God for his mercy. Nevertheless, Almighty God is always with us. I have sent you what you wrote for. The two nutmegs that should have gone by Nicholas to our friends, I send now, and desire them to accept as a poor prisoner's gift, until God give more largely. Thomas Iveson sendeth you a penny, I pray you give him thanks for the same, and Dirick also. I have sent you of that little that I have, two pieces of Spanish money. The Lord Jesus have you in his custody, and send you good speed. In any case keep yourself close, I doubt much of your walkings. Have my hearty commendations to your parents, and desire them with you, to have me in their prayers. Be fervent in prayer, pray, pray, that God would of his mercy put up his sword, and look on his people. Tell my brother, with commendations, that the next comer shall bring up the epistle and exhortation. I have written all this fortnight for my lady, yea, and almost done nothing else. I would have sent him the articles of William Flower, and my talk with him, if I could have delivered it from the prison. The Holy Ghost keep you. I wish you could make a means for your money, to send a cheese to Peter, for I find much kindness at his hands. You shall always hear of me at Tankerfield's house. All the congregation salute you. Farewel most heartily.

I have not yet, tell my brother, spoke with the person. There is come a strict commandment, that no man must come to us, because Tooley cursed the pope at the gallows. They thought it to be our counsel.

Your's, and ever your's,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER VIII.

From the SAME to the SAME.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, dear wife, now and ever, Amen, and prevent your ways through his holy Spirit, that you may eschew evil, to his honour, and your salvation; that they which see your conversation may in all things learn to do the like, even to the utter shame and confusion of the wicked and ungodly, Amen.

I sent you by Mr. Alexander a purse with money. I have certain tokens for you, sent by my fellow-prisoners to you, that is, from Mr. Haukes, 12d. from Mr. Simpson, 12d. from his wife 4d. from Mr. Watts, five new groats; from Mr. Ardeley, 12d. from Mr. Bradford, 12d. which men are all gone to death, except Mr. Bradford, who still remaineth. There is also gone to death Nicholas Chamberlain, Thomas Osmond, and William Bamford. There is also condemned this Monday, Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson, John Launder, and William Vassay is reprieved. Pray God to have mercy on his people; and bid my brother, if he can conveniently, come down on Monday next; if he cannot well do it, let him bide at home. Commend me heartily to your parents. I have sent each of them a token, a bowed groat, and desire them for God's sake to help us with their prayers. Have little Katharine in mind. Commend me to all good friends. Continue in prayer. Beware of vanity. Let not God be dishonoured in your conversation, but like a good matron keep your vessel in holiness. The peace of God remain with you for ever, Amen.

My brother Iveson sendeth to you a token, to your mother a token, and to Katharine a token, three pence. John Launder sendeth you a piece of Spanish money. Father Herault, a six penny piece. William Andrews sendeth a race of ginger; and I send your mother one, and a nutmeg. I send Katharine comfits, for a token to eat. I have sent you a key-clog for a token.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER IX.

From Mr. SMITH to his FRIEND.

THE eternal God keep you in his fear. I have hearty commendations to you and your husband, beseeching Almighty God to preserve you in well-doing, and in perfect knowledge of his Christ, that you may be found faultless in the day of the Lord. I have heard say, that my friend is given over to vanity; it breaketh my heart not only to hear that he so doth, but also teacheth others that it is no crime to go to all abominations, which now stand in the idols temples: nevertheless, dear friend, be you not moved to follow sinners, for they have no inheritance with God and Christ. But look that by going into the idol temple, you defile not the temple of God: for light hath no fellowship with darkness. But look, what the Lord hath commanded, that do. For if not going to church were without persecution, they would not learn you that lesson. But all things that are sweet to the flesh, are allowed of the fleshly. The Lord shall reward every man according to his works, and he that leadeth into captivity, shall go into captivity; and he that by the fleshly man is led in the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption. The Lord Jesus give you his holy Spirit, Amen.

I have sent thee an epistle in metre, which is not to be laid up in thy coffer, but in thy heart.

Seek peace and insure it. Fear God, love God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength.

Thy friend, and all men's, in Christ Jesus,
Scribbled in much haste from Newgate, May 12. ROBERT SMITH.

ROBERT SMITH to all the faithful SERVANTS of CHRIST, exhorting them to be strong under Persecution.

CONTENT thyself with patience,
With Christ to bear the cross of pain,
Which can and will thee recompense,
A thousand fold with joys again.

Let nothing cause thy heart to quail,
Launch out thy boat, haul up thy sail,

Put from the shore:

And be thou sure thou shalt attain,
Unto the port that shall remain

For evermore.

The MARTYRDOM of STEPHEN HARWOOD, and THOMAS FUST.

ABOUT this time also died these two martyrs of God, Stephen Harwood at Stratford, and Thomas Fust at Ware. Who, as they were burnt much about the same time (though not at the same place) with the aforesaid Robert Smith and George Tankerfield, so were they likewise examined and openly condemned together with them; and as the proceedings against them all were alike, I thought it needless to repeat the same; only there is one thing more to be added concerning Thomas Fust, who at his last appearance on the 12th of July, being moved by the bishop to revoke his opinion, answered thus: No, my lord, for no truth cometh out of your mouth, but all lies: you condemn men, and will not hear the truth. Where can you find any anointing or greasing in God's book? I speak nothing but the truth, and I am certain that it is the truth that I speak. This answer of Thomas Fust only, I find noted by the register; and how unfaithful these registers have been, (I mean in omitting those things that were most worthy of note, in order to render the martyrs ridiculous to the people) is very evident in many places of this history. But to be short, when they had made their answers, both he and Stephen Harwood were, for their faithful perseverance, condemned together by the bishop in his accustomed pity, to be burnt as heretics, and so (as you have heard before) they finished their martyrdom, the one at Stratford, and the other at Ware, in the month of August, and year aforesaid.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HALE, at BARNET.

OF the same company with those ten before recorded, who were sent to bishop Bonner by sir Nicholas Hare and other commissioners, in the company of George Tankerfield and Robert Smith, was also William Hale, of Thorp, in the county of Essex, who likewise being examined with the rest, the 12th of July, received with them also the sentence of condemnation; giving this exhortation withal to the lookers on: Ah, good people, said he, beware of this idolater, and this Antichrist (pointing to the bishop of London); and so he was delivered to the sheriffs to be burnt as an heretic, who sent him to Barnet, where about the latter end of August he most constantly sealed up his faith with the consuming of his body by cruel fire, yielding his soul to the Lord Jesus, his only and most sure Redeemer.

*An ACCOUNT of GEORGE KING, THOMAS
LEYES, who died, and were buried in the Fields.*

Mention was made before of ten persons sent out of Newgate by Mr. Hare and other commissioners, to be examined by Bonner, bishop of London: of whom six already have been executed in several places, as hath been shewed; whose names were Elizabeth Warn, George Tankerfield, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thomas Fust, and William Hale. The other three, namely, George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, falling sick in Lollard's Tower, were so weak that they were removed into sundry houses within the city of London, and there died, and were thrown out into the fields, and there buried in the night by some of the faithful brethren, when none in the day time durst do it, Propter metum Judaeorum. The last that remained of this company aforesaid was Joan Laysh, or Layshford, the daughter-in-law of John Warn, and Elizabeth Warn, martyrs: but because she was reprieved to another time, her story and martyrdom we will defer till the month of January the next year following.

An ACCOUNT of WILLIAM ANDREW.

THE like catholic charity was also shewed upon William Andrew, of Horsley, in the county of Essex, carpenter, who was brought to Newgate the first day of April, 1555, by John Motham, constable of Malden in Essex. The first and principal promoter of him was the lord Rich, who sent him first to prison. Also sir Richard Southwell, knight, was another great enemy to him, as appeareth by a letter written by him to Bonner, which here followeth.

A L E T T E R

From Sir RICHARD SOUTHWELL to BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

MAY it please your lordship to understand, that the lord Rich did about seven or eight weeks past, send up unto the council one William Andrew, of Thorp, within the county of Essex, an arrogant heretic. Their pleasure was to command me to commit him to Newgate, where he remaineth; and as I am informed, hath infected a number in that prison with his heresy. Your lordship shall do very well if it please you to convent him before you, and to take order with him as his case doth require. I know the council meant to have writ herein unto your lordship, but by occasion of other business, the thing hath been omitted. Wherefore knowing their good pleasure, I did advise the keeper of Newgate to wait on you with these few lines. And so referring the rest to your virtuous consideration, I remain your lordship's to command, June 12, 1555.

RICHARD SOUTHWELL.

This William Andrew being twice examined before bishop Bonner, there manfully stood in defence of his religion. At length, by the severe usage he met with in Newgate prison, he there lost his life, which otherwise would have been taken away by fire: and so after the popish manner he was cast out into a field, and by night was privately buried by the hands of good men and faithful brethren.

The MARTYRDOM of ROBERT SAMUEL, MINISTER of BARFOLD, in SUFFOLK.

MR. Foster, a justice, dwelling at Cobdock, near Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, being in continual hatred against the truth and the professors of the same, his constant study night and day was how to bring those into thralldom and captivity, that were honest and piously inclined to religion; but also whatsoever they were that once came into his claws, could not easily escape without clog of conscience or loss of life, so greedy was he of blood. Among many whom he had troubled, there was one Samuel, in king Edward's days, a very godly and faithful preacher of God's word, who for his valiant and constant behaviour in his sermons, seemeth worthy of high admiration. He was minister at Barfold, in Suffolk, where he industriously and successfully taught the flock which the Lord had committed to his charge, so long as the time would suffer him to do his duty.

At last being removed from the ministry, and put from his benefice, (as many other good pastors were) when he could not avoid the raging violence of the time, yet would he not give over his care that he had for his flock, but would teach them privily and by stealth, when he could not openly do so. At which time order was given by the queen, to be published by the commissioners, that all priests which had been married in king Edward's days, should put away their wives from them, and be compelled to return again to their chastity and single life. This decree Mr. Samuel would not stand to, because he knew it to be manifestly wicked and abominable; but determining with himself, that God's laws were not to be broke for man's traditions, still kept his wife at Ipswich, and gave his diligence in the mean time to the instructing of others which were about him, as occasion served. At last Mr. Foster having intelligence hereof, being a great doer in those parts, spared no time nor diligence, but quickly sent his spies abroad, laying close wait for Mr. Samuel, that if he came home to his wife at any time, they might apprehend him, and carry him to prison.

In conclusion, when such as should betray him espied him at home with his wife, they brought word to the officer, who came to the house, and beset it with a great company, and so took him in the night-season, because they durst not do it in the day-time for fear of trouble and tumult, although good Mr. Samuel did not withstand them at all, but meekly yielded himself into their hands of his own accord. When they had thus caught him, they put him into Ipswich jail, where he patiently spent his time among his pious brethren, so long as he was permitted to continue there. However, not long after, being taken from thence, he was carried (through the malice of the wicked sort) to Norwich, where Dr. Hopton, bishop of that diocese, and Dr. Dunning, his chancellor, exercised great cruelty against him, as indeed they were men, in that time of persecution, as had not their matches for cruel tormenting the bodies of the martyrs among all the rest; and especially through the procuring of Dunning. For although the others were sharp enough in their generation, yet would they be satisfied with imprisonment and death, and could go no farther. Neither did I ever yet hear of any besides these, who so far exceeded all bounds of pity and compassion in tormenting their poor brethren, as this bishop did; in such sort, that many of them he perverted, and brought quite from the truth, and some from their wits also.

The bishop therefore, or else his chancellor, thinking that he might as easily prevail with Mr. Samuel, as he had done with the others before, kept him in a very close prison at his first coming, where he was chained bolt-up-right to a great post, in such sort, that standing only on tip-toe, he was fain to stay up the whole poise or weight of his body thereby. And to make amends for the cruelty or pain that he suffered, they added a far more grievous torment, keeping him without meat and drink, whereby he was unmercifully vexed through hunger and thirst; saving that he had every day allowed him two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three spoonfuls of water, to the end rather that he might be reserved to farther torment, than that they would preserve his life. O worthy constancy of the martyr! O pitiless hearts of papists, worthy to be complained of, and to be accused before God and nature! O the wonderful strength of Christ in his members! Whose heart, though it had been made of adamant stone, would not have relented at the intolerable vexations, and extreme pains above nature! How often would he have drunk his own water; but his body was so dried up with his long emptiness, that he was not able to make one drop.

At last, when he was brought forth to be burned, which was but a trifle in comparison of those pains that he had passed, there were several that heard him declare what strange things had happened unto him during the time of his imprisonment: to wit, that after he had been famished or pined with hunger two or three days together, he then fell into a sleep, as it were one half in a slumber, at which time one clad all in white seemed to stand before him, which administered comfort unto him by these words: "Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take a good heart unto thee. For after this day shalt thou never be either hungry or thirsty." Which came to pass accordingly, for soon after he was burned; and from that time till he suffered, he felt neither hunger nor thirst. And this he declared, to the end as he said, that all men might behold the wonderful works of God. Many other matters concerning the great comfort he had of Christ in his afflictions he could utter, he said, besides this, but that shamefacedness and modesty would not suffer him to utter it. And yet if it had pleased God, I wish he had been less modest in that behalf, that the love and care that Christ hath of his servants, might have the more appeared thereby unto us by such present arguments, for the more plentiful comfort of the godly, though there be sufficient testimonies of the same in the holy scriptures already.

No less memorable it is, and worthy also to be noted, concerning the three ladders which he told to divers, he saw in his sleep set up towards heaven; of which there was one somewhat longer than the rest, but yet at length they became one, joining (as it were) all three together. This was a forewarning revealed unto him, declaring undoubtedly the martyrdom first of himself, and from the death of two honest women, who were brought forth and suffered in the same town not long after.

As this pious martyr was going to the stake, a certain maid came to him, and took him about the neck and kissed him, which being marked by them that were present, was sought for the next day after to be had to prison and burned, as the very party herself informed me: however, as God of his goodness would have it, she escaped their fiery hands, keeping herself secret in the town a good while after. But as this maid, called Rose Nottingham, was marvellously preserved by the providence of God; so there were two other honest women that fell into the rage and fury of that time. The one was a brewer's wife, the other was a shoemaker's wife, but both together now espoused to a new husband, Christ.

With these two this maid aforesaid was very familiar and well acquainted, who on a time giving counsel to one of them, that she should convey herself away while she had time and space, seeing she could not away with the queen's proceedings; had this answer at her hands again: I know well, saith she, that it is well enough to fly away, which remedy you may use if you please. But my case standeth otherwise. I am tied to an husband, and have besides young children at home; and then I know not how my husband, being a carnal man, will take my departure from him; therefore I am minded, for the love of Christ and his truth, to stand to the extremity of the matter.

And so the next day after Mr. Samuel suffered, these two pious wives, the one named Anne Potten, the other Joan Trunchfield, wife of Michael Trunchfield, shoemaker of Ipswich, were apprehended, and both had to prison together. Who, as they were both by sex and nature somewhat tender, so were they at first less able to endure the straitness of the prison, and especially the brewer's wife was cast into marvellous great agonies and troubles of mind thereby. But Christ beholding the weak infirmity of his servant, did not fail to help her when she was in this necessity. So at length they both suffered after Samuel, Feb. 19, 1556, as shall be by God's grace declared hereafter. And these, no doubt were those two ladders, which being joined with the third, Samuel saw stretched up into heaven. This blessed Samuel, the servant of Christ, suffered the 31st of August, 1555.

The report goeth among some that were there present, and saw him burn, that his body in burning did shine as bright and white as new tried silver in the eyes of them that stood by, as I am informed by some that were there, and did behold the sight.

LETTER I.

From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, exhorting to the patient Suffering of Affliction for the Cause of Christ.

A Man knoweth not his time; but as the fish is taken with the angle, and as the birds are caught with a snare, so are men caught and taken in the perilous time when it cometh upon them. The time cometh; the day draweth near, Ezekiel vii. Better it were to die (as the preacher saith) than to live and see the miserable works which are done under the sun; such sudden and strange mutation, such woeful, heinous, and lamentable divisions so fast approach, and none, or very few, thoroughly repent. Alas, for this sinful nation, a people of great iniquity and seed of ungraciousness, corrupting their ways. They have forsaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger, and are gone backward. Who now liveth not in such security and rest, as though all dangers were clean overpast? Who now blindeth and buffeteth not Christ, which seeth me, and seeth me not? Yea, who liveth not now in such felicity, worldly pleasures and joys, wholly seeking the world, providing, and craftily shifting for the earthly clod and carnal appetites, as though sin were clean forgotten, overthrown, and devoured? Like hoggish Gergesites, now are we more afraid and ashamed of Christ our Messiah, fearing the loss of our filthy pigs, I mean our transitory goods, and disquieting our sinful and mortal bodies in this short, uncertain, and miserable life, than of a legion of devils, seducing and driving us from from hearing, reading, and believing Christ, God's eternal Son, and his word, the power to save our souls, unto vanities, lies, and fables, and to this bewitching world.

O perilous abundance of goods, too much saturity of meats, wealth and quietness, which destroyed with so many souls, those goodly cities, Sodom and Gomorrah! Jeroboam, so long as he was but a poor man, not yet advanced to his dignity, lived in the laws of God, and without reprehension; but brought once to wealth and a prosperous state, he became a wicked and most shameful idolator. And what made the covetous young man so loth to follow Christ, when he was bidden to forsake the worldly wealth which he then enjoyed? Woe be unto these false allusions of the world, baits of perdition, hooks of the devil, which have so shamefully deceived and seduced full many from the right path unto the Lord, into the highways of confusion and perpetual perdition.

We might now worthily, dear christians, lament and bewail our heavy state, miserable condition, and sorrowful chance: yea, I say, we might well accuse ourselves, and with Job curse these our turbulent, wicked, and bloody last days of this world, were it not that we both see and believe, and find in God's sacred book, that God hath reserved a remnant in all ages, I mean the faithful, as many as have been from the beginning of the world exercised, whetted, and polished with divers afflictions, troubles, and tossings; cast and dashed against all peril and dangers, as the very dross and out-casts of the earth, and yet will in no wise halt between God and Baal; for God verily abhorreth two men in one; he cannot away with them that are between both, but casteth them away as a filthy vomit. Christ will not part spoil with his mortal enemy the devil; he will have all, or lose all: he will not permit the devil to have the service of the body, and he to stand contented with the heart and mind: but "He will be glorified both in your bodies and in your spirits; which are his," as Saint Paul saith, 1 Cor. vi. For he hath made all, bought all, and dearly paid for all, as St. Peter saith; "With his own immaculate body hath he clean discharged your bodies from sin, death, and hell, and with his most precious blood paid your ransom and full price once for all and for ever."

Now what harm, I pray you, or what loss sustain you by this? Why are you, O vain men, more afraid of Jesus your gentle Saviour, and his gospel of salvation, than of a legion of cruel devils, going about with false delusions utterly to destroy both your souls and bodies? Think you to be more sure than under your captain, Christ? Do you promise yourselves to be more quiet in Satan's service, than in Christ's religion? Esteem you more these transitory and pernicious pleasures, than God and all his heavenly treasures? O palpable darkness, horrible madness, and wilful blindness, without comparison, too much to be suffered any longer! We see and will not see; we know and will not know; yea, we smart and will not feel, and that our conscience well knoweth. O miserable and brainless souls; which would for foolish pleasures and slippery wealth lose the royal kingdom and permanent joys of God, with the everlasting glory which he hath prepared for them that truly love him, and renounce the world. The children of the world live in pleasure and wealth; and the devil, who is their god, and prince of this world, keepeth their wealth which is proper unto them, and letteth them enjoy it. But let us, which be of Christ, seek and inquire for heavenly things, which by God's promise and mercy in Christ shall be peculiar unto us. Let, I say, the Cretians, and Epicures, and such other beastly Belials and carnal people, delight in things that be pleasant for the body, and do appertain to this transitory life: "Yet shall they once (as the kingly prophet saith) run about the city of God, to and fro, howling like dogs, desiring one scrap of the joys of God's elect," but all too late, as the rich glutton did.

Let us therefore follow those things that do pertain to the Spirit, and are celestial. "We must be here (saith St. Paul) not as inhabitants, and home-dealers, but as strangers;" not as strangers only, but after the mind of Paul, as painful soldiers appointed by our governor, to fight against the governor of darkness of this world, against spiritual craftiness in heavenly things. The time is come; we must to it; the judgment must begin first at the house of God. Began they not first with the green and fappy tree? And what followed then on the dry branches? Jeremy, speaking in the person of God, saith, "In the city wherein my name is invoked, will I begin to punish:" but as for you (meaning the wicked), shall you be as innocents, and not once touched? Nay, the dregs of God's wrath, the bottom of all sorrows, are reserved unto them in the end: but God's household shall drink the flower of the cup of his mercy. And therefore let us say with Ezechias, "Play the men and shrink not: let us comfort ourselves, for the Lord is with us, our helper, and fighteth for us. The Lord is (saith he) with you, when you be with him; and when you seek him, he will be found of you: and again, when you forsake him, he will forsake you."

Wherefore we ought not to be dismayed, or discourage ourselves, but rather to be of good comfort: not to be sad, but merry, not sorrowful, but joyful, in that God of his goodness will vouchsafe to take us as his beloved children, to subdue our sinful lusts, our wretched flesh and blood unto his glory, the promoting of his holy word, and edifying of his church. What if the earthly house of this our habitation (St. Paul meaning the body) be destroyed? We know assuredly we shall have a building not made with hands, but everlasting in heaven, with such joys as faith taketh not, hope toucheth not, and charity apprehendeth not. They pass all desires and wishes. Gotten they may be by Christ, esteemed they cannot be. Wherefore the more affliction and persecution the word of God bringeth, the more felicity and greater joy abideth in heaven. But the worldly peace, idle ease, wealthy pleasure, and this present and pleasant transitory life and felicity, which the ungodly foolishly imagine to procure unto themselves by persecuting and thrusting away the gospel, shall turn unto their own trouble, and at last unto horrible destructions and mutations of realms and countries; and after this life, if they repent not, unto their perpetual infelicity, perdition, and damnation. For they had rather, with Nabal and his temporal pleasures, descend to the devil, than with Christ and his bodily troubles, ascend unto the kingdom of God his Father. "But an unwise man," saith the Psalmist, "comprehendeth them not, neither doth the foolish understand them;" that is, these bloody persecutors grow up and flourish like the flower and grass in the field. But unto this end do they so flourish, that they might be cut down and cast into the fire for ever. For as Job saith, "their joy lasteth but the twinkling of an eye," and death shall lie gnawing upon them as doth the flock upon the pasture; yea, the cruel worm, late repentance, (as St. Mark saith) shall lie gnawing, tormenting, and accusing their wretched conscience for evermore.

Let us therefore (good christians) be constant in obeying God rather than men. For although they slay our sinful bodies (yea, rather our deadly enemies) for God's verity; yet they cannot do it, but by God's sufferance and good will, to his praise and honour, and to our eternal joy and felicity. For our blood, shed for the gospel, shall preach it with more fruit, and greater furtherance, than did our mouths, lives, and writings, as did the blood of Abel, Stephen, with many others. What though they laugh Christ and his word to scorn, who sit in the chair of perverse pestilent scorers. To whom, as to the wise gentiles of the world, the gospel of Christ is but foolishness, as it was to the Jews a slander and a stumbling stone, whereat they now being fallen, have provoked the wrath and vengeance of God upon them.

These are the days of vengeance, saith Luke, that all things written may be fulfilled. And surely it shall be no less than a huge storm of evils that shall come upon us, because that a long and obstinate maliciousness of us hath gone before, crying in the ears of the Lord God of hosts, who so many times and so many ways have been provoked with the unpeackable riches of his goodness, his patience, and long-suffering, to amendment, and have nevertheless contemned the same; and proceeded forward to worse and worse, provoking and stirring the presence of God's Majesty to anger.

Now, therefore, saith God by the mouth of his prophet, "I will come unto thee, and I will send my wrath upon thee:" upon thee, I say, O England, and punish thee according to thy ways, and reward thee after all thine abominations. Thou hast kindled the fire of God's wrath, and hast stirred up the coals. For thou wast once enlightened, and hadst tasted of the heavenly gift, and wast become partaker of the Holy Ghost, and hadst tasted of the good word of God: yea, it is yet in thy mouth, saith the prophet. Alas! O England, thou knewest thy Lord and Master's will, but didst not do it; thou must therefore, saith he, suffer many stripes, and many sharp strokes, and walk in the glittering and hot flame of thine own fire, and on the coals that thou hast kindled. This cometh to thee from my hand, saith the Lord, namely, that thou shalt sleep in sorrow and in bitterness. The plain truth telleth the tale, the immutable justice of the ever-living God, and the ordinary course of his plagues from the beginning confirmeth the same. The joy of our heart, saith Jeremy, is gone, our glory is fallen away, our merry singing is turned into mourning, the garland of our head is fallen: alas! that ever we sinned so fore!

Let all the wicked enemies of Christ, and all the unbelievers, look to be tormented and vexed with all hellish furies, and clean without hope of God's accounting day, who know not God in Christ to be their very righteousness, their life, their only salvation and alone Saviour, nor believe in him. They must, as St. John saith, needs abide and perish with their sins in death and in eternal damnation. But we be the children of saints, as the elder Toby did answer, and look for another life, which God shall give to all them who change not their faith, and shrink not from him. Rejoice therefore, ye christian afflicted brethren, for they cannot take our souls and bodies out of the hands of the Almighty, which be kept as in the bosom of our most sweet and loving Father: and if we abide fast in Christ, and turn not away like weather-cocks, surely we shall live for ever. Christ affirmeth the same, saying, "My sheep hear my voice, I know them, they hearken unto me, and to no strangers, and I give them everlasting life; for they shall not be lost, and no man shall pluck them out of my hands:" no nor yet this flattering world with all his vain pleasures, nor any tyrant with his great threats and stout brags can once move them out of the way of eternal eternal life. What consolation and comfort can we have more pleasant and effectual than this? God is on our side, and fighteth for us; he suffereth, he smareth, and is afflicted with us. As the world can do nothing against his might, neither in taking away or diminishing from his glory, nor putting him from his celestial throne; so neither can it hurt any one of his children without his good will. For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, and as dear to him as the apple of his eye.

Let us therefore with an earnest faith lay fast hold on the promises in the gospel, and let us not be separated from the same by any temptation, tribulation, or persecution. Let us consider the verity of God to be invincible, inviolable, and immutable, promising and giving us, his faithful soldiers, life eternal. It is he only that hath deserved it for us: it is his only benefit, and of his only mere mercy, and unto him only must we render thanks. Let not therefore the vain fantasies and dreams of men, and foolish gaudy toys of the world, nor the crafty delusions of the devil, drive and separate us from our hope of the crown of righteousness that is laid up in store for us against the last day. O that happy and joyful day, I mean to the faithful, when Christ by his covenant shall grant and give unto them that overcome, and keep his words to the end, that they may ascend and sit in seats with him, as he ascended and sitteth on the throne with his Father. The same body and soul that is now with Christ afflicted, shall then with Christ be glorified: now in the butcher's hands, as sheep appointed to die; then sitting at God's table with Christ in his kingdom, as God's honourable and dear children; where we shall have heavenly riches for earthly poverty, satiation of the pleasant presence of the glory of God, for hunger and thirst; celestial joys in the company of angels, for sorrows, troubles, and cold irons; and life eternal for bodily death. O happy precious souls! O precious death and evermore blessed, right dear in the eyes of God; to you the spring of the Lord shall ever be flourishing. Then (as saith Isaiah) "The redeemed shall return and come again into Sion, praising the Lord, and eternal mercies shall be over their heads: and they shall obtain mirth and solace; sorrow and woe shall be utterly vanquished." Yea, I am he, saith the Lord, that in all things giveth you everlasting consolation. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be glory and praise for ever, Amen.

ROBERT SAMUEL.

LETTER II.

From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, to the CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION, wherein he declareth the CONFESSION of his FAITH.

CONSIDERING with myself these perilous times, perishing days, and the unconstant state of man, the decay of our faith, the sinister report and false slander of God's most holy word, these urgent causes in conscience do constrain me to acknowledge and confess my faith and meaning in Christ's holy religion, as St. Peter teacheth me, saying, "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, and that with meekness and fear, having a good conscience, that when they back-bite you as evil-doers, they may be ashamed, forasmuch they have falsely accused your good conversation in Christ."

As touching my doctrine, for that little talent that God hath given me, God I take to record, mine own conscience and mine auditory knoweth, that I neither in doctrine nor manners willingly taught any other thing than I received of the holy patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles. For it were not only sin, but also the very part of a cursed miscreant, to deny, belie, or betray the innocency of that heavenly doctrine, or to be ashamed to confess and stand to the defence of the same; seeing that Christ planted it with his most precious blood, and all good men have more esteemed the true and infallible word of God, than all this transitory world, or their own mortal lives. And I believe this doctrine of the patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles, to be sufficient and absolutely necessary to instruct and teach me, and all the holy church, of our duty towards God, the magistrates, and our neighbours.

First, and principally, I do assuredly believe, without doubting, that there is one Deity, or Divine Essence, and Infinite Substance; which is both called, and is indeed, God Everlasting, unbodily, unpartable, unmeasurable in power, wisdom, and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things, as well visible as invisible; and yet there be three distinct persons, all of one Godhead, or Divine Being, and all of one power, coequal, consubstantial, coeternal, the Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, &c. As touching God the Father of heaven, I believe as much as holy scripture teacheth me to believe. The Father is the first person in the Trinity, first cause of our salvation, who hath blessed us with all manner of blessings in heavenly things by Christ, who hath chosen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him; who hath predestinated and ordained us to be his children of adoption, through Christ Jesus; in him, as it is said, we live, we move, and have our being; he nourisheth, feedeth, and giveth meat to every creature.

And in Jesus Christ our Lord. I believe that the Word, that is, the Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, did take man's nature in the womb of the blessed virgin Mary: so that there be in him two natures, a divine nature and an human nature, in the unity of one person inseparable, conjoined in one Christ, truly God, and truly man, the express and perfect image of the invisible God, wherein the will of God the Father apparently shineth, and wherein man, as it were in a glass, may behold what he ought to do, that he may please God the Father.

Born of the virgin Mary; truly suffering his passion, crucified, dead, and buried, to the intent to bring us again into favour with God the Father Almighty, and to be a sacrifice, and oblation, not only for original sin, but also for the actual sins of the whole generation of mankind. For all the works, merits, deservings, doings, and obedience of man towards God, although they be done by the Spirit of God, in the grace of God, yet being thus done, be of no validity, worthiness, nor merit before God, except God for his mercy and grace account them worthy for the worthiness and merits of Jesus Christ.

The same Christ went down to the hells, and truly rose again the third day, and ascended into the heavens, that he might there still reign and have dominion over all creatures: and from thence shall come, &c.

I believe in the Holy Ghost, coequal with God the Father and the Son, and proceeding from them both; by whose virtue, strength, and operation, the true catholic church, which is the communion and society of saints, is guided in all truth and verity, and kept from all power of sin. Which church is sanctified and hallowed with the precious blood and Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ; which hath also her sign and mark, that she heareth and followeth the voice of her only and true pastor Christ, and no strangers. This church also is the house of God, the pillar of truth, the lively body of Christ, a church both in name and in deed.

I believe the remission of sins, by the only means and merits of Christ's death and passion; who is made unto us of God, that only sacrifice and oblation offered once for all, and for ever, for them that be sanctified.

I believe the resurrection of the body, whereby in the last day all men shall rise again from death, the souls joined again to the bodies, the good to everlasting life, the wicked to everlasting pain and punishment. And nothing may more certainly establish and confirm our faith, that we shall rise again immortal both in body and soul, than the resurrection of our Saviour, and the first fruits of the dead. Now that Christ our head is risen, we being his body and members must follow the head. Death, hell, and sin, cannot separate or pluck us from him. For as the Son cannot be divided nor separated from the Father, nor the Holy Ghost from them both, no more may we, being the faithful members of Christ, be separated from Christ. And for a confirmation of our resurrection, Christ would be seen after his resurrection in his most glorious body, his wounds being handled and felt, speaking and teaching, and eating and drinking, &c. We look (saith St. Paul) for Christ Jesus our Saviour, who shall change our vile bodies, and conform them to his glorious body by the same power and virtue, whereby he is able to subdue all things; even like as the grain of wheat sown in the ground is first putrified and brought, as it were, to nothing, yet after that it springeth up afresh with a more goodly colour, form, and beauty, than it had before. The body is sown in corruption, and riseth in incorruption; it is sown in dishonour, and riseth in glory.

Thus I verily know, and assuredly believe the resurrection of our bodies, and to have life eternal by Christ, and for Christ's sake. Verily, verily, I say unto you, saith Christ, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into damnation, but is escaped from death to life. It is Christ that once died for our sins, and is risen again, never more to die: it is he that swalloweth up death, and hath cast it under his feet for ever. What now can death do unto us? Verily nothing else, but for a little time separate our precious souls from our wretched bodies, that divine substance from a mass of sin, that eternal life from a body of death, and so send our souls out of this miserable, wretched, and sorrowful life, cumbered with all calamities, unto that most blessed felicity and joys eternal.

As concerning the holy and reverend sacraments of Christ's church, which are two in number, the sacrament of baptism, and the supper of the Lord; I believe them to be as St. Paul calleth them, confirmations or seals of God's promises, which have added to them a promise of grace; and therefore they are called visible signs of invisible grace.

The sacrament of baptism is a mark of Christ's church, a seal and confirmation of our acceptance into the grace and favour of God, for Christ's sake. For his innocency, his righteousness, his holiness, his justice, is our's, given us of God, and our sins and unrighteousness, by his obedience and abasing of himself to the death of the cross, are his, whereof baptism is the sign, seal, and confirmation.

Baptism is also a sign of repentance, to testify that we are born to the waves of perils, and changes of life, to the intent that we should die continually, as long as we live from sin, and rise again like new men unto righteousness, Rom. vi.

The other sacrament, which is the supper of our Saviour Christ, whereby the church of Christ is known, I believe to be a remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a seal and confirmation of his most precious body given unto death, even to the vile death of the cross, wherewith we are redeemed and delivered from sin, death, hell, and damnation. It is a visible word, because it worketh the same thing in the eyes, which the word worketh in the ears. For like as the word is a means to the ears, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe, Rom. x. so this sacrament is a means to the eyes, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe: it preacheth peace between God and man; it exhorteth to mutual love and all godly life, and teacheth to contemn the world for the life to come, when as Christ shall appear, which is now in heaven, and no where else as concerning his human body.

Yet do I believe assuredly, that his very body is present in his most holy supper at the contemplation of our spiritual eyes, and so verily eaten with the mouth of our faith. For as soon as I hear these most comfortable and heavenly words spoke and pronounced by the mouth of the minister: "This is my body which is given for you:" when I hear (I say) this heavenly harmony of God's infallible promises and truth; I look not upon, neither do I behold bread and wine; for I take and believe the words simply and plainly, even as Christ spake them. For hearing these words, my senses be wrapt and utterly excluded; for faith wholly taketh place, and not flesh, nor carnal imaginations of our gross, fleshly, and unreverent eating after the manner of our bodily food, which profiteth nothing at all, as Christ witnesseth, John vi. but with a sorrowful and wounded conscience, an hungry and thirsty soul, a pure and faithful mind do fully embrace, behold, and feed, and look upon that most glorious body of Christ in heaven, at the right hand of God the Father, very God and very man, which was crucified and slain, and his blood shed for our sins, there now making intercession, offering and giving his holy body for me, for my body, for my ransom, for my full price and satisfaction, who is my Christ, and all that ever he hath; and by this spiritual and faithful eating of this lively and heavenly bread, I feel the most sweet sap and taste of the fruits, benefits, and unspeakable joys of Christ's death and passion, fully digested into the bowels of my soul. For my mind is quieted from all worldly adversities, turmoilings, and troubles, my conscience is pacified from sin, death, hell, and damnation; my soul is full, and hath even enough, and desires no more; for all things are but loss, vile dung, dross, and vain vanity, for the excellent knowledge sake of Christ Jesus, my Lord and Saviour.

Thus now is Christ's flesh my very meat indeed, and his blood my very drink indeed, and I am become flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones. Now I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; for through faith in Christ, and for Christ's sake we are one, that is, of one consent, mind and fellowship, with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. John xvii. Thus I am assured and fully persuaded, and on this rock have I built, by God's grace, my dwelling and resting-place for body and soul, life and death. And thus I commit my cause unto Christ the righteous and just judge, who will another day judge these debates and controversies; whom I humbly beseech to cast his tender and merciful eyes upon the afflicted and ruinous churches, and shortly to reduce them into godly and perpetual concord, Amen.

Thus do I believe, and thus is my faith and my understanding in Christ my Saviour, and his true and holy religion. And this whosoever is ashamed to do among this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

ROBERT SAMUEL.

An ACCOUNT of WILLIAM ALLEN, MARTYR.

NOW after the suffering of Robert Samuel, about the beginning of September, William Allen was burnt in Walsingham, a labouring man, sometime servant to John Houghton, of Somerton. He being brought before the bishop, and asked the cause why he was imprisoned, answered, That he was put in prison because he would not follow the cross, saying, that he would never go in procession.

Then being willed by the bishop to return again to the catholic church; he answered, That he would turn to the catholic church, but not to the Romish church: and said, That if he saw the king and queen, and all others follow the cross, or kneel down to the cross, he would not. For which sentence of condemnation was given against him the 12th of August, to be burnt at Walsingham about the beginning of Sept. who declared such constancy at his martyrdom, and had such credit with the justices, by reason of his well-tryed conversation among them, that he was suffered to go untied to his suffering, and there being fastened with a chain, stood quietly without shrinking until he died.

The MARTYRDOM of ROGER COO, first Examined by the BISHOP of NORWICH, and by him Condemned, August 12, 1555.

ROGER COO, being brought before the bishop, was first asked by him, why he was imprisoned?

Coo. At the justice's commandment.

Bishop. There was some cause why.

Coo. Here is my accuser, let him declare.

And his accuser said, that he would not receive the sacrament.

Then the bishop said, that he thought he had transgressed a law.

But Coo answered, that there was no law to transgress.

The bishop then asked, What he said to the law that then was?

Coo answered, That he had been in prison a long time, and knew it not.

No, said his accuser, nor will not. My lord, ask him when he received the sacrament.

When Coo heard him say so, he said, I pray you, my lord, let him sit down and examine me himself.

But the bishop would not hear that, but said, Coo, why will you not receive?

He answered him, That the bishop of Rome had changed God's ordinances, and given the people bread and wine instead of the gospel, and the belief of the same.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. Our Saviour said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him;" and the bread and wine doth not so.

Bishop. Well, Coo, thou dost slander our holy fathers. Did not Christ take bread, give thanks, and break it, and said, "This is my body?"

Yes, said he; and so he went further with the text, saying, "Which shall be given for you: do this in remembrance of me."

Bishop. You have said the truth.

Then Coo replied further, and said, Christ commanded to do this in remembrance of him, and not to say this in remembrance of him; neither did the Holy Ghost so lead the apostles, but taught them to give thanks, and to break from house to house, and not to say as the bishop said.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. It is written in Acts ii.

Then the bishop's chaplain said it was true.

The bishop asked him if he could say his creed.

He answered yea, and so said part of the creed; and then after, he said he believed more; for he believed the Ten Commandments, that it was meet for all such as look to be saved, to be obedient unto them.

Bishop. Is not the holy church to be believed also?

Coo. Yes, if it be built upon the word of God.

The bishop said to Coo, that he had the charge of his soul.

Coo. Have you so, my lord? Then if you go to the devil for your sins, what shall become of me?

Bishop. Do you not believe as your father did? Was not he an honest man?

Coo. It is written, that after Christ hath suffered; "There shall come a people with the prince that shall destroy both city and sanctuary. I pray you shew me whether this destruction was in my father's time, or now?"

The bishop not answering his question, asked him, whether he would not obey the king's laws?

Coo. As far as they agree with the word of God I will obey them.

Bishop.

Bishop. Whether they agree with the word of God or not, we are bound to obey them, if the king were an infidel.

Coo. If Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, had so done, Nebuchadnezzar had not confessed the living God.

Bishop. These two and twenty years we have been governed by such kings.

Coo. My lord, why were you then dumb, and did not speak or bark?

Bishop. I durst not for fear of death. And thus they ended.

But after this done, it was reported that I railed; wherefore I recollected, and wrote down my railing (as they called it) that light should not be taken for darkness, nor sin for holiness, and the devil for God, who ought to be feared and honoured both now and for ever, Amen.

This Roger Coo, an aged father, after his sundry troubles and conflicts with his adversaries, at length was committed to the fire at Yexford, in the county of Suffolk, where he most blessedly ended his aged years, in the month of September, 1555.

An ACCOUNT of THOMAS COB, of HAVERHILL, BUTCHER, and MARTYR.

THOMAS COB, of Haverhill, butcher, was condemned on the 12th day of August, and executed in the month of September. Being brought and examined by Michael Dunning, the bloody chancellor of Norwich; first, whether he believed that Christ is really and substantially in the sacrament of the altar; answered, That the body of Christ, born of the virgin, was in heaven, and otherwise (he said) he would not answer, because he had read it in the scripture, that Christ did ascend, and did never descend since; and therefore said, that he had not learned in the scripture, that Christ should be in the sacrament.

Furthermore, being demanded whether he would obey the laws of the realm of England, made for the unity of the faith, or no; he answered, That his body should be at the king and queen's commandment so far as the law of God would suffer, &c. In fine, he being condemned, was burnt in the town of Thetford, in September, 1555.

An ACCOUNT of the MARTYRDOM of GEORGE CATMER, ROBERT STREATER, ANTHONY BURWARD, GEORGE BRODBRIDGE, and JAMES TUTTY.

NOW to return to Norfolk and Suffolk, in the diocese of Canterbury, where we shall treat of five worthy martyrs, whose blood in the same year and month of September, was spilt for the true testimony of Christ and his gospel, the names of whom are as follow:

George Catmer, of Hith; Robert Streater, of Hith; Anthony Burward, of Calote; George Brodbridge, of Bromfield; James Tutty, of Brenchley.

These upon the third day of August were brought before Dr. Thornton, the aforesaid bishop of Dover, and his accomplices, and there were both jointly and severally examined upon certain articles, touching the sacrament of the altar, auricular confession, and other such like.

To which the said Catmer (being first examined) made answer in this wise: Christ, said he, sitteth in heaven on the right hand of God the Father, and therefore I do not believe him to be in the sacrament of the altar; but he is in the worthy receiver spiritually; and the sacrament, as you use it, is an abominable idol.

Next unto him Robert Streater was called forth, who being also asked, Whether he did believe the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, said, that he did not so believe; for you do maintain heresy and idolatry (says he) in that you teach to worship a false god in the sacrament, enclosed in a box. It is you that are the malignant of the church: for in your church there are twenty things used against the law of God.

The like objection was likewise made against Anthony Burward, who also said that their sacrament was made an idol.

After him it was demanded of George Brodbridge what he said to those articles. Who answered, that he would not be confessed of a priest, because he could not forgive his own sins. And further said, that in the sacrament of the altar there is no real body of our Saviour Christ, but bread given in remembrance of him. Moreover, as for your holy bread, your holy water, and your mass, I do (says he) utterly deny them.

And last of all, James Tutty made and confirmed the foregoing answers.

And therefore they were all five condemned as heretics, and were all five burned at Canterbury in one fire, about the 6th day of September then next following.

Although the rage and vehemency of this terrible persecution in queen Mary's days did chiefly light in London, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Kent, as hath been partly already declared; yet notwithstanding, few parts of the realm were free from this fatal storm, but in almost all places some were put to death for the same righteous cause. And now to begin with the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, where we shall just mention two persons, namely, Thomas Hayward, and John Goreway, who were both condemned as heretics, and were burnt at Litchfield about the middle of September.

The HISTORY of ROBERT GLOVER, Gentleman, and Mr. JOHN GLOVER, in the Diocese of LITCHFIELD.

ROBERT GLOVER, gentleman, was likewise apprehended, and put to death in the month of September, in the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry. Of whose apprehension and troubles I cannot well treat, without mentioning some things relating to John Glover, his brother, because the commission was chiefly sent down for John, and not for Robert, (although it pleased God that John escaped, and Robert in his stead was apprehended) therefore I thought it necessary to comprehend them both in one story. In describing some part of their virtuous institution and order of life, I shall first begin with John the eldest brother; who, being a gentleman, and heir to his father in the town of Mancetor, was endowed with fair possessions and worldly goods, but much more plentifully enriched with God's heavenly grace, and inward virtues: which grace so wrought in him, that he with his other brethren, Robert and William, not only received and embraced the happy light of Christ's holy gospel, but also most zealously professed, and no less diligently in their lives and conversation followed the same.

John Glover was a man of a very tender conscience, and seemed to have a deeper taste and contemplation of heavenly things, and more mortified from worldly cares than the others were. His spiritual conflicts were very extraordinary, and because the consideration of them both is worthy of memory, and the example may work experience to the comfort of the godly, it may not be amiss to rehearse some part of them. It pleased God so to lay his heavy hand of inward afflictions and grievous passions upon him, that though he suffered not the pains of the outward fire, as his brothers and other martyrs did; yet if we consider what he suffered inwardly, and that for a long time, he may well be counted a martyr with his brother Robert, being no less desirous with him of the same martyrdom; yea, and in comparison may seem to be chronicled for a double martyr.

For as the said Robert was speedily dispatched with the sharp and extreme torments of the fire in a short time; so this no less blessed saint of God, what, and how much more grievous pangs, what sorrowful torments, what boiling heats of the fire of hell he inwardly felt, no tongue is able to express. Being young, I remember I was once or twice with him, who partly by his talk I perceived ceived, and partly by mine own eyes saw to be so worn and consumed by the space of five years, that he could hardly digest any meat; enjoy the quietness of sleep, or pleasure of life; yea, and almost no kind of senses were left in him. And truly I have often greatly wondered at the miraculous operation of Christ shewed upon him, who unless he had relieved in time his poor wretched servant so far worn, with some seasonable consolation now and then, it could not be possible for him to subsist under such intolerable agonies. And yet the occasion thereof was of no great moment neither. But nothing is more common amongst the holiest and best of men, by how much the more devout and watchful there are, (having the fear of God before their eyes) so much the more they mistrust and suspect themselves; whereby it cometh to pass, that they are often so terrified and perplexed with small matters (in comparison) as though they were huge mountains; whereas, on the contrary, others there be whom the blackest and most heinous crimes will nothing touch or move.

The occasion of this was, that he being first called by the light of the Holy Spirit to the knowledge of the gospel, and having received a wonderful, sweet, and feeling sense of Christ's heavenly kingdom, his mind, after that, falling to some cogitation of his former affairs belonging to his vocation, began by and by to misdoubt himself upon the occasion of these words written in the 6th chapter to the Hebrews; "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance: seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." Upon the consideration of which words, he fully persuaded himself that he had sinned against the Holy Ghost; even so much, that had he been in hell, he could hardly despair much more of his salvation. Every good man may readily judge, by himself, what terrors, boilings, and convulsions, turmoiled in the mean time in his woful breast; although it be hard for any man to judge of the misery thereof, but he who hath by experience felt the like.

Now in comparing the torments of all martyrs with his pains, I pray you, what pains, punishment, and flames would he not willingly have suffered, to have had some small ease and refreshment? Being under such intolerable agonies of mind, that he could have no enjoyment of his food, yet was he compelled to eat against his appetite, on purpose to defer the time of his damnation as long as he could, thinking with himself, that he must needs be thrown into hell, as soon as the breath went out of his body. However, he thought Christ pitied his case, and was sorry for him; yet he could not (as he imagined) help, because of the verity of the word, which said, "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened," &c.

And this I mention not to open his wound and expose his misfortunes, but to encourage all good men by his example to glorify the Son of God, who suffereth none to be tempted above his strength, but so tempereth and seasoneth the asperity of evils, that what seemeth to us intolerable, he doth not only alleviate, that we may bear it, but also turneth it more to our advantage than we can imagine; which manifestly appeared in this good servant of God, and in no man more. And although (as we have said) he suffered many years these sharp temptations and strong buffetings of Satan; yet the Lord, who graciously preserved him all the while, did not only at last rid him out of all discomfort, but also framed him thereby to such mortification of life, as the like probably hath not been seen, in such sort as he being like one placed in heaven already, and dead to this world, both in word and meditation led a life altogether celestial, abhorring in his mind all prophane doings. Neither was his talk anything different from the fruits of his life, never throwing out an idle, vile, or vain word. The most part of his lands he distributed to the use of his brethren, and committed the rest to the guiding of his servants and officers, whereby he might the more quietly give himself up to his godly study, as to a continual Sabbath rest. This was about the latter end of king Henry's reign, and continued in the time of king Edward VI.

After this in the persecuting days of queen Mary, as soon as the bishop of Coventry heard of his fame; and of his being so ardent and zealous in the gospel of Christ, he immediately wrote a letter to the mayor and officers of Coventry to apprehend him as soon as possible. But by the good providence of God, it happened otherwise: for God disposeth all things after his own secret pleasure; who seeing his old and trusty servant so many years with so extreme and many torments broken and dried up, would in no wise heap too many sorrows upon one poor silly wretch: neither would he commit him to the flames of fire, who had been already baked and scorched with the sharp fires of inward affliction, and had sustained so many burning darts and conflicts of Satan so many years: God therefore, of his divine providence, thinking it too much that one man should be so overcharged with so many plagues and torments, did graciously provide, that Robert his brother being both stronger in body, and also better furnished with helps of learning to answer the adversaries, (being a Master of Arts in Cambridge) should sustain that conflict, and even so it came to pass.

For as soon as the mayor of Coventry had received the bishop's letters for the apprehending of Mr. John Glover, he forthwith sent private notice to the said John to convey himself away: who with his brother William was not so soon departed out of his house, but that yet, in the sight of the sheriff and others, the searchers came and rushed in to take him, according to the bishop's order.

But when the person they sought for could not be found, one of the officers going into an upper chamber, found there Robert the other brother lying on his bed, who had been long sick; and was by him immediately brought before the sheriff. Which sheriff, notwithstanding, favouring Robert and his cause, would indeed fain have dismissed him, and wrought what means he could, saying, that he was not the man for whom they were sent: yet nevertheless, being terrified with the threats of the officer, contending with him to have him detained till the bishop's coming, he was constrained to carry him against his will, and so laid him fast till the bishop came. And thus much by way of preamble, concerning the worthy remembrance of Mr. John Glover.

Now to enter upon the matter which principally we have in hand, that is, to consider the story and martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover; as the whole narration was sent in a letter of his own writing to his wife, concerning the manner of his being handled; therefore it seemeth best, for the more credit of the matter, to exhibit his own letter, the contents of which are as follow.

L E T T E R

From Mr. ROBERT GLOVER to his WIFE, containing the whole DESCRIPTION of his TROUBLES.

THE peace of conscience with passeth all understanding, the sweet consolation, comfort, strength, and boldness of the Holy Ghost, be continually increased in your heart, through a fervent, earnest, and steadfast faith in our most dear and only Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

I thank you heartily (most loving wife) for your letters sent to me in my imprisonment. I read them with tears more than once or twice; with tears (I say) for joy and gladness, that God had wrought in you so merciful a work; first, an unfeigned repentance; secondly, an humble and hearty reconciliation; thirdly, a voluntary submission and obedience to the will of God in all things. Which when I read in your letters, and judged them to proceed from the bottom of your heart, I could not but be thankful to God, rejoicing with tears for you, and these his great mercies poured upon you.

These your letters, and the hearing of your most godly proceedings and constant doings from time to time, much relieved and comforted me at all times, and shall be a goodly testimony with you at the great day, against many worldly and dainty dames, who set more by their own pleasure and self in this world, than by God's glory, little regarding (as it appeareth) the everlasting health of their own souls or others. My prayer shall be whilst I am in this world, that God, which of his great mercy hath begun his good work in you, will finish it to the glory of his name; and by the mighty power and inspiration of his Holy Spirit, so strengthen, establish, and confirm you in all his ways to the end, that we may together shew forth his praises in the world to come, to our unspeakable consolation everlastingly, Amen.

So long as God shall lend you continuance in this miserable world, above all things give yourself continually to prayer, lifting up, as St. Paul saith, clean or pure hands without anger, wrath, or doubting, forgiving (as he saith also) if you have any thing against any man, as Christ forgiveth us. And that we may be the better willing to forgive, it is good often to call to remembrance the multitude and greatness of our sins, which Christ daily and hourly pardoneth and forgiveth us; and then we shall, as St. Peter affirmeth, be ready to cover and hide the offences of our brethren, be they ever so many. And because God's word teacheth us, not only the true manner of praying, but also what we ought to do, or not to do in the whole discourse and practice of this life, what pleaseth or displeaseth God, and that, as Christ saith, "The word of God that he hath spoken, shall judge in the last day;" let your prayer be to this end especially, That God of his great mercy would open and reveal more and more daily to your heart, the true sense, knowledge, and understanding of his most holy word, and give you grace in your living to express the fruits thereof.

And forasmuch as it is, as the Holy Ghost calleth it, the word of affliction, that is, it is seldom without hatred, persecution, peril, danger of loss of life and goods, and whatsoever seemeth pleasant in this world, as experience teacheth you in this time; call upon God continually for his assistance always, as Christ teacheth, casting your accounts what it is like to cost you, endeavouring yourself, through the help of the Holy Ghost, by continuance of prayer, to lay your foundation so sure, that no storm or tempest shall be able to overthrow or cast it down; remembering always (as Christ saith) Lot's wife; that is, to beware of looking back to that thing that displeaseth God. And because nothing displeaseth God so much as idolatry, that is, false worshipping of God, otherwise than his word commandeth; look not back (I say) nor turn your face to their idolatrous and blasphemous mass, manifestly against the word, practice, and example of Christ; as it is most manifest to all that have any taste of the true understanding of God's word, that there remaineth nothing in the church of England at this present, profitable or edifying to the church and congregation of the Lord, all things being done in an unknown tongue, contrary to the express commandment of the Holy Ghost.

They object that they be the church, and therefore they must be believed. My answer was, The church of God knoweth and acknowledgeth no other head but Jesus Christ the Son of God, whom ye have refused, and chosen the man of sin, the son of perdition, enemy to Christ, the devil's deputy and lieutenant, the pope.

Christ's church heareth, teacheth, and is ruled by his word, as he saith, "My sheep hear my voice. If you abide in me, and my word in you, you be my disciples." Their church repelleth God's words, and forceth all men to follow their traditions.

Christ's church dare not add or diminish, alter or change his blessed testament; but they be not afraid to take away all that Christ instituted, and go a whoring (as the scripture saith) with their own inventions, to glory and rejoice in the works of their own hands.

The church of Christ is, hath been, and shall be in all ages under the cross, persecuted, molested, and afflicted, the world ever hating them, because they be not of the world. But these persecute, murder, slay, and kill such as profess the true doctrine of Christ, be they in learning, living, conversation, and other virtues ever so excellent.

Christ and his church reserved the trial of their doctrine to the word of God, and gave the people leave to judge thereof by the same word, "Search the scriptures." But this church taketh away from the people, and suffereth neither learned nor unlearned to examine or prove their doctrine by the word of God.

The true church of God laboureth by all means to resist and withstand the lusts, desires, and motions of the world, the flesh, and the devil: these for the most part give themselves to all voluptuousness, and secretly commit such things, which (as St. Paul saith) it is shame to speak of.

By these and such like manifest probations, they declare themselves to be none of the church of Christ, but rather of the synagogue of Satan. It shall be good for you oftentimes to confer and compare their proceedings and doings with the practice of those whom the word of God doth teach to have been true members of the church of God, and it shall work in you both knowledge, erudition, and boldness, to withstand with suffering their doings. I likened them therefore to Nimrod, whom the scripture calleth a mighty hunter, or a stout champion, telling them, that that which they could not have by the word, they would have by the sword, and be the church whether men will or no; and called them with good conscience, as Christ called their forefathers, the children of the devil; and as their father the devil is a liar and a murderer, so their kingdom and church (as they call it) standeth by lying and murdering.

Have no fellowship with them therefore, my dear wife, nor with their doctrine and traditions, lest you be partaker of their sins, for whom is reserved a heavy damnation, without speedy repentance. Beware of such as shall advertise you to bear with the world for a season as they do. There is no dallying with God's matters: "It is a fearful thing (as St. Paul saith) to fall into the hands of the living God." Remember the prophet Elias. "Why halt ye on both sides?" Remember what Christ saith, "He that putteth his hands to the plough, and looketh back, is not worthy of me." And seeing God hath hitherto allowed you as a good soldier in the fore front, play not the coward, neither draw back to the rearward. St. John numbereth among them that shall dwell in the fiery lake, such as be fearful in God's cause. Set always before your eyes the examples of such as have behaved themselves boldly in God's cause, as Stephen, Peter, Paul, Daniel, the three children, the widow's sons, and in your days Anne Askew, Laurence Saunders, John Bradford, with many other faithful witnesses of Christ. "Be afraid in nothing (saith St. Paul) of the adversaries of Christ's doctrine, which is to them the sign of perdition, but to you of eternal salvation." Christ commandeth the same, saying, "Fear them not." Let us not follow the example of him which asketh time first to take leave of his friends. If we so do, we shall find few of them that will encourage us to go forward in our business, please it God ever so much. We do not read that James and John, Andrew and Simon, when they were called, put off the time till they had known their fathers or friends pleasure. But the scripture saith, "They forsook all, and by and by followed Christ." Christ likened the kingdom of God to a precious pearl, which whosoever findeth, selleth all that he hath to buy it. Yea, whosoever hath but a little taste or glimmering how precious a treasure the kingdom of heaven is, will gladly forego both life and goods for the obtaining of it. But the most part now-a-days are like Esop's cock, which when he had found a precious stone, wished rather to have found a barley corn. So ignorant are they how precious a jewel the word of God is, that they chuse rather the things of this world, which being compared to it, are less in value than a barley-corn.

If I would have given place to worldly reasons, these might have moved me: first, the leaving of you and my children; the consideration of the state of my children dren, being yet tender of age, and young, apt and inclinable to virtue and learning, and so having the more need of my assistance, being not altogether destitute of gifts to help them withal; possessions above the common sort of men; because I was never called to be a preacher or minister; and (because of my sickness) fear of death in imprisonment before I should come to my answer, and so my death to be unprofitable.

But these and such like, I thank my heavenly Father, (who of his infinite mercy inspired me with his Holy Spirit, for his Son's sake, my only Saviour and Redeemer) prevailed not in me: but when I had by the wonderful permission of God fallen into their hands, at the first sight of the sheriff, nature a little abashed; yet before I came to the prison, by the working of God, and through his goodness, fear departed. I said to the sheriff at his coming to me, What matter have you, Mr. Sheriff, to charge me withal? He answered, You shall know when you come before the masters; and so taking we with him, I expected to have been carried before the masters, and to have heard what they could have burdened me withal: but, contrary to my expectation, I was committed forthwith to the gaol, not being called to my answer, little justice being shewed therein. But the less justice a man findeth at their hands, the more consolation in conscience shall he find from God; for whosoever is of the world, the world will love him.

After I came into prison, and had reposed myself there a while, I wept for joy and gladness, my belly-full, musing much of the great mercies of God, and (as it were) saying to myself after this sort: O Lord, who am I, on whom thou shouldst bestow this thy great mercy, to be numbered among the saints that suffer for the gospel's sake? And so beholding and considering on the one side my imperfection, unableness, sinful misery, and unworthiness, and on the other side the greatness of God's mercy, to be called to so high promotion, I was, as it were, amazed and overcome for a while with joy and gladness, concluding thus with myself in my heart; O Lord, thou shewest power in weakness, wisdom in foolishness, mercy in sinfulness; who shall hinder thee to chuse where and whom thou wilt? As I have zealously loved the confession of thy word, so I ever thought myself to be most unworthy to be partaker of the affliction for the same.

Not long after Mr. W. Brasbridge, Mr. C. Phineas, and Mr. N. Hopkins, came unto me, persuading with me to be dismissed upon bonds. To whom my answer was (to my remembrance) after this sort: Forasmuch as the masters have imprisoned me, having nothing to burden me withal; if I should enter into bonds, I should in so doing accuse myself; and seeing they have no matter to lay to my charge, they may as well let me pass without bonds as with them.

Secondly, If I shall enter bonds, covenant and promise to appear, I shall do nothing but excuse, colour and cloak their wickedness, and endanger myself nevertheless, being bound by my promise to appear. They used many worldly persuasions to me to avoid the present peril, and also how to avoid the forfeiture if I brake my promise. I said unto them, I had cast up my pennyworth by God's help. They undertook also to make the bond easy.

And when they were somewhat importunate, I said to Mr. Hopkins, That liberty of conscience was a precious thing; and took, as it were, a pause, lifting up my heart to God earnestly for his aid and help, that I might do the thing that might please him. And so when they had let their suit fall, my heart (methought) was wonderfully comforted. Mr. Dudley communed with me in like manner; whom I answered in effect as I did before.

Afterwards debating the matter with myself, these considerations came into my head; I have from time to time with good conscience (God I take to record) moved all such as I had conference withal to be no dalliers in God's matters, but to shew themselves, after so great a light and knowledge, hearty, earnest, constant, and stable in so manifest a truth, and not to give place one jot contrary to the same. Now thought I, if I shall withdraw myself, and make any shifts to pull my own neck out of the collar, I shall give great offence to my weak brethren in Christ, and advantage to the enemies to slander God's word. It will be said, He hath encouraged others to be earnest and fervent, to fear no worldly perils or dangers, but he himself will give no such example.

Wherefore I thought it my bounden duty, both to God and man, being (as it were) by the great goodness of God marvellously called and appointed hereunto, to set aside all fear, perils and dangers, all worldly respects and considerations, and like as I had heretofore, according to the measure of my small gift within the compass of my vocation and calling, from the bottom of my heart unfeignedly moved, exhorted, and persuaded all that profess God's word, manfully to persist in the defence of the same, not with sword and violence, but with suffering and loss of life, rather than to defile themselves again with the whorish abomination of the Romish Antichrist; so the hour being come, with my fact and example to ratify, confirm, and protest the same to the hearts of all true believers: and to this end, by the mighty assistance of God's Holy Spirit, I resolved myself with much peace of conscience, willingly to sustain whatsoever the Romish Antichrist should do against me, and the rather, because I understood the bishop's coming to be at hand, and considered that poor men's consciences would then be sharply assaulted. So I remained prisoner in Coventry for the space of ten or eleven days, being never called to my answer by the masters, contrary to the laws of the realm, they having neither statute, law, proclamation, letter, warrant, nor commandment for my apprehension. They would have laid all the matter upon the sumner; who being examined, denied it before their faces, as one of my friends told me, saying, that he had no commandment concerning me, but for my elder brother. God lay not their extreme doings against me to their charge at the great day.

The second day after the bishop's coming to Coventry, Mr. Warren came to the Guildhall, and ordered the chief jailor to carry me to the bishop. I said to Mr. Warren's charge the cruel seeking of my death; and when he would have excused himself, I told him he could not wipe his hands so; he was as guilty of my blood before God, as though he had murdered me with his own hands.

And so he departed from me, saying, I needed not to fear if I would be of his belief. God open his eyes if it be his will, and give him grace to believe this, which he and all of his inclination shall find (I fear) too true for their parts; that is, that all they which cruelly, maliciously, and spitefully persecute, molest, and afflict the members of Christ for their conscience sake, and for the true testimony of Christ's word, and cause them most unjustly to be slain and murdered, without speedy repentance shall dwell with the devil and his angels in the fierce lake everlastingly, where they shall wish and desire, cry and call, but in vain (as their right companion did) to be refreshed by them whom in this world they contemned, despised, disdained, as slaves, misers, and wretches.

When I came before the bishop in Mr. Denton's house, he began with this protestation, That he was my bishop for lack of a better, and willed me to submit myself.

I said to him, I am not come to accuse myself, what have you to lay to my charge?

He asked me, whether I was learned? I answered, Smally learned.

Mr. Chancellor standing by, said I was a master of arts.

Then my lord laid to my charge my not coming to the church.

Here I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs, forasmuch as I had not been in his diocese for a long season, neither was any of the citizens able to prove any such matter against me. Notwithstanding, I answered him through God's merciful help, that I neither had, nor would come to their church, as long as their mass was used there, to save (if I had them) five hundred hundred lives. I desired him to shew me one jot or tittle in the scriptures for the proof and defence of the same.

He answered, he came to teach, and not to be taught.

I was content (I told him) to learn of him, so far as he was able to teach me by the word of God.

Bishop. Who shall judge the word?

Glover. Christ was willing that the people should judge his doctrine by searching the scriptures, and so was Paul; methinks you should claim no further privilege nor pre-eminence than they had.

Thus spake Robert Glover, offering him further, that he was content that the primitive church next to the apostles' time, should judge between the bishop and him. But the bishop refused that. Then he said, he was his bishop, and therefore he must believe him.

Glover. If you will be believed because you are a bishop, why find you fault with the people that believed bishop Latimer, bishop Ridley, and bishop Hooper, and the residue of them that were bishops?

Bishop. Because they were heretics.

Glover. And may not you err as well as they? I expected my lord to use some learned arguments to persuade me, but instead of that, he oppressed me only with his authority. He said, I dissented from the church, and asked me where my church was before king Edward's time?

I desired him to shew me where their church was in Elias's time, and what outward shew it had in Christ's time.

Bishop. Elias's complaint was only of the ten tribes that fell from David's house, whom he called heretics.

Glover. You be not able to shew any prophets that the other two tribes had at that same time.

My lord making no answer to that, Mr. Rogers, one of the masters of the city, cometh in the mean season, taking upon him as though he would answer to the text. But my lord forthwith commanded me to be committed to some tower, if they had any besides the common jail, saying, he would at the end of the visitation of his diocese, weed out such wolves. Mr. Rogers willed him to content himself for that night, till they had taken further order for me. Even where it pleaseth you, said I to my lord, I am content; and so I was returned at that time to the common jail again from whence I came.

On the Friday morning, being the next day, I had warning by one of the prisoners to prepare myself to ride with my fellow-prisoners the same day to Litchfield, there to be bestowed at the bishop's pleasure. Which tidings at first somewhat discouraged me, fearing lest I should by means of my great sickness, through hard usage, (which I expected) have died in prison before I should come to answer: but immediately with God's word, I rebuked this infidelity in myself, and by the same corrected mine own distrust in the following manner. What make I of God? Is not his power as great in Litchfield as in Coventry? Doth not his power extend as well to Litchfield as to Coventry? Was he not with Habakkuk, Daniel, Meshach, and Jeremy, in their most dangerous imprisonments? He knoweth what things we have need of. He hath numbered all the hairs of our head. The sparrow falleth not to the ground, without our heavenly Father's will; much more will he care for us if we be not faithless, whom he hath made worthy to be witnesses of his truth. So long as we put our trust in him, we shall never be destitute of his help, neither in prison, in sickness, nor in health, neither in life, nor in death, neither before kings, bishops, or the devil himself, much less one of his ministers shall be able to prevail against us. With such meditations I grew chearful, of good consolation and comfort: so that hearing one say that they could not provide horses enough for us, I said, Let them carry us in a dung-cart for lack of horses, if they please, I am willing for my part.

Notwithstanding, at the request of my friends, I wrote to Mr. Mayor, and his brethren, briefly requiring them that I might make answer here to such things as should be laid to my charge; the contents of which were to this purpose.

"I beseech you to understand, that it is not unknown, as well to the keeper of the jail, as to the inhabitants about me where I dwell, that I am a man subject to very great sickness, and have been for the space of seven years and more, so that it is not like that I should be removed without great peril and danger of life. And because I was here committed to ward by your appointment, I would gladly here answer to such things as should be laid to my charge. If I may obtain this of you, I have cause thankfully to acknowledge your indifferency; if otherwise, I pray God it be not laid to your charge at the great day, where every man shall have just judgment without respect of persons."

But receiving no answers to my letters, I conjectured, that when the bishop and the chancellor had seen them, they moved them rather to have me away, being more desirous (as I suppose) to have had me dispatched privily in prison, than to bring me openly to my answer; as did in some measure appear by the treatment I met with at my first coming to prison.

Certain serjeants and constables of Coventry being appointed to have the conveying of us to Litchfield, to be delivered there to one Jephcot, the chancellor's man, sent from Coventry with us for the same purpose, we were commanded to be on horseback about eleven or twelve o'clock on Friday, being a market day, that we might be the more gazed at: and to set the people's hearts more against us, they did proclaim a letter concerning a proclamation made for calling in, and annulling of all such books as truly expound and interpret the scriptures. We came to Litchfield about four o'clock, and had leave to repose ourselves for suppertime. We put up at the sign of the Swan, where we were entertained friendly and gently.

After supper Jephcot repaired to us, whom we intreated that upon former sureties we might rest ourselves that night, being unprovided of any thing to help ourselves withal in the prison at that present. He seemed willing at first, but afterwards (whether by persuasion, but I rather suppose out of policy, till he could gather a multitude to stare and gaze upon us, and also that we should provide nothing to ease ourselves withal) he revoked his promise, and so by consent we were carried to prison, in the sight of a great multitude of people. I desired Jephcot before to execute his office with mercy, telling him, that they should have judgment without mercy, that shewed no mercy. And this mercy I found at his hand.

He put me into a prison that same night, where I continued till I was condemned, in a place next the dungeon, where was small room, strong building, and very cold, with little light; and there he allowed me a bundle of straw instead of my bed, without chairs, form, or any thing else to ease myself withal. God of his mercy gave me great patience through prayer that night, so that if it had been his pleasure, I could have been contented to have ended my life: but Jephcot, and one Persey, the bishop's man, who afterwards was my continual keeper for the most part, came to me in the morning, to whom I said, This is a great extremity, God send us patience, and no more.

Then they were content that I should have a bed of my own procuring. But I was allowed no help, neither night nor day, nor company of any man, notwithstanding my great sickness; nor yet paper, pen, ink, or books, except my New Testament in Latin, and a Prayer-book which I privily stole in.

Within two days after, Mr. Chancellor and Mr. Temsey, a prebendary there, came to me into my prison. Mr. Chancellor exhorted me to conform myself to my lord and to the church. He wished no more hurt to my soul than he did to his own; belike because I had laid to his charge at Coventry the seeking of my blood unjustly and wrongfully.

Now thus the second time I answered Mr. Chancellor to to his exhortation, That I refused not to be ruled by that church, that was content to be ordered and governed by the word of God.

Chancellor. How know you the word of God, but by the church?

Glover. The church sheweth which is the word of God, therefore the church is above the word of God: this is no good reason in learning, said I to Mr. Chancellor. For it is like unto this; John shewed the people who was Christ; Therefore John was above Christ. Or else, I have a man that knoweth not the king, and I tell him who was the king, am I therefore above the king?

Mr. Chancellor said, he came not to reason with me, and so departed. And I remained for the space of eight days without any further conference with any man, until the bishop's coming: in which time I gave myself continually to prayer, and meditation of the merciful promises of God made unto all, without exception of person, that call upon the name of his dear Son Jesus Christ. I found in myself daily amendment of health of body, increase of peace in conscience, and many consolations from God, by the help of his Holy Spirit, and sometimes as it were a taste and glimmering of the life to come; all for his only Son Jesus Christ's sake: to him be all praise for ever and ever.

The enemy ceased not many times sundry ways to assault me, often objecting to my conscience mine own unworthiness, through the greatness of the benefit to be counted among the number of them that should suffer for Christ, for his gospel's sake. Against him I replied with the word of God on this sort, What were all those whom God hath chosen from the beginning to be his witnesses, and to carry his name before the world? Were they not men, as Paul and Barnabas said, as well subject to wickedness, sin, and imperfections, as other men be? Even such were Noah, Abraham, David, and the rest, "who gave first unto him," as Paul saith. And also speaking to every man, "What hast thou, that thou receivedst not?" Likewise John, "All have received of his fulness:" they were no bringers of any goodness to God, but altogether receivers. They chose not God first, but he chose them. They loved not God first, but he loved them first. Yea, he both loved and chose them when they were his enemies, full of sin and corruption, and void of all goodness. He is, and will be still, the same God, as rich in mercy, as mighty, as able, as ready, as willing to forgive sins without respect of persons, to the world's end, of all them that call upon him. "The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him: to all that call upon him in truth." God is near, he is at hand, he is with all, with all I say, and refuseth none; excepteth none that faithfully in true repentance call upon him, in what hour, what place, or what time soever it be. It is no arrogancy nor presumption in any man, to burthen God (as it were) with his promise, and of duty to claim and challenge his aid, help and assistance in all our perils, dangers, and distress, calling upon him, not in the confidence of our own godliness, but in the trust of his promises made in Christ, in whom, and by whom, and for whose sake, whosoever boldly approacheth to the mercy-seat of the Father, is sure to receive whatsoever is expedient or necessary, either for body or soul, in a more bountiful manner, than he can well wish, or dare desire. His word cannot lie, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou shalt praise me."

I answered the enemy also on this manner; I am a sinner, and therefore unworthy to be a witness of this truth. What then? Must I deny his word, because I am not worthy to profess it? What bring I to pass in so doing, but add sin to sin? What is greater sin than to deny the truth of Christ's gospel? As Christ himself beareth witness, "He that is ashamed of me or of my words, of him also will I be ashamed before my Father and all his angels." I might also, for the like reason, neglect obedience to any of God's commandments.

When I am provoked to pray, the enemy may say to me, I am not worthy to pray, therefore I shall not pray: and so in like manner of all the commandments,

I shall not forbear swearing, stealing, or murdering, because I am not worthy to keep any commandment of God. These be the delusions of the devil, and Satan's suggestions, which must be overcome by continual prayer, and with the word of God applied according to the measure of every man's gift, against all assaults of the devil.

At the bishop's first coming to Litchfield, after mine imprisonment, I was called into a bye chamber next to my prison, to my lord. Before whom when I came, and saw none but his officers, chaplains, and servants, except it were an old priest, I was partly amazed, and lifted up my heart to God for his merciful help and assistance.

My lord asked me how I liked my imprisonment; I gave him no answer touching that question. He proceeded to persuade me to be a member of his church, which had continued so many years. As for your church (said he to me), it was not known but lately in Edward's time.

I profess myself to be a member of that church (said I) that is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the head corner-stone, and so alledged the place of St. Paul to the Ephesians. And the church hath been from the beginning (said I), tho' it bear no glorious show before the world, being ever, for the most part, under the cross and affliction; contemned, despised, and persecuted. My lord contended on the other side, that they were the church.

So cried all the clergy (said I) against the prophets of Jerusalem, saying, "The church of the Lord, the church of the Lord." And always when I was about to speak any thing, my lord cried, Hold thy peace, I command thee by the virtue of thy obedience to hold thy peace, calling me a proud arrogant heretic.

I desired my lord to lay something to my charge in particular, and then to convince me with some scriptures and good learning.

Then my lord began to move certain questions. I refused to answer him in corners, requiring that I might make my answer openly. He said I should answer him there. I stood with him upon that point till he said I should go to prison again, and there have neither meat nor drink till I had answered him.

Then I lifted up my heart to God, that I might stand and agree with the doctrine of his most holy word.

The first question was this, How many sacraments Christ instituted to be used in the church?

The sacrament of baptism, said I, and the sacrament that he instituted at his last supper.

No more? said he.

Then said I, To all those that declare a true and unfeigned repentance, a sure hope, trust and confidence in the death of Christ, to such ministers, (I grant) have authority to pronounce, by the authority of God's word, the remission of sins.

Here interrupting me, he would needs bear me in hand that I called this a sacrament. I would not greatly contend with him in that point, because the matter was of no great weight or importance; although he in so doing did me wrong, for I called it not a sacrament.

He asked me further, Whether I allowed their confession?

I answered, No.

Then the bishop would know my mind what I thought of the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament.

I answered, That their mass was neither sacrifice nor sacrament, because (said I) you have taken away the true institution, which when you restore again, I will tell you my judgment concerning Christ's body in the sacrament.

And thus much did this worthy martyr of God leave behind him in his own hand-writing, concerning the manner of his usage in prison, and also of his disputes with the bishop and his chancellor. More examinations he had (no doubt) with the bishop in the public consistory, when he was brought forth to be condemned, which he would also have left unto us, if either length of life, or leisure of time, or haste of execution, had permitted.

permitted him to finish what he intended; but by reason of the writ of his burning being come down from London, want of time did neither serve him so to do, neither yet could I get the records of his last examination, wheresoever they are become.

Only this which I could learn by the relation of one Augustine Bernher, a minister, and a familiar friend of his, concerning the going to his death, I can report; that the said Mr. Robert Glover, after he was condemned by the bishop, and was now at a point to be delivered out of this world, it so happened, that two or three days before, his heart being heavy, and desolate of all spiritual consolation, felt in himself no aptness or willingness, but rather a heaviness and dulness of spirit, full of much discomfort to bear the bitter cross of martyrdom ready to be laid upon him.

Whereupon fearing in himself lest the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, made his moan to this Augustine, his friend above-mentioned, signifying unto him how earnestly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no motion nor sense of any comfort from him.

Unto whom the said Augustine answering again, desired him patiently to wait the Lord's pleasure, and howsoever his present feeling was, yet seeing his cause was just and true, he exhorted him constantly to stick to the same, and to play the man, nothing misdoubting but the Lord in his good time would visit him, and satisfy his desire with plenty of consolation; whereof (he said) he was right certain and sure; and therefore desired him, whensoever any such feeling of God's heavenly mercies should begin to touch his heart, that then he would shew some signification thereof, whereby he might witness with him the same, and so departed from him.

The next day, when the time came of his martyrdom, as he was going to the place, and was come within sight of the stake, (although all the night before praying for strength and courage he could feel none) suddenly he was so mightily replenished with God's holy comfort and heavenly joys, that he cried out, clapping his hands, to Austin, and saying these words, "Austin, he is come, he is come," &c. and that with such joy and alacrity, as one seeming rather to be risen from some deadly danger to liberty and life, than as one passing out of the world by any pains of death. Such was the change of the marvellous working of the Lord's hand upon that good man.

An ACCOUNT of CORNELIUS BUNGEY, FELLOW-MARTYR with Mr. ROBERT GLOVER.

IN the same fire with Mr. Glover, Cornelius Bungey, of Coventry, was likewise burnt, who was condemned by the said bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. As concerning the articles which were objected to him, the effect thereof was this.

First, It was objected against him, that these three years last, in the city of Coventry and Litchfield, and places thereabout, he did hold, maintain, argue, and teach, that the priest hath no power here to absolve any sinner from his sins.

Secondly, That by baptism sins are not washed away, because he said that the washing of the flesh purgeth the flesh outwardly, and not the soul.

Thirdly, that there be in the church only two sacraments, that is, baptism, and the Lord's supper.

Fourthly, That in the sacrament of the popish altar, was not the real body and blood of Christ, but the substance of bread and wine there remaining still, because St. Paul calleth it bread and wine, &c.

Fifthly, That he, within the compass of the said years and time, did hold, maintain, and defend, that the pope is not the head of the visible church here on earth, &c.

Sixthly, That he was of the diocese and jurisdiction of the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, &c.

Seventhly, That the premises are true, manifest, and notorious, and that upon the same there hath been and is a public voice and fame, as well in the places above rehearsed, as in other quarters also about, &c.

To which articles he answered again:

To the first he granted, and to every part thereof, meaning after the popish manner of absolution.

To the second he granted first, after revoked the same.

To the third also he granted, adding withal, that in scripture there is no more contained.

To the fourth touching the sacrament, he granted, and to every part thereof.

To the fifth, concerning the pope, likewise.

Also to the sixth he granted; and likewise to the seventh.

Upon these articles and his answers to the same, the said Radulph, the bishop, read the sentence, and so committed him also, after condemnation of Mr. Robert Glover, to the secular power.

Thus this aforesaid Cornelius, falsely condemned by the bishop before-mentioned, suffered at the same stake with the christian martyr, Mr. Robert Glover, at Coventry, about the 20th of September.

The HISTORY of JOHN GLOVER, and WILLIAM GLOVER, who were excommunicated after their Death, and buried in the FIELDS.

JOHNS and William Glover, the two brothers of Robert Glover, the martyr, ought not to be omitted in this history, although they were not called to finish their course in fire, as their brother, and other martyrs were; yet they were cast out of the church, and excommunicated even after they were dead, and denied christian burial.

And first concerning Mr. John Glover, the elder brother, what inward storms and agonies he sustained by the ghostly enemy, you have partly heard before described: now what his bodily enemies wrought against him, remaineth to be declared. Whose rage and malice, although God restrained, that they could little prevail against him so long as life endured, yet after his decease, having power upon him, what they did you shall now understand.

Whereupon the sheriffs, with their under officers and servants, being sent to seek him, came into his house, where he and his wife were. It chanced as he was in the chamber by himself, the officers bursting into the house, and searching other rooms, came to the chamber where John Glover was, who being within, and holding the latch softly in his hand, perceived and heard the officers bustling about the door, amongst whom one of the said officers having the string in his hand, was ready to draw and pluck at the same.

In the mean time another coming by, (whose voice he heard and knew) bade them come away, saying, they had been there before. Whereupon they departing thence, went to search other corners of the house, where they found Agnes Glover his wife, who being carried to Litchfield, and there examined before the bishop, at length after much ado, was constrained to give place to their tyranny. John Glover, in the mean time, partly for care of his wife, partly through cold taken in the woods where he did lie, took an ague, whereupon not long after, he left this life, which the cruel papists so long had sought for.

Thus by the mighty protection of the Almighty Lord, how John Glover was delivered and defended from the hands of the persecuting enemies during all the time of his life, you have heard. Now what befel after the time of his death, both to him and his brother William, is worthy to be remembered. After he was dead and buried in the church-yard, without priest, or clerk, Dr. Dracott, then chancellor, six weeks after, sent for the parson of the town, and demanded how it happened that he was there buried. The parson answered, that he was then sick, and knew not of it. Then the chancellor commanded the parson to go home, and to cause the body of the said John Glover to be taken up, and to be cast over the wall into the high-way: the parson again answered, that he had been six weeks in the earth, and so smelled, that none were able to endure it. Well, quoth Dr. Dracor, then take this bill, and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned soul, and a twelvemonth after take up his bones, (for then the flesh will be consumed) and cast them over the wall, that the carts and horses may tread upon them, and then I will come and hallow again that place in the church-yard where he was buried. Recorded by the parson of the town, who told the same to Hugh Burrows, dwelling at Fynden, in Derbyshire, and to Mr. Robert Glover's wife, by whose credible information we received the same.

Not much unlike usage was practised also by these catholic children of the mother church, upon the body of William, the third brother, whom, after it had pleased Almighty God about the same season to call out of this vale of misery, the well-disposed people of the town of Weme, in Shropshire, where he died, brought the body into the parish church, intending to have it there buried. But one Bernard, being then curate of the said church, in order to stop the burial thereof, rode to the bishop named Ralph Baine, to certify him of the matter, and to have his advice therein. In the mean time, the body lying there a whole day, in the night-time one Richard Morice, a taylor, would have interred him. But then came John Thorlyne, of Weme, with some others, of Weme, and would not suffer the body to be buried; expressing to us the contrary examples of good Tobit; for as he was religious in burying the dead, so this man's religion consists in not burying the dead; so that after he had lain there two days and one night, the aforesaid Bernard, the curate, came with the bishop's letter, the contents of which letter being copied out word for word, here follow.

A COPY of the BISHOP's LETTER written to the PARISH of WEME.

UNDERSTANDING that one Glover an heretic is dead in the parish of Weme, which Glover hath, all the time of my being in this country, been known for a rebel against our holy faith and religion, a contemner of the holy sacraments and ceremonies used in the holy church, and hath separated himself from the holy communion of all good christian men, and never required to be reconciled to our mother holy church, nor in his last days did call for his spiritual father, but died without the rites belonging to a christian man; I thought it good not only to command the curate of Weme, that he should not be honoured with christian burial, but also will and command all the parish of Weme, that no man procure help, nor speak to have him buried in holy ground: but I do charge and command the church-wardens of Weme in special, and all the parish of the same, that they assist the said curate in defending and hindering, and procuring that he be not buried in the church, or within the walls of the church-yard: and likewise I charge those that brought the body to the place to carry it away again, and that at their charge, as they will answer at their peril. At Ecclesch, this sixth of September, 1555.

By your Ordinary, RADULPH,
COVENTRY and LITCHFIELD.

By virtue of this aforesaid letter, so it fell out, that they who brought the corpse thither, were obliged to carry it back again at their own charges. But as the body was corrupted, and smelt so strong that no man could well come near it, they were forced to draw it with horses into a broom-field, and there he was buried.

The like example of charitable affection in these catholic churchmen, is also to be seen and noted in the burying of one Edward Burton, Esq. who in the same diocese of Chester, departing out of this world the very day before queen Elizabeth was crowned, required of his friends, as they would answer for it, that his body should be buried in his parish church, (which was St. Chad's, in Shrewsbury) so that no mass-monger should be present thereat. Which thing being declared to the curate of that parish, named John Marshall, and the body being withal brought to the burial, upon the same day when the queen was crowned, the curate being therewith offended, said plainly, that he should not be buried in the church there. Whereupon one of the friends of the deceased, named George Torpelley, answering again, said, That God would judge him in the last day, &c. Then said the priest, Judge God or devil, the body shall not come there. And so they buried him in his own garden, where he is no doubt as near the kingdom of heaven as if he had been buried in the midst of the church.

Moreover, in the said county of Salop, I find that one Oliver Richardine, of the parish of Whitchurch, was burnt in Hartford-west, sir John Yonge being sheriff the same time, which seemeth to be about the last year of king Henry the eighth. Whose name, as it was not mentioned before, I thought here to give some little touch of him, having now in hand to speak of the persecution within the diocese of Coventry and Litchfield.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM WOLSEY, and ROBERT PYGOT, PAINTER.

WILLIAM Wolsey and Robert Pygot, both inhabitants of the town of Wisbich, were the next condemned after the suffering of Robert Glover and Cornelius Bungey. These two blessed martyrs were judged and condemned at Ely, by John Fuller, the bishop's chancellor of Ely, Dr. Shaxtone, his suffragan, Robert Stewart, dean of Ely, John Christopherson, dean of Norwich, October 9, 1555. The said William Wolsey, who was then a constable, through the means of one Richard Everard, gentleman, a justice appointed for those days, who cruelly treated the said William Wolsey, was caused to put in sureties for his good behaviour and appearance at the next general sessions held within the Isle of Ely. Being called again at the next sessions, he was still constrained to put in new sureties, which at length he refused to do, and so was committed to jail, at the assize held at Ely in Lent.

In the Easter week following, Dr. Fuller, the chancellor, with Christopherson, and one Dr. Yong, came to confer with him, who laid earnestly to his charge that he was not of the catholic faith, desiring him to meddle no further with the scriptures, than it did become such a lay-man as he was, to do. The said William Wolsey standing still a great while, suffering them to say their pleasure, at last he answered in this wise; Good Mr. Doctor, What did our Saviour Christ mean, when he spake these words written in the 23d chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, "Woe be unto you scribes and pharisees, hypocrites; for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."

Yea, saith Dr. Fuller, you must understand, that Christ spake to the scribes and pharisees.

Nay, Mr. Doctor, Christ spake even to you, and your fellows here present, and to all others such as you be.

Away, Mr. Doctor, said Christopherson, for you can do no good with this man. Yet, saith Dr. Fuller, I will leave thee a book to read, I promise thee of a learned man's doing, that is to say, of Dr. Watson's doing (who was then bishop of Lincoln).

Wolsey receiving the same book, did diligently read it over, which in many places did manifestly appear contrary to the known truth of God's word. At length, a fortnight or three weeks following, the said Dr. Fuller resorting again to the prison to confer with the said Wolsey, asked him how he liked the said book, (thinking that he had won him by the reading of the same) who answered him and said, Sir, I like the book no otherwise than I thought before I should find it. Wherefore the chancellor taking his book, departed home.

At night when Dr. Fuller came to his chamber to look on it, he found in many places, contrary to his mind, mind, the book rased with a pen by the said Wolsey. Which he seeing, and being vexed therewith, said, O this is an obstinate heretic, and hath quite marred my book.

Then the assizes to be held at Wisbich drawing nigh, Dr. Fuller cometh again to the said Wolsey, and spake unto him on this manner: Thou dost much trouble my conscience, wherefore I pray thee depart, and rule thy tongue, so that I hear no more complaint of thee, and come to the church when thou wilt, and if thou be complained upon, so far as I may, I promise thee I will not hear of it.

Mr. Doctor, said Wolsey, I was brought hither by a law, and by a law I will be delivered.

Then being brought to the sessions before named, Wolsey was laid in the castle at Wisbich, he and all his friends thinking, that he should have suffered there at that present time, but it proved otherwise.

Then Robert Pygot, the painter, being at liberty, was there presented by some evil disposed persons (sworn men as they called them) for not coming to the church.

The said Pygot being called in the sessions, would not absent himself, but there did plainly appear before sir Clement Hygham, being judge, who said unto him; Ah, are you the holy father the painter? How chance you came not to the church? Sir, quoth the painter, I am not out of the church, I trust in God.

No, sir, said the judge, this is no church, this is a hall. Yea, sir, said Pygot, I know very well it is a hall: but he that is in the true faith of Jesus Christ, is never absent, but in the church of God.

Ah, sirrah, said the judge, you are too high learned for me to talk with, wherefore I will send you to them that are better learned than I, straightway commanding him to the jail where Wolsey lay. So the sessions being broke up and ended, the said Wolsey and Pygot were carried again to Ely to prison, where they both remained till the day of their death.

In the mean time some of their neighbours of Wisbich being at Ely, came to see how they did. There came hither also a chaplain of bishop Goodrick's, a Frenchman born, one Peter Valentius, who said to the said Wolsey and Pygot: My brethren, according to my office I am come to talk with you, for I have been amanner here these twenty years and above. Wherefore I must desire you, my brethren, to take it in good part that I am come to talk with you, I promise you not to pull you from your faith. But I both require and desire, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you stand to the truth of the gospel and word, and I beseech the Almighty God, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, to preserve both you and me in the same unto the end. For I know not myself (my brethren) how soon I shall be at the same point that you are. These with many other like words he made an end, causing all that were there present to water their cheeks, contrary to the expectation they all had of him. God be praised therefore.

Then within a short time after, Pygot and Wolsey were called to judgment about the 9th of October, before Dr. Fuller, then chancellor, with old Dr. Shaxton, Christopherfon, and others in commission, who laid earnestly to their charge for their belief in divers articles, but especially of the sacrament of the altar. Whereunto their answer was, That the sacrament of the altar was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Christ was not present really in the sacrament; and to this opinion they said they would stick, perfectly believing the same to be no heresy that they had affirmed, but the very truth, whereunto they would stand. Then the doctors said, that they were out of the catholic faith.

Then Dr. Shaxton said unto them, Good brethren, remember yourselves, and become new men, for I myself was in this fond opinion that you are now in, but I am now become a new man.

Ah, said Wolsey, are you become a new man? Woe be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God shall justly judge thee.

Dr. Fuller then spake, saying, This Wolsey is an obstinate fellow, and one that I could never do good upon. But as for the painter, he is a man quier and indifferent, (as far as I perceive) and is soon reformed, and may very well be delivered for any ill opinion I find in him.

Then Christopherfon called for pen and ink, and wrote these words following: I Robert Pygot do believe, that after the word of consecration spoken by the priest, there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very body and blood of Christ really and substantially, the self-same that was born of the virgin Mary; and reading it to the painter, he said thus, Dost thou believe all this according as it is written?

No, sir, said the painter, that is your faith, and not mine.

Christopherfon. Lo, Dr. Fuller, you would have let this fellow go, he is as much an heretic as the other. And so immediately judgment was given upon them to die. Which done, after the sentence read, they were sent again to prison, where they lay till the day of their death. On which day, one Peacock, a batchelor of divinity, being appointed to preach, took his text out of the first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, chap. v. of one that had lived inordinately by abusing his father's wife; likening the said Pygot and Wolsey to the same man, oftentimes saying, that such members must be cut off from the congregation; most maliciously reporting the said Wolsey to be clean out of the faith, and in many places quite denying the scriptures.

So his sermon being ended, the aforesaid Pygot and Wolsey were brought to the place of execution, and so bound to the stake with a chain; thither came one Richard Collinson, a priest, at that time destitute of any abiding place or settled benefice, who said unto Wolsey, Brother Wolsey, the preacher hath openly reported in his sermon this day, that you are quite out of the catholic faith, and deny baptism, and that you do err in the holy scripture; wherefore I beseech you, for the certifying of my conscience, with others here present, that you do declare in what place of the scripture you do err and find fault.

Wolsey. I take the eternal and everlasting God to witness, that I do err in no part or point of God's book, the holy bible, but hold and believe in the same to be most firm and sound doctrine in all points most worthy for my salvation, and for all other christians to the end of the world. Whatsoever mine adversaries report of me, God forgive them therefore. With that came one to the fire with a great sheer full of books to burn, like as they had been New Testaments. O, said Wolsey, give me one of them, and Pygot desired another, both of them clapping them close to their breasts, saying the 106th Psalm, desiring all the people to say, Amen, and so received the fire most thankfully.

Concerning the story of William Wolsey, I received moreover from the university of Cambridge, by a credible person, and my faithful friend William Fulke, this relation, which I thought in this place not improper to be notified to the reader, in order and form as followeth.

There were two godly martyrs burnt at Ely, the one named Wolsey, the other Pygot. In these two appeared a different disposition of spirit. Pygot was mild, humble, and modest, promising that he would be conformable to his persecutors, if they could persuade him by the scripture. Wolsey was stout, strong, and vehement, as one having the fulness of the Spirit, and detested all their doing, as of whom he was sure to receive nothing but cruelty and tyranny. He was wonderfully jealous over his companion, fearing lest his gentle nature would have been overcome by the flattering enticements of the world, and therefore the same day that they were burnt, when they would have talked with him alone, he pulled him away from them almost by force. He was so desirous to glorify God with his suffering, that being wonderfully sore tormented in the prison with the tooth-ach, he feared nothing more than that he should depart before the day of execution (which he called his glad day) were come.

This Wolsey being in prison at Ely, was visited by Thomas Hobilo, brewer, in Ely. To him he delivered certain certain money to be distributed (as he appointed) part to his wife, and part to his kinsfolks and friends, and especially six shillings and eight-pence, to be delivered to one Richard Denton, a smith, dwelling at Wells, in Cambridgeshire, within the jurisdiction of the isle of Ely, with his commendation, that he marvelled that he tarried so long behind him, seeing that he was the first that delivered him the book of scripture into his hand, and told him that it was the truth, desiring him to make haste after as fast as he could.

This Thomas Hodilo, both to avoid the danger of the time, and to have a witness of his doings herein, delivered the same sum of money to one Mr. Lawrence, a preacher, in Essex, (who then resorted often to his house) to be distributed as Wolsey had appointed; which thing he performed, riding from place to place.

And when his six shillings and eight-pence was delivered to Richard Denton, with the commendation aforesaid, his answer was this, I confess it is true, but alas! I cannot burn. This was almost one whole year after Wolsey was burnt. But he that could not burn for the cause of Christ, was afterwards burnt against his will, even after Christ had given peace to his church. For on Tuesday, the 18th of April, 1564, his house was set on fire, and he endeavouring to save his goods, perished in the flames, with two others that were in the same house.

Witnessed by

THO. HODILO, and WILL. FULKE.

Not much unlike this, was the example of Mr. West, chaplain to bishop Ridley, who refusing to die in the cause of Christ, with his master, said mass against his conscience, and died soon after.

C H A P. XII.

HISTORY of the MARTYRDOM of BISHOP RIDLEY and BISHOP LATIMER. CHARACTER of STEPHEN GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER.—Further ACCOUNT of the EXAMINATIONS, &c. of many PIOUS and GODLY MEN and WOMEN.

The HISTORY of Dr. NICHOLAS RIDLEY, and Mr. HUGH LATIMER, both BISHOPS.

ON the 17th of October, 1555, (the day on which William Wolsey and Thomas Pygot suffered at Ely) those two famous and singular captains, the principal pillars of Christ's church, Dr. Nicholas Ridley, bishop of London, and Mr. Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, were cruelly burnt in one fire at Oxford. Men, ever memorable for their piety, learning, and incomparable ornaments and gifts of grace.

Dr. Ridley was born in the county of Northumberland; when a child, he learned his grammar in Newcastle, and was removed from thence to the university of Cambridge, where he in a short time became so famous, that for his singular aptness he was called to be head of Pembroke Hall, and there made doctor of divinity. After this he travelled to Paris, and at his return was made chaplain to king Henry the eighth, and promoted afterwards by him to the bishopric of Rochester, and from thence translated to the see and bishopric of London, in king Edward's days.

Bishop Ridley, after the coming in of queen Mary, was one of the first that hands were laid on, and committed to prison, as before hath been sufficiently declared: first in the Tower, and from thence translated with the archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Latimer to Oxford, and with them inclosed in the common prison of Boccardo; but at length being separated from them, he was committed to custody in the house of one Irish, where he was committed till the day of his martyrdom, which was from the year of our Lord 1554, till Oct. 16, 1555.

Dr. RIDLEY's Answers in Company with Mr. LATIMER, in Prison, upon the Objections of ANTONIAN, meaning by that Name some Popish Persecutor, as WINCHESTER, alluding thereby to the Story of VICTOR. lib. 3. De Persecut. Aphri.

Objection 1. ALL men marvel greatly, why you, after the liberty you have granted unto you, more than the rest, do not go to mass, which is a thing much esteemed of all men, yea, of the queen herself.

Ridley. Because no man that layeth hand on the plough and looketh back is fit for the kingdom of God, and also for the self-same cause why St. Paul would not suffer Titus to be circumcised, which is, that the truth of the gospel might remain with us incorrupt, Gal. ii. And also, If I build against the things which I destroyed, I make myself a trespasser. This is likewise another cause: lest I should seem by outward fact to allow the thing, which I am persuaded is contrary to sound doctrine, and so should be a stumbling-block unto the weak. But woe be unto him by whom offence cometh: it were better for him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and be cast into the midst of the sea.

Objection 2. What is it then that offendeth you so greatly in the mass, that you will not vouchsafe once to hear or see it? And from whence cometh this new religion upon you? Have you not used in times past to say mass yourself?

Ridley. I confess unto you my fault and ignorance; but know you that for these matters I have done penance long ago, both at St. Paul's Cross, and also openly in the pulpit at Cambridge, and I trust God hath forgiven me this mine offence: for I did it ignorantly. But if you be desirous to know, and will vouchsafe to hear what things do offend me in the mass, I will rehearse those things which be most clear, and seem most manifestly to repugn against God's word, and they be these: The strange tongue, the want of the shewing of the Lord's death, the breaking of the Lord's commandment of having a communion; the sacrament is not communicated to all under both kinds, according to the word of the Lord; the sign is servilely worshipped for the thing signified; Christ's passion is injured, soasmuch as this mass-sacrifice is affirmed to remain for the purging of sins; to be short, the manifold superstitions, and trifling fooleries which are in the mass, and about the same.

Latimer. Better a few things well pondered, than to trouble the memory with too much; you shall prevail more with praying, than with studying, though mixture be best, for so one shall alleviate the tediousness of the other. I intend not to contend much with them in words, after a reasonable account of my faith given: for it will be but in vain. They will say, as their fathers said, when they have no more to say: We have a law, and by our law we ought to die. Be you steadfast and immoveable, faith St. Paul: and again, Stand fast: and how oft is this repeated, If you abide, &c. But we shall be called obstinate, sturdy, ignorant, heady, and what not; so that a man hath need of much patience, having to do with such men.

Objection 3. But you know how great a crime it is to separate yourself from the communion or fellowship of the church, and to make a schism, or division. You have been reported to have hated the sect of the Anabaptists, and always to have impugned the same. Moreover, this was the pernicious error of Novatus, and of the heretics called [Cathari], that they would not communicate with the church.

Ridley. I know that the unity of the church is to be retained by all means, and the same is necessary to salvation. But I do not take the mass, as it is at this day, for the communion of the church, but a popish device, whereby both the commandment and the institution of our Saviour Christ, for the oft frequenting of the remembrance of his death, is eluded, and the people of God are miserably deluded. The sect of the Anabaptists, and the heresy of the Novitians, ought of right to be condemned, forasmuch as without any just or necessary cause, they wickedly separate themselves from the communion of the congregation, for they did not alledge that the sacraments were unduly administered, but turning their eyes from themselves, wherewith, according to St. Paul's rule, they ought to examine themselves, and casting their eyes ever upon others, either ministers, or communicants with them, they always reprov'd something, for which they abstained from the communion, as from an unholy thing.

Objection 4. But admit there be in the mass, that peradventure might be amended, or at least made better: yea, seeing you will have it so, admit there be a fault; if you do not consent thereto, why do you trouble yourself in vain? Do not you know both by Cyprian and Augustine, that communion of sacraments doth not defile a man, but consent of deeds?

Ridley. If it were any one trifling ceremony, or if it were some one thing of itself indifferent, (although I would wish nothing should be done in the church which doth not edify the same) yet for the continuance of the common quietness I could be content to bear it. But forasmuch as things done in the mass tend openly to the overthrow of Christ's institution, I judge that by no means either in word or deed I ought to consent unto it. As for that which is objected out of the fathers, I acknowledge it to be well spoken, if it be well understood. But it is meant of them which suppose they are defiled, if any secret vice be either in the ministers, or in them that communicate with them; and is not meant of them which do abhor superstition, and wicked traditions of men, and will not suffer the same to be thrust upon themselves, or upon the church, instead of God's word and the truth of the gospel.

Objection 5. Consider into what dangers you cast yourself, if you forsake the church; and you cannot but forsake it, if you refuse to go to mass. For the mass is the sacrament of unity; without the ark there is no salvation. The church is the ark and Peter's ship. You know this saying well enough. He shall not have God to be his Father, which acknowledgeth not the church to be his mother. Moreover, without the church, (saith St. Augustine) be the life ever so well spent, none shall inherit the kingdom of heaven.

Ridley. The holy catholic or universal church, which is the communion of saints, the house of God, the city of God, the spouse of Christ, the body of Christ, the pillar and stay of truth; this church I believe according to the creed. The guide of this church is the Holy Ghost. In times past, (saith Chrysostom) there were many ways to know the church of Christ, that is to say, by good life, by miracles, by chastity, by doctrine, by administering the sacraments. But from that time that heresies did take hold of the church, it is only known by the scriptures, which is the true church. They have all things in outward show, which the true church hath in truth. To that which they say, That the mass is the sacrament of unity, I answer; The bread which we break, according to the institution of the Lord, is the sacrament of the unity of Christ's mystical body. For we being many, are one bread and one body, forasmuch as we are all partakers of one bread. But in the mass, the Lord's institution is not observed; for we are not all partakers of one bread, but one devoureth all, &c. So that (as it is used) it may seem a sacrament of singularity, and of a certain special privilege for one sect of people, whereby they may be discerned from the rest, rather than a sacrament of unity, wherein our knitting together in one is represented.

Objection 6. That church which you have described to me is invisible, but Christ's coming is visible and known. For else why should Christ have said, Tell it unto the church. For he had commanded in vain to go unto his church, if a man cannot tell which it is.

Ridley. The church which I have described is visible, it hath members which may be seen; but either if our eyes be so dazzled, that we cannot see, or that Satan hath brought such darkness into the world, that it is hard to discern the church, that is not the fault of the church, but either of our blindness, or of Satan's darkness. But yet in this most deep darkness, there is one most clear candle, which of itself alone is able to put away all darkness. Thy word is a candle unto my feet, and a light unto my steps.

Objection 7. The church of Christ is a catholic or universal church, dispersed throughout the whole world; this church is the great house of God, in this are good men and evil mingled together, goats and sheep, corn and chaff; it is the net which gathereth all kinds of fishes; this church cannot err, because Christ hath promised it his Spirit, which shall lead it into all truth, and that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; that he will be with it unto the end of the world; whatsoever it shall loose or bind upon earth shall be ratified in heaven, &c. This church is the pillar and stay of truth; that is it for which St. Augustine saith, he believeth the gospel. But this universal church alloweth the mass, because the greater part of the same alloweth it.

Ridley. I grant that the name of the church is taken after three divers manners in the scripture. Sometimes for the whole multitude of them who profess the name of Christ, of which they are also named Christians. But as St. Paul saith of the Jews, not every one is a Jew, that is a Jew outwardly, &c. neither yet all that be of Israel are counted the seed; even so, not every one that is a christian outwardly is a christian indeed. For if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, the same is none of his. Therefore that church which is his body, and of which Christ is the head, standeth only on living stones, and true christians, not only outwardly in name and title, but inwardly in heart and in truth. But forasmuch as this church, (which is the second taking of the church) as touching the outward fellowship, is contained within the great house, and hath with the same outward society of the sacraments and ministry of the word, many things are spoken of that universal church (which St. Augustine calleth the mingled church) which cannot truly be understood, but only of that pure part of the church. So that the rule of Ticonius concerning the mingled church, may here well take place; where there is attributed unto the whole church that which cannot agree to the same, but by reason of the one part thereof; that is, either for the multitude of good men, which is the very true church indeed; or for the multitude of evil men, which is the malignant church and synagogue of Satan. And there is also a third taking of the church; of which although there be seldom mention in the scriptures, in that signification, yet in the world, even in the most famous assemblies of Christendom, this church hath borne the greatest sway. This distinction presupposed of the three sorts of churches, it is an easy matter, by a figure called Synecdoche, to give to the mingled and universal church that which cannot be truly understood, but only of the one part thereof. But if any man will stiffly affirm, that Universal doth so pertain unto the church, that whatsoever Christ hath promised to the church, it must needs be understood of that, I would gladly know of the same man where that universal church was in the times of the patriarchs and prophets, of Noah, Abraham, and Moses, (at such time as the people would have stoned him) of Elias, of Jeremiah, in the times of Christ, and the dispersion of the apostles, in the time of Arius, when Constantius was emperor, and Felix, bishop of Rome, succeeded Liberius. It is worthy to be noted, what Lyra writeth upon Matthew; The church (saith he) doth not stand in men by reason of their power or dignity, whether it be ecclesiastical or secular. For princes and popes popes, and other inferiors, have been found to have fallen away from God. Therefore the church consisteth in those persons, in whom is true knowledge and confession of the faith, and of the truth.

Objection 8. General councils represent the universal church, and have this promise of Christ; Where two or three be gathered together in my name; there am I in the midst of them. If Christ be present with two or three, then much more where there is so great a multitude. &c. But in general councils mass hath been approved and used.

Ridley. Of the universal church, which is mingled of good and bad, thus I think; Whosoever they which be chief in it, which rule and govern the same, and to whom the whole mystical body of Christ doth obey, are the lively members of Christ, and walk after the guiding and rule of his word, and go before the flock to everlasting life, then undoubtedly councils gathered together of such guides and pastors of the christian flock, do indeed represent the christian church; and being so gathered in the name of Christ, they have a promise of the gift and guiding of his Spirit into all truth. But that any such council hath at any time allowed the mass, such an one as ours was of late, in a strange tongue, and stuffed with so many absurdities, errors, and superstitions; that I utterly deny, and affirm it to be impossible. For like as there is no agreement betwixt light and darkness, betwixt Christ and Belial; so surely superstition and the sincere religion of Christ, will-worship and the pure worshipping of God, such as God requireth of his, that is, in spirit and truth, never can agree together. But you will say, where so great a company is gathered together, it is not credible but there are two or three gathered in the name of Christ. I answer, If there be one hundred good, and two hundred bad, (for as much as the decrees and ordinances are pronounced according to the greater number of the multitude of voices) what can the less number of voices avail? It is a known thing, and a common proverb, oftentimes the greater part overcometh the better.

Objection 9. If the matter should go thus, that in general councils men should not stand to the greater number of the multitude (I mean of them which ought to give voices) then should no certain rule be left unto the church, by which controversies in weighty matters might be determined; but it is not to be believed, that Christ would leave his church destitute of so necessary a help and safeguard.

Ridley. Christ, who is the most loving spouse of his church, who also gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it unto himself, did give unto it abundantly all things which are necessary to salvation; but yet so, that the church should declare itself obedient unto him in all things, and keep itself within the bounds of his commandments, and further not to seek any thing which he teacheth not, as necessary unto salvation. Now further, for determination of all controversies in Christ's religion, Christ himself hath left unto the church not only Moses and the prophets, whom he willeth in all doubts to go unto, and ask counsel at, but also the gospels, and the rest of the body of the New Testament; in which whatsoever is heard of Moses and the prophets, and whatsoever is necessary to be known unto salvation, is revealed and opened.

Objection 10. If you say that councils have sometimes erred; or may err, how then should we believe the catholic church? since councils are gathered by the authority of the catholic church.

Ridley. From may be, to be indeed, is no good argument: but from being, to may be, no man doubteth but it is a most sure argument. But now that councils have sometimes erred, it is manifest. How many councils were there in the eastern parts of the world, which condemned the Nicene council? and all those who would not forsake the same, they called by a slanderous name (as they thought) Hœmœusians. Was not Athanasius, Chrysostom, Cyril, Eustachius, men very well learned, and of godly life, banished and condemned as famous heretics, and that by wicked councils? How many things are there in the canons and institutions of the councils, which the papists themselves do much dislike? But here peradventure one man will say unto me, We will grant you this in provincial councils, or councils of some one nation, that they may sometimes err, so much as they do not represent the universal church; but it is not to be believed, that the general and full councils have erred at any time. Here if I had my books of the councils, or rather such notes as I have gathered out of those books, I could bring something which should serve for this purpose. But now seeing I have them not, I will recite one place only out of St. Austin, which, in my judgment, may suffice in this matter instead of many. Who knoweth not (saith he) that the holy scripture is so set before us, that it is not lawful to doubt of it, and that the letters of bishops may be re-proved by other men's words, and by councils, and that the councils themselves which are gathered by provinces and countries, do give place to the authority of the general and full councils; and that the former and general councils are amended by the latter, when as by some experience of things, either what was shut up, is opened, or that which was hid, is known. Thus much out of St. Austin. But I will plead upon our Antonian, upon matter confessed. Here with us as when popey reigned, I pray you how doth that book, which was called, The bishop's book, made in the time of king Henry the eighth, whereof the bishop of Winchester is thought to be either the first father, or chief gatherer; how doth it (I say) sharply reprove the Florentine council, in which was decreed the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and that with the consent of the emperor of Constantinople, and of the Grecians? So that in those days our learned ancient fathers and bishops of England did not stick to affirm, that a general council might err.

Objection 11. St. Austin saith, the good men are not to be forsaken for the evil, but the evil are to be borne withal for the good. You will not say (I suppose) that in our congregations all be evil.

Ridley. I speak nothing of the goodness or badness of your congregations; but I fight in Christ's quarrel against the mass, which doth utterly take away and overthrow the ordinance of Christ. Let that be taken quite away, and then the partition wall that made the strife shall be broken down. Now to the place of St. Austin, for bearing with the evil for the good's sake, there ought to be added other words, which the same writer hath expressed in other places; that is, if those evil men do cast abroad no seeds of false doctrine, nor lead others to destruction by their example.

Objection 12. It is perilous to attempt any new thing in the church, which lacketh example of good men. How much more perilous is it to commit any act, unto which the examples of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles, are contrary? But unto this your fact, in abstaining from the church by reason of the mass, the examples of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles, are clean contrary: therefore, &c. The first part of the argument is evident, and the second part I prove thus. In the times of the prophets, of Christ, and his apostles, all things were most corrupt. The people were miserably given to superstition, the priests despised the law of God; and yet notwithstanding we read not that the prophets made any schisms or divisions; and Christ himself frequented the temple, and taught in the temple of the Jews. Peter and John went up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer, Paul after the reading of the law, being desired to say something to the people, did not refuse to do it. Yea further, no man can shew, that either the prophets, or Christ, or his apostles, did refuse to pray together with others, to sacrifice, or to be partakers of the sacrament of Moses' law.

Ridley. I grant the former part of your argument; and to the second part I say, that although it contain many true things, as of the corrupt state in the times of the prophets, of Christ, and the apostles; and of the temple being frequented by Christ and his apostles; yet notwithstanding the second part of your argument is not sufficiently proved. For you ought to have proved, that either the prophets, either Christ or his apostles, did in the temple communicate with the people in any kind of worshipping which is forbidden by the law of God, or repugnant to the word of God. And where do we read, that the prophets or the apostles did agree with the people in their idolatry, when the people went a whoring with their hill-altars? For what cause, I pray you, did the prophets rebuke the people so much, as for their false worshipping of God after their own minds, and not after God's word? For what was so much as that was? Wherefore the false prophets ceased not to accuse the true prophets of God: therefore they beat them, they banished them, &c. How else, I pray you, can you understand what St. Paul alledgeth, when he saith, What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath the believer with the infidel? Or how agreeth the temple of God with images? For ye are the temple of the living God, as God himself hath said: I will dwell among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore, come out from among them, and separate yourselves from them (saith the Lord), and touch no unclean thing; so will I receive you, and be a Father unto you, and you shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord God Almighty.

Objection 13. Seeing you are obstinately set against the mass, that you affirm, because it is done in tongue not understood of the people, and for other causes, I cannot tell what; therefore is it not the true sacrament ordained of Christ? Is our baptism, which we do use in a tongue unknown to the people, the true baptism of Christ, or no? If it be, then the strange tongue doth not hurt the mass. If it be not the baptism of Christ, tell me how you were baptized. Or whether will you, (as the anabaptists do) that all which were baptized in Latin, should be baptized again in the English tongue?

Ridley. Although I would wish baptism to be given in the vulgar tongue, for the people's sake, which are present, that they may the better understand their own profession, and also be more able to teach their children the same, yet notwithstanding there is not like necessity of the vulgar tongue in baptism, as in the Lord's supper. Baptism is given to children, who by reason of their age are not able to understand what is spoken unto them, whatsoever it be. The Lord's supper is, and ought to be given to them that are at years of maturity. Moreover, in baptism, which is accustomed to be given to children in the Latin tongue, all the substantial points (as a man would say) which Christ commanded to be done, are observed. And therefore I judge that baptism to be a perfect and true baptism; and that it is not only not needful, but also not lawful for any man so baptized, to be christened again. But yet notwithstanding, they ought to be taught the catechism of the christian faith, when they come to years of discretion; which catechism whosoever despiseth, or will not desirously embrace and willingly learn, in my judgment he playeth not the part of a christian man.

Objection 14. Forasmuch as you are so wedded to your opinion, that no gentle exhortations can call you home to a better mind, you must be hampered by the laws, and be compelled to obey whether you will or no, or else to suffer that which a rebel to the laws ought to suffer. Do you not know, that whosoever refuseth to obey the laws of the realm, he bewrayeth himself to be an enemy to his country? Do you not know this is the readiest way to stir up sedition and civil war?

Ridley. I grant it to be reasonable, that he who by words and gentleness cannot be made to yield to that which is right and good, should be bridled by the strait correction of the laws: that is to say, He that will not be subject to God's word, must be punished by the laws.

It is true that is commonly said, He that will not obey the gospel, must be tamed and taught by the rigour of the law. But these things ought to take place against him, who refuseth to do that which is right and just according to true godliness, not against him who cannot quietly bear superstitions; but doth hate and detest from his heart such kind of proceedings, and that for the glory of the name of God. To that which you say, a transgressor of the common laws bewrayeth himself to be an enemy of his country, surely a man ought to look unto the nature of the laws, what manner of laws they be which are broken. For a faithful christian ought not to think alike of all manner of laws.

But this is the readiest way (you say) to stir up sedition, to trouble the quiet of the commonwealth; therefore are these things to be repressed in time by force of laws. Behold, Satan doth not cease to practise his old guiles, and accustomed subtleties. He hath ever this dart in readiness to hurl against his adversaries, to accuse them of sedition, that he may bring them, if he can, in danger of the higher powers. For so hath he by his minister always charged the prophets of God. Ahab said unto Elias, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" The false prophets also complained to their princes of Jeremy, that his words were seditious, and not to be suffered: did not the scribes and pharisees falsely accuse Christ as a seditious person, and one that spake against Cæsar's friend? Did they not, at last, cry, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend?" The orator Tertullus, how doth he accuse Paul before Felix the high deputy? "We have found this man, saith he, a pestilent fellow, and a stirrer of sedition, unto all the Jews in the whole world," &c. But, I pray you, were these men, as they were called, seditious persons? Christ, Paul and the prophets? God forbid. But they were by false men falsely accused. Polycarp, the most constant martyr, when he stood before the chief rulers, and was commanded to blaspheme Christ, and to swear by the fortune of Cæsar, &c. he answered with a mild spirit: We are taught (saith he) to give honour unto princes, and those powers which be of God; but such honour as is not contrary to God's religion.

Hitherto you see (good father) how I have in word only made as it were a flourish before the fight, which I shortly look for, and how I have begun to prepare certain kinds of weapons to fight against the adversary of Christ, and to muse with myself how the darts of the old enemy may be borne off, and after what manner I may smite him again with the sword of the Spirit. I learn also hereby to accustom myself to armour, and to try how I can go armed. In Tindal, where I was born, not far from the borders of Scotland, I have known my countrymen to watch night and day in their harness, such as they had, and their spears in their hands, especially when they had any private warning of the coming of the Scots. And so doing, although at every such bickering some of them spent their lives, yet by such means, like valiant men, they defended their country. And those that so died, I think that before God they died in a good quarrel, and their offspring and progeny were loved by all the country the better for their father's sake. And in the quarrel of Christ our Saviour, in the defence of his own divine ordinances, by which he giveth unto us life and immortality; yea, in the quarrel of faith and the christian religion, wherein resteth our everlasting salvation, shall we not watch? Shall we not go always armed? Always looking when our adversary (which like a roaring lion seeketh whom he may devour) shall come upon us by reason of our slothfulness? Yea, and woe be unto us, if he can oppress us unawares, which undoubtedly he will do, if he find us sleeping. Let us awake therefore. For if the good man of the house knew at what hour the thief would come, he would surely watch, and not suffer his house to be broken up. Let us awake therefore, I say: let us not suffer our house to be broken up. Resist the devil, saith St. James, and he will fly from you. Let us therefore resist him manfully, and taking the cross upon our shoulders, let us follow our captain Christ, who by his own blood hath dedicated and hallowed the way which leadeth unto the Father, that is, to the light which no man can attain, the fountain of the everlasting joys. Let us follow, I say, whither he calleth and inviteth us, that after these afflictions, which last but for a moment, whereby he trieth our faith, as gold by the fire, we may everlastingly reign and triumph with him in the glory of the Father, and that through the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, now and for ever, Amen, Amen.

Good Father, forsomuch as I have determined with myself, to pour forth these my cogitations into thy bosom, here, methinks, I see you suddenly lifting up your head towards heaven, after your manner, and then looking upon me with your propheticall countenance, and speaking to me, with these or like words, Trust not, my son, (I beseech you vouchsafe me the honor of this name; for in so doing I shall think myself both honoured and beloved of you); trust not, I say, my son, to these word-weapons; for the kingdom of God is not in words, but in power. And remember always the words of the Lord: "Do not imagine beforehand, what and how you will speak; for it shall be given you in the same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." I pray you therefore, father, pray for me, that I may cast my whole care upon him, and trust upon him in all perils. For I know, and am surely persuaded, that whatsoever I can imagine or think beforehand, it is nothing, except he assist me with his Spirit when the time is. I beseech you therefore, father, pray for me, that such a complete harness of the Spirit, such a boldness of mind may be given unto me, that I may out of a true faith say with David, "I will not trust in my bow, and it is not my sword that shall save me. For he hath no pleasure in the strength of an horse, &c. but the Lord's delight is in them that fear him, and put their trust in his mercy." I beseech you, pray, pray that I may enter this fight only in the name of God, and that when all is past, I being not overcome, through his gracious aid, may remain and stand fast in him till that day of the Lord, in which to them that obtain the victory shall be given the lively manna to eat, and a triumphant crown for evermore.

Now, father, I pray you help me to buckle on this harness a little better. For you know the deepness of Satan, being an old soldier, and you have collared with him ere now: blessed be God, that hath ever aided you so well. I suppose he may well hold you at the bay. But truly he will not be so willing (I think) to join with you as with us youngsters. Sir, I beseech you, let your servant read this my babbling unto you, and now and then, as it shall seem unto you best, let your pen run on my book: spare not to blot my paper: I give you good leave.

Latimer. Sir, I have caused my man not only to read your armour unto me, but also to write it out, for it is not only solid armour, but also well buckled armour. I see not how it could be better. I thank you even from the bottom of my heart for it, and my prayers you shall not lack, trusting that you do the like for me; for indeed there is the help, &c. many things make confusion in memory. And if I were learned as well as St. Paul, I would not bestow much amongst them, further than to gall them, and spur-gall too, when and where occasion were given, and matter came to mind; for the law shall be their sheet-anchor stay, and refuge. Therefore there is no remedy (namely, now when they have the master-bowl in their hand, and rule the roast) but patience. Better is it to suffer what cruelty they will put upon us, than to incur God's high indignation. Wherefore (my good lord) be of good cheer in the Lord, with due consideration what he requireth of you, and what he doth promise you. Our common enemy shall do no more than God will permit him. God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength, &c. Be at a point what you will stand unto; stick unto that, and let them both say and do what they lift. They can but kill the body, which otherwise is of itself mortal. Neither yet shall they do that when they lift, but as God will suffer them, when the hour appointed is come. It will be but in vain to use many words with them, now they have a bloody and deadly law prepared for you. But it is very requisite that you give a reasonable account of your faith, if they will quietly hear you; else, you know, in a wicked place of judgment a man may keep silence, after the example of Christ. Let them not deceive you with their sophistical sophisms and fallacies: you know that false things may have more appearance of truth, than things that be most true: therefore St. Paul giveth us a watch-word, Let no man deceive you with likeliness of speech. Neither is it requisite that with the contentious you should follow strife of words, which tend to no edification, but to the subversion of the hearers, and the vain bragging and ostentation of the adversaries. Fear of death doth mostly persuade a great number. Be well aware of that argument; for that persuaded Shaxton (as many men thought) after that he had once made a good profession openly before the judgment seat. The flesh is weak, but the willingness of the spirit shall refresh the weakness of the flesh.

The number of the criers under the altar must needs be fulfilled; if we be separated thereunto, happy be we. That is the greatest promotion that God giveth in this world, to be such Philippians, to whom it is given not only to believe, but also to suffer, &c. But who is able to do these things? Surely all our ability, all our sufficiency is of God. He requireth and promiseth. Let us declare his obedience to his will when it shall be requisite in the time of trouble, yea, in the midst of the fire.

When that number is fulfilled, which I suppose will be shortly, then have at the papists, when they shall say, Peace, all things are safe, when Christ shall come to keep his great parliament to redress all things that are amiss. But he shall not come as the papists feign him, to hide himself, and to play the bo-peep as it were under a piece of bread; but he shall come gloriously, to the terror and fear of all papists, and to the great consolation and comfort of all that will here suffer for him. Comfort yourselves and one another with these words.

Lo, sir, here have I blotted your paper vainly, and played the fool egregiously; but so I thought better than not to fulfil your request at this time. Pardon me, and pray for me, pray for me I say, pray for me. For I am sometimes so fearful, that I would creep into a mouse-hole; sometimes God doth visit me again with his comfort. So he cometh and goeth, to teach me to feel and to know mine infirmity, to the intent to give thanks to him that is worthy, lest I should rob him of his due, as many do, and almost all the world. Fare you well.

What belief is to be given to papists may appear by their racking, writing, wringing, and monstrously injuring of God's holy scripture, as appeareth in the pope's law. But I dwell here now in a school of forgetfulness. Fare you well once again, and be you steadfast and unmoveable in the Lord. Paul loved Timothy marvellously well, notwithstanding he saith unto him, "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel;" and again, "Harden thyself to suffer afflictions. Be faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," saith the Lord.

This pious man employed all his leisure time in devout meditation and writing. Several of his letters are preserved, but our confined limits can only admit a selection.

In Letter I. he addresseth Mr. Bradford and his fellow preachers; wherein he says, "We shall by God's grace one day meet together, and be merry. The day assuredly approacheth apace; the Lord grant that it may shortly come. For before that day come, I fear the world will wax worse and worse. But then all our enemies shall be trodden under foot: righteousness and truth then shall have the victory, and bear the bell away, whereof the Lord grant us to be partakers, and all that love truly the truth."

In Letter II. to his cousin he laments the then superstitious idolatry. Letters III. IV. and V. are to Mr. Bradford and his fellow prisoners, hoping he and his company will patiently bear the cross of Christ.

LETTER VI.

To the BRETHREN remaining in CAPTIVITY, and dispersed abroad in sundry PRISONS, but knit together in Unity of Spirit and Holy Religion, in the Bowels of the LORD JESUS.

GRACE, peace, and mercy, be multiplied among you. What worthy thanks can we render unto the Lord for you my brethren, namely, for the great consolation which through you we have received in the Lord, who notwithstanding the rage of Satan, that goeth about by all manner of subtle means to beguile the world, and also busily laboureth to restore and set up his kingdom again, that of late began to decay and fall to ruin; you remain yet still immoveable, as men surely grounded upon a strong rock. And now, albeit that Satan by his soldiers and wicked ministers, daily (as we hear) draweth numbers unto him, so that it is said of him, that he plucketh the very stars out of heaven, while he driveth into some men the fear of death, and loss of all their goods, and sheweth to others the pleasant baits of the world; namely, riches, wealth, and all kinds of delights and pleasures, fair houses, great revenues, fat benefices, and what not; and all to the intent that they should fall down and worship, not the Lord, but the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil, that great beast and his image, and should be enticed to commit fornication with the strumpet of Babylon, together with the kings of the earth, with the lesser beast, and with the false prophets, and so to rejoice and be pleasant with her, and to get drunk with the wine of her fornication; yet blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath given unto you a manly courage, and hath so strengthened you in the inward man, by the power of his Spirit, that you can condemn as well all the allurements of the world, esteeming them as vanities, mere trifles, and things of nought; who hath also wrought, planted, and surely established in your hearts, so stedfast a faith and love of the Lord Jesus Christ, joined with such constancy, that by no engines of Antichrist, be they ever so terrible or plausible, you will suffer any other Jesus, or any other Christ, to be forced upon you, besides him whom the prophets have spoken of before, the apostles have preached, the holy martyrs of God have confessed and testified with the effusion of their blood.

In this faith stand you fast, my brethren, and suffer not yourselves to be brought under the yoke of bondage and superstition any more. For you know, brethren, how our Saviour warned us beforehand, that such should come as would point unto the world another Christ, and would set him out with so many false miracles, and with such deceivable and subtle practices, that even the very elect (if it were possible) should thereby be deceived: such strong delusion to come did our Saviour give warning of before. But continue you faithful and constant, and be of good comfort, and remember that our great captain hath overcome the world; for he that is in us, is stronger than he that is in the world, and the Lord promiseth us, that for the elect's sake, the days of wickedness shall be shortened. In the mean season abide you and endure with patience as you have begun: endure I say, and reserve yourselves unto better times, as one of the heathen poets said; cease not to shew yourselves valiant soldiers of the Lord, and help to maintain the travelling faith of the gospel.

You have need of patience, that after you have done the will of God you may receive the promises. "For yet a very little, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; and the just shall live by faith: but if any withdraw himself, my soul shall have no pleasure in him (saith the Lord). But we are not they which do withdraw ourselves unto damnation, but believe unto the salvation of the soul." Let us not suffer these words of Christ to fall out of our hearts by any manner of terror, or threatenings of the world. Fear not them which kill the body, the rest you know. For I write not unto you, as men which are ignorant of the truth, but who know the truth, and to this end only, that we agreeing together in one faith, may comfort one another, and be more confirmed and strengthened thereby. We never had a better, or more just cause either to condemn our life, or shed our blood; we cannot take in hand the defence of a more certain, clear, and manifest truth. For it is not any ceremony for which we contend; but it toucheth the very substance of our whole religion, yea, even Christ himself. Shall we, or can we receive any other Christ instead of him, who is alone the everlasting Son of the everlasting Father, and is the brightness of the glory, and a lively image of the substance of the Father, in whom only dwelleth corporally the fulness of the Godhead, who is the only way, the truth, and the life? Let such wickedness (my brethren), let such horrible wickedness be far from us. For although there be that be called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, as there be many gods, and many lords, yet unto us there be but one God, who is the Father, of whom are all things, and we by him; but every man hath not knowledge. "This is life eternal, (saith St. John) that they know thee to be the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." If any therefore would force upon us any other God, besides him whom Paul and the apostles have taught, let us not hear him, but let us fly from, and hold him accursed.

Brethren, you are not ignorant of the deep and profound subtilties of Satan; for he will not cease to range about you, seeking by all means possible whom he may devour: but play you the men, and be of good comfort in the Lord. And although your enemies and the adversaries of the truth, armed with all worldly force and power that may be, do set upon you; yet be you not faint-hearted, and shrink not therefore, but trust unto your captain Christ, trust unto the Spirit of truth, and trust to the truth of your cause; which as it may by the malice of Satan be darkened, so can it never be clean put out. For we have (high praise be given to God therefore) most plainly, evidently and clearly on our side, all the prophets, all the apostles, and undoubtedly all the ancient ecclesiastical writers which have written, until of late years past.

Let us be hearty and of good courage therefore, and thoroughly comfort ourselves in the Lord. Be in no wise afraid of your adversaries; for that which is to them an occasion of perdition, is to you a sure token of salvation, and that of God. For unto you it is given, that not only you should believe on him, but also suffer for his sake. And when you are railed upon for the name of Christ, remember that by the voice of Peter, yea, and of Christ our Saviour also, ye are counted with the prophets, with the apostles, and with the holy martyrs of Christ, happy and blessed for ever: for the glory and Spirit of God resteth upon you.

On their part our Saviour Christ is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified. For what can they else do unto you by persecuting you, and working all cruelty and villainy against you, but make your crowns more glorious, yea beautify and multiply the same, and heap upon themselves the horrible plagues and heavy wrath of God: and therefore, good brethren, though they rage ever so fiercely against us, yet let us not with evil unto them again, knowing that while for Christ's cause they vex and persecute us, they are like mad men, most outrageous and cruel against themselves, heaping hot burning coals upon their own heads: but rather with well unto them, knowing that we are thereunto called in Christ Jesus, that we should be heirs of the blessing. Let us pray therefore unto God, that he should drive out of their hearts this darkness of errors, and make the light of his truth to shine unto them, that they acknowledging their blindness, may with all humble repentance be converted unto the Lord, and with us confess him to be the only true God, which is the Father of light, and his only Son Son Jesus Christ, worshipping him in spirit and truth, Amen. The Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ comfort your hearts in the love of God, and patience of Christ, Amen.

Your brother in the Lord, whose name this bearer shall signify unto you, ready always by the grace of God to live and die with you.

In Letter VII. he comforts his afflicted and persecuted brethren as in Letter VI. Letter VIII. answers an epistle from Mr. West, formerly his chaplain, declaring his willingness to die for the truth.

Mr. Grindal (afterwards archbishop of Canterbury) being in the time of exile in the city of Francfort, wrote to Dr. Ridley, then prisoner, a certain epistle, wherein first he lamenteth his captivity, exhorting him withal to be constant. Secondly, He certifieth him of the English exiles being dispersed in Germany, and of the singular providence of God in stirring up the magistrates and rulers there towards them. Thirdly, He writeth to know his mind and will concerning the printing of his book against transubstantiation, and of other treatises and his disputations. Whereunto bishop Ridley answered him as follows.

L E T T E R IX.

From Dr. RIDLEY, in Answer to Mr. GRINDAL.

BLESSED be God our heavenly Father, which inclined your heart to have such a desire to write unto me, and blessed be he again which hath heard your request, and brought your letters safe unto my hands; and over all this I bless him through our Lord Jesus Christ, for the great comfort I have received by the same, of the knowledge of your state, and of other our dearly beloved brethren and countrymen in those parts beyond the sea.

Dearly beloved brother Grindal, I say to you and all the rest of our brethren in Christ with you, rejoice in the Lord, and as you love me, and the others my reverend fathers and fellow-prisoners (which undoubtedly are Gloria Christi) lament not our state, but I beseech you and them all to give to our heavenly Father, for his boundless mercies and unspeakable benefits, even in the midst of all our troubles given unto us, most hearty thanks. For know you, that as the weight of his cross hath increased upon us, so he hath not, nor doth he cease to multiply his mercies to strengthen us; and I trust, yea by his grace I doubt nothing, but he will do so for Christ our master's sake even to the end. To hear that you and our other brethren do find favour and grace in your exile, with the magistrates, ministers, and citizens at Tigury, Francfort, and other places, it doth greatly comfort (I dare say) all here that do love Christ and his true word. I do assure you it warmed my heart, to hear you by chance name some, as Scory, Cox, &c. O that it had come in your mind to have said somewhat also of Cheek, Turner, Leaver, Sampson, and Chambers, but I trust in God they be all well. And fir, seeing you say, that there be in those parts with you of students and ministers so good a number, now therefore care you not for us, otherwise than to wish that God's glory may be set forth by us. For whensoever God shall call us home (as we look daily for no other, but when it shall please God to say, Come) you, blessed be God, are enough, through his aid, to light and set up again the lanthorn of his word in England. As concerning the copies you say you have with you, I wonder how they ever did or could find the way to come to you. My disputation, except you have that which I gathered myself after the disputation was done, I cannot think you have it truly. If you have that, then you have therewithal the whole manner after which I was used in the disputation.

As for the treatise in English against transubstantiation, I cannot think it worth translating into Latin, nor would I have you translate any other of my writing, till you are certain how the Lord will dispose of me: And thus much concerning your letters. Now although I suppose you know a good part of our condition here, (for we are forth coming, even as when you departed; &c.) you shall understand that I was in the Tower about the space of two months close prisoner, and after that had granted to me, without my labour, the liberty of the Tower, and so continued about half a year; and then, because I refused to allow the mass with my presence, I was shut up in prison again.

The last Lent save one, it chanced by reason of the tumult stirred up in Kent, there were so many prisoners in the Tower, that my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Bradford, and I, were put all together in one prison, where we remained until almost Easter, and then we three, Canterbury, Latimer, and I, were suddenly sent a little before Easter, and were suffered to have nothing with us, but what we carried upon us. About the Whitsuntide following were our disputations at Oxford, after which all was taken from us, as pen, ink, &c. Our own servants were taken from us before, and every one had a strange man put to him, and each of us were appointed to be kept in separate places, as we are unto this day.

Blessed be God, we three at the writing hereof were in good health, and (in God) of good cheer. We expected long ago to have been dispatched, for we were all three on one day condemned as heretics by Dr. Weston, (he being the head commissioner) within a day or two of our disputations, and ever since we remain here as we were by him left. The Lord's will be fulfilled in us, as I doubt not but by his grace it shall be to his glory, and our eternal salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Likewise the Lord hath hitherto preserved, above all our expectation, our dear brother, and in Christ's cause a strong champion, John Bradford. He is also condemned, and is already delivered to the secular power, and writs (as we have heard say) given out for his execution, and called in again.

Thus the Lord, so long as his blessed pleasure is, preserveth whom he listeth, notwithstanding the wonderful raging of the world. Many (as we hear say) have valiantly suffered, confessing Christ's truth, and nothing yielding to the adversary, no, not for the fear or pains of death.

The names of them which I knew, and have now suffered, are these; Farrar, bishop of St. David's; Hooper, bishop of Worcester; Roger, your fellow-prebend; Dr. Taylor, of Hadley; Mr. Sanders, and one Tomkins, a weaver; and now this last day, Mr. Cardmaker, with another, were burnt in Smithfield, in London, and many others in Essex and Kent, whose names are written in the book of life, whom yet I do not know.

West, your old companion, and sometime my officer, (alas!) hath relented, (as I have heard) but the Lord hath shortened his days, for soon after he died, and is gone. Grimbold was caught by the heel, and cast into the Marshalsea, but now is at liberty again; but I fear he escaped not without bowing his knee to Baal.

My dear friend Thomas Ridley, of the Bull-head, in Cheap, which was to me the most faithful friend that I had in my trouble, is departed also unto God. My brother Shipside, that married my sister, hath been almost half a year in prison, for delivering (as he was accused) of certain things from me; but now, thanks be to God, he is at liberty again, but so that the bishop hath taken from him his park.

Of all us three prisoners in Oxford, I am kept most strict, and with least liberty; either because the man in whose house I am a prisoner is governed by his wife, who is a morose, superstitious old woman, and thinks she shall merit by having me very closely confined; for the man himself, whose name is Irish, is civil enough to all, but too much ruled by his wife. Though I never had a wife, yet from this daily usage I begin to understand how great and intolerable a burthen it is to have a bad one. The wise man says rightly, A good wife is the gift of God: and again, Blessed is the man who hath a good wife. Or else I say the reason is, (for I know not from which) that he is so commanded from the higher powers, which is what he pleads, when I complain of my hard usage.

At Cambridge, (as I hear say) all the reformati- ons of students and statutes which were lately made, are now undone; and all things are reduced to their ancient confusion and popish superstition. All the heads of colleges who preached the sincere word of God, or fa- voured it, are turned out, and others of the popish fac- tion put in their places; insomuch that I hear no one can be admitted a fellow of a college, that will not bow the knee to Baal. Nor do I wonder, since it is so throughout the whole realm of England, among arch- bishops, bishops, priests, and deacons, and the whole body of the clergy. And to tell you much naughty matter in few words, Popery every where reigns among us in its full and ancient force.

The Lord be merciful, and for Christ's sake pardon us our old unkindness and unthankfulness: for when he poured upon us the gifts of his manifold graces and favours, alas! we did not serve him, nor render thanks unto him according to the same. We pastors, many of us were too cold, and bore too much with the wicked world: our magistrates did abuse, to their own worldly gain, both God's gospel and the ministers of the same. The people in many places were unruly and unkind. Thus of every side and of every sort we have provoked God's anger and wrath to fall upon us: but blessed may he be that hath not suffered his to continue in those ways which so wholly have displeased his sacred majesty, but hath awaked them by the fatherly correction of his own Son's cross, unto his glory and our endless salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

My daily prayer is (as God do h know) and by God's grace shall be so long as I live in this world, for you my dear brethren, that are fled out of your own country, because you will rather forsake all worldly things, than the truth of God's word. It is even the same that I use to make to God for all those churches abroad through the world, which have forsaken the kingdom of Anti- christ, and professed openly the purity of the gospel of Jesus Christ; that is, that God our eternal Father, for our Saviour Christ's sake, will daily increase in you the gracious gift of his heavenly Spirit, to the true setting forth of his glory and of his gospel, and make you agree brotherly in the truth of the same, that there arise no root of bitterness among you, that may affect that good seed which God hath sown in your hearts already, and finally that your life may be so pure and so honest, ac- cording to the rule of God's word, and according to that vocation whereunto we are called by the gospel of Christ our Saviour, that the honesty and purity of the same may provoke all that shall see or know it, to the love of your doctrine, and to love you for honesty and virtue's sake, and so both in brotherly unity of your true doctrine, and also in the godly viriue of your honest life, to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Several of our magistrates, viz. the chancellor of Winchester, earl of Arundel, and lord Paget, are am- bassadors with cardinal Poole, beyond the seas, to make peace (as it is said) between the emperor, our realm, and the king of France. After whose return, and the delivery of the queen, which we daily expect, and have long expected, and which God, for the glory of his name, grant to be a safe and happy one, then shall we expect from the old enemy of our profession, soon to receive triumphant crowns in the Lord.

I humbly with my whole heart commend me to all your prayers, and first to your's, O most dear brother in Christ, and my most beloved Grindal, to your's most dear, and together with my beloved in the Lord, Cheek, Cox, Turner, Lever, Sampson, Chambers, and all our brethren and fellow-countrymen who live amongst you, and love our Lord Jesus Christ in truth. I commend also to you the reverend fathers in God, and my fellow captives in the Lord, Thomas Cranmer, worthy of the name of a true great pastor and archbishop; and that old soldier of Christ, and true apostle of our English nation, Hugh Latimer. I here give myself the greater length in this letter, most dear brother, because after this I am persuaded they will be too short to trouble you.

Oxford.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER X.

From Dr. RIDLEY to AUGUSTINE BERNHER.

BROTHER AUGUSTINE, I bless God with all my heart in his manifold merciful gifts, given unto our dear brethren in Christ, especially to our brother Rogers, whom it pleaseth him to set forth first, no doubt out of his gracious goodness and fatherly favour towards him. And likewise blessed be God in the rest, as Hooper, Sanders, and Taylor, whom it hath pleased the Lord to set in the fore-front of the battle against his adversaries, and hath endued them all (so far as I can hear) to stand in the confession of his truth, and to be content in his cause and for his gospel's sake to lose their lives. And evermore and without end, blessed be even the same our heavenly Father, for our dear and in- tirely beloved brother Bradford, whom now the Lord (I perceive) calleth for; for I believe he will no longer vouchsafe him to abide among the adulterous and wicked generation of this world. I do not doubt but that he (for those gifts of grace which the Lord hath bestowed on him plenteously) hath helped those which have gone before in their journey, that is, hath ani- mated them to keep the highway, and so to run, that at length they may receive the reward. The Lord be his comfort, whereof I do not doubt, and I thank God heartily that ever I was acquainted with him, and that ever I had such a one in my house. And yet again I bless God in our dear brother, and of this time proto- martyr Rogers, that he was also one of my calling to be a prebendary preacher in London. And now because Grindal is gone (the Lord I doubt not hath and knoweth wherein he will bestow him) I trust to God it shall please him of his goodness to strengthen me to make up the trinity out of Paul's church, to suffer for Christ whom God the Father hath anointed, the Holy Spirit doth bear witness unto, Paul and all the apostles preached. Thus fare you well, I had no paper, I was constrained thus to write.

N. RIDLEY.

The LIFE of BISHOP LATIMER, a famous PREACHER and worthy MARTYR of CHRIST.

NOW consequently after the life of bishop Ridley, followeth the life of that valiant champion, and old disciplined soldier of Christ, bishop Hugh Latimer, who was the son of one Hugh Latimer, of Thirkesson, in the county of Leicester, a husbandman in good repute, with whom he was brought up till he was about four years old: at which time his parents, (having him as then left for their only son, with six daughters) seeing him to be of a ready, prompt, and sharp wit, purposed to train him up in erudition and knowledge of good literature; where- in he so profited in the common schools of his own country, that at fourteen years of age he was sent to the university of Cambridge: where, after some continuance in the exercise of other things, he gave himself up to the study of such school divinity, as the ignorance of that age would suffer.

Zealous he was then in the popish religion, and there- with so scrupulous, as himself confessed, that being a priest, and using to say mass, he was so servile an obser- ver of the Romish decrees, that he thought he had never sufficiently mingled his massing wine with water; and moreover, that he should never be damned, if he were once a professed friar, with divers of such superstitious fantasies. And in this blind zeal he was a very enemy to the professors of Christ's gospel; as both his oration made, when he commenced bachelor of divinity, against Melanc- thon, and also his other works did plainly declare. But especially especially in those days his popish zeal could in no case abide good Mr. Stafford, reader of the divinity lectures in Cambridge, most spitefully railing against him, and persuading the youth of Cambridge in nowise to believe him.

Notwithstanding, such was the goodness and merciful purpose of God, that when he saw his good time, by which he thought utterly to have defaced the professors of the gospel, and true church of Christ, he was at length himself by a member of the same prettily caught in the blessed net of God's word. For Mr. Thomas Bilney being at that time a trier out of Satan's subtilties, and a secret overthrower of Antichrist's kingdom, seeing Mr. Latimer to have a zeal in his way, (although not according to knowledge) was stricken with a brotherly pity towards him, and began to consider by what means he might win this zealous ignorant brother to the true knowledge of Christ. Wherefore, after a short time, he came to Mr. Latimer's study, and desired him to hear him make his confession, which he willingly did; and by hearing thereof, he was, by the good Spirit of God, so touched that thereupon he forsook the study of the school-doctors, and other such sopperies, and became an earnest student in true divinity, as he himself, as well in his conference with bishop Ridley, as also in his first sermon made upon the Pater-Noster, doth confess. So that whereas before he was an enemy, and almost a persecutor of Christ, he was now a zealous seeker after him, changing his old manner of cavilling and railing, into a diligent kind of conferring, both with Mr. Bilney and others, and came also to Mr. Stafford before he died, and desired him to forgive him.

After his own conversion, he was not satisfied without endeavouring that of others, and like a true disciple of the blessed Samaritan, pitied the misery of others, and therefore became both a public preacher, and also a private instructor to the rest of his brethren within the university, by the space of three years, spending his time partly in the Latin tongue among the learned, and partly amongst the simple people in his natural and vulgar language. Howbeit, as Satan never sleepeth when he seeth his kingdom begin to decay, so likewise now, seeing that this worthy member of Christ would be a terrible shaker thereof, he raised up his impious imps to molest and trouble him.

Amongst these there was an Augustine friar, who took occasion upon certain sermons that Mr. Latimer made about Christmas, 1529, as well in the church of St. Edward, as also in St. Augustine's, within the university of Cambridge, to inveigh against him, for that Mr. Latimer in the said sermons (alluding to the common usage of the season) gave the people certain cards out of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew, whereupon they might, not only then, but always else occupy their time. For the chief triumph in the cards he limited the heart, as the principal thing they should serve God withal, whereby he quite overthrew all hypocritical and external ceremonies, not tending to the necessary furtherance of God's holy word and sacraments. For the better attaining hercof, he wished the scriptures to be in English, whereby the common people might the better learn their duty, as well to God as to their neighbours.

The handling of this matter was so apt for the time, and so pleasantly applied by him, that it not only declared the wit and dexterity of the preacher, but also wrought in the hearers much fruit, to the overthrow of popish superstition, and setting up of perfect religion.

This was upon the Sunday before Christmas day; on which day coming to the church, and causing the bell to be tolled to a sermon, he entered into the pulpit, taking for his text the words of the gospel aforesaid, read in the church that day, "Who art thou?" &c. In delivering which cards (as is aforesaid) he made the heart to be Triumph, exhorting and inviting all men thereby to serve the Lord with inward heart and true affection, and not with outward ceremonies: adding moreover to the praise of that Triumph, that though it were ever so small, yet it would take up the best court card beside in the bunch, yea, though it were the king of clubs, &c. meaning thereby how the Lord would be worshipped and served in simplicity of heart and verity, wherein consisteth true christian religion, and not in the outward deeds of the letter only, or in the glittering shew of man's traditions, or pardons, pilgrimages, ceremonies, vows, devotions, voluntary works, and works of supererogation, foundations, oblations, the pope's supremacy, &c. so that all these either were needless, where the other is present; or else were of small estimation, in comparison of the other. The tenor and effect of these his sermons, so far as they could come to our hands, here followeth.

The Tenor and Effect of certain SERMONS, made by Mr. LATIMER in CAMBRIDGE, about the Year of our Lord 1529.

TU quis es? Which words are as much as to say in English, "Who art thou?" These be the words of the Pharisees, which were sent by the Jews unto St. John Baptist in the wilderness, to have knowledge of him who he was; which words they spake unto him of an evil intent, thinking that he would have taken on him to be Christ, and so they would have had him done by their good wills, because they knew that he was more carnal and given to their laws, than Christ indeed should be, as they perceived by their old prophecies: and also, because they marvelled much at his great doctrine, preaching, and baptizing, they were in doubt whether he was Christ or not: wherefore they said unto him, "Who art thou?" Then answered St. John, and confessed that he was not Christ. Now here is to be noted the great and prudent answer of St. John Baptist unto the Pharisees, that when they required of him who he was, he would not directly answer of himself, what he was himself; but he said he was not Christ, by which saying he thought to put the Jews and Pharisees out of their false opinion, and belief towards him, in that they would have had him to exercise the office of Christ, and so declared further unto them of Christ, saying, "He is in the midst of you and amongst you, whom ye know not, the latchet of whose shoe I am not worthy to unloose." By this you may perceive that St. John spake much in the praise of his master Christ, professing himself to be in no wise like unto him. So likewise it shall be necessary unto all men and women of this world, not to ascribe unto themselves any goodness of themselves, but all unto our Lord God, as shall appear hereafter, when this question aforesaid [Who art thou?] shall be moved unto them: not as the Pharisees did unto St. John, of an evil purpose, but of a good and simple mind as may appear hereafter.

Now then, according to the preacher's mind, let every man and woman, of a good and simple mind, contrary to the Pharisees' intent, ask this question, Who art thou? This question must be moved to themselves, what they be of themselves, on this fashion, What art thou of thy only and natural generation between father and mother, when thou camest into the world? What substance, what virtue, what goodness art thou of thyself? Which question if thou rehearse oftentimes to thyself, thou shalt well perceive and understand, how thou shalt make answer to it: which must be made in this wise; I am of myself, and by myself, coming from my natural father and mother, the child of the anger and indignation of God, the true inheritor of hell, a lump of sin, and working nothing of myself, but all towards hell, except I have better help of another, than I have of myself. Now we may see in what state we enter into this world, that we be of ourselves the true and just inheritors of hell, the children of the ire and indignation of Christ, working all towards hell, whereby we deserve of ourselves perpetual damnation, by the right judgment of God, and the true claim of ourselves: which unthrifty state that we be born unto is come unto us for our own deserts, as proveth well this example following.

Let it be admitted for the probation of this, that it might please the king's grace now being, to accept into his favour a mean man, of simple degree and birth, not born to any possession; whom the king's grace favoureth, not because this person hath of himself deserved any such favour, but that the king casteth his favour unto him of his own mere motion and fancy: and because the king's grace will more declare his favour unto him, he giveth unto this said man a thousand pounds in lands, to him and his heirs, on this condition, that he shall take upon him to be the chief captain and defender of his town of Calais, and to be true and faithful to him in the custody of the same, against the Frenchmen especially above all other enemies.

This man taketh on him this charge, promising this fidelity thereunto; it chanceth in process of time, that by the singular acquaintance and frequent familiarity of this captain with the Frenchmen, these Frenchmen give unto the said captain of Calais a great sum of money, so that he will be but content and agreeable, that they may enter into the said town of Calais by force of arms, and so thereby possess the same unto the crown of France. Upon this agreement the Frenchmen do invade the said town of Calais, only by the negligence of this captain.

Now the king's grace hearing of this invasion, cometh with a great puissance to defend this his said town, and so by the good policy of war overcometh the said Frenchmen, and entereth again into his said town of Calais. Then he being desirous to know how these enemies of his came thither, he maketh strict search and inquiry by whom this treason was conspired; by this search it was known and found his own captain to be the very author and the beginner of the betraying of it. The king, seeing the great infidelity of this person, dischargeth this man of his office, and taketh from him and his heirs this thousand pounds possessions. Think you not that the king doth use justice unto him, and all his posterity and heirs? Yes truly; the said captain cannot deny himself but that he had true justice, considering how unfaithfully he behaved himself to his prince, contrary to his own fidelity and promise: so likewise it was of our first father Adam. He had given unto him the spirit and science of knowledge, to work all goodness therewith; this said spirit was not given only to him, but unto all his heirs and posterity. He had also delivered him the town of Calais, that is to say, paradise in earth, the most strong and fairest town in the world, to be in his custody: he nevertheless, by the instigation of these Frenchmen, that is, the temptation of the fiend, did obey unto their desire, and so he broke his promise and fidelity, the commandment of the everlasting King his master, in eating of the apple by him prohibited.

Now then, the king seeing this great treason in his captain, dispossessed him of the thousand pounds of lands, that is to say, from everlasting life and glory, and all his heirs and posterity: for likewise as he had the spirit of science and knowledge for him and his heirs; so in like manner when he lost the same, his heirs also lost it by him, and in him. So now this example proveth, that by our father Adam we had once in him the very inheritance of everlasting joy; and by him, and in him again we lost the same.

The heirs of the captain of Calais could not by any manner of claim ask of the king the right and title of their father in the thousand pounds possessions, by reason the king might answer and say unto them, that although their father deserved not of himself to enjoy so great possessions, yet he deserved by himself to lose them, and greater, committing so high treason as he did, against his prince's commandments; whereby he had no wrong to lose his title, but was unworthy to have the same, and had therein true justice; let not you think which be his heirs, that if he had justice to lose his possessions, you have wrong to lose the same. In the same manner it may be answered unto all men and women now in being, that if our father Adam had true justice to be excluded from his possessions of everlasting glory in paradise, let us not think the contrary that be his heirs, but that we have no wrong in losing also the same; yea, we have true justice and right. Then in what miserable estate we be, that of the right and just title of our own deserts have lost the everlasting joy and claim of ourselves, to be true inheritors of hell? For he that committeth deadly sin willingly, bindeth himself to be an inheritor of everlasting pain: and so did our forefather Adam willingly eat of the apple forbidden. Wherefore he was cast out of the everlasting joy in paradise, into this corrupt world amongst all vileness, whereby of himself he was not worthy to do any thing laudable or pleasant to God, evermore bound to corrupt affections and beastly appetites, transformed into the uncleanness and most variable nature that was made under heaven, of whose seed and disposition all the world is lineally descended; insomuch that this evil nature is so much diffused and shed from one into another, that at this day there is no man nor woman living, that can of themselves wash away this abominable vileness: and so we must needs grant of ourselves to be in like displeasure unto God, as our father Adam was; by reason hereof, as I said, we be of ourselves the very children of the indignation and vengeance of God, the true inheritors of hell, and working all towards hell, which is the answer to this question, made to every man and woman by themselves, Who art thou?

And now the world standing in this damnable state, cometh in the occasion of the incarnation of Christ; the Father in heaven perceiving the frail nature of man, that he by himself and of himself could do nothing for himself, by his prudent wisdom sent down the second Person in the Trinity, his Son Jesus Christ, to declare unto man his pleasure and commandment: and so at the Father's will Christ took on him human nature, being willing to deliver man out of this miserable way, and was content to suffer cruel passion in shedding his blood for all mankind, and so left behind for our safeguard, laws and ordinances, to keep us always in the right path unto everlasting life, as the gospels, the sacraments, the commandments, &c. which if we do keep and observe according to our profession, we shall answer better unto this question, [Who art thou?] than we did before: for before thou didst enter into the sacrament of baptism, thou wert but a natural man or a natural woman; as I might say, a man, a woman; but after thou takest on thee Christ's religion, thou hast a longer name; for then thou art a christian man, a christian woman. Now then, seeing thou art a christian man, what shall be the answer of this question, Who art thou?

The answer of this question is, when I ask it unto myself, I must say that I am a christian man, a christian woman, the child of everlasting joy, through the merits of the bitter passion of Christ. This is a joyful answer. Here we may see how much we be bound, and indebted unto God, that hath revived us from death to life, and saved us that were damned: which great benefit we cannot well consider, unless we do remember what we were of ourselves before we meddled with him or his laws: and the more we know our feeble nature, and set less by it, the more we shall conceive and know in our hearts what God hath done for us: and the more we know what God hath done for us, the less we shall set by ourselves, and the more we shall love and please God; so that in no condition we shall either know ourselves or God, except we do utterly confess ourselves to be mere vileness and corruption. Well, now it is come unto this point, that we be christian men, christian women, I pray you, what doth Christ require of a christian man, or of a christian woman? Christ requireth nothing else of a christian man or woman, but that they will observe his rule. For likewise as he is a good Augustine friar that keepeth well St. Augustine's rule, so is he a good christian man that keepeth well Christ's rule.

Now then what is Christ's rule? Christ's rule consisteth in many things, as in the commandments, and the works of mercy, and so forth. And because I cannot declare Christ's rule unto you at one time, as it ought to be done, I will apply myself according to your custom at this time of Christmas; I will, as I said, declare unto you Christ's rule, but that shall be in Christ's cards. And where you are wont to celebrate Christmas in playing at cards, I intend by God's grace to deal unto you Christ's cards, wherein you shall perceive Christ's rule.

rule. The game that we will play at, shall be called the Triumph, which if it be well played at, he that dealeth shall win; the players shall likewise win, and the standers by and lookers on shall do the same; inso-much that there is no man that is willing to play at this Triumph with these cards, but they shall be all winners and no losers.

Let therefore every christian man and woman play at these cards, that they may have and obtain the Triumph; you must mark also that the Triumph must apply to fetch home unto him all the other cards, whatsoever suit they be of. Now then take you this first card which must appear and be shewed unto you as followeth. You have heard what was spoken to men of the old law, Thou shalt not kill; whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of judgment. But I say unto you of the new law, saith Christ, that whosoever is angry with his neighbour, shall be in danger of judgment, and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour Racha, that is to say, Brainless, or any other like word of rebuking, shall be in danger of a council; and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour, Fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire. This card was made and spoken by Christ, as appeareth in the fifth chapter of St. Matthew.

Now it must be noted, that whosoever shall play with this card, must first, before they play with it, know the strength and virtue of the same; wherefore you must well note and mark terms how they be spoken, and to what purpose: let us therefore read it once or twice, that we may be the better acquainted with it.

Now behold and see, this card is divided into four parts: The first part is one of the commandments that was given unto Moses in the old law, before the coming of Christ, which commandment we of the new law are bound to observe and keep, and is one of our commandments. The other three parts spoken by Christ, be nothing else but expositions to the first part of this commandment: for in very effect of all these four parts be but one commandment, that is to say, "Thou shalt not kill." Yet nevertheless, the three last parts do shew unto thee how many ways thou mayest kill thy neighbour, contrary to this commandment: yet for all Christ's exposition, in the three last parts of this card, the terms be not open enough to thee that dost read and hear them spoken. No doubt the Jews understood Christ well enough when he spoke to them the three last sentences, for he spake unto them in their own natural terms and tongue: wherefore seeing that these terms were natural terms of the Jews, it shall be necessary to expound them, and compare them unto some like terms of our natural speech, that we in like manner may understand Christ as well as the Jews did. We will begin with the first part of this card, and then after with the other three parts: you must therefore understand that the Jews and the Pharisees of the old law, to whom this first part, this commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," was spoken, thought it sufficient and enough for their discharge not to kill with any material weapon, as sword, dagger, or with any such weapon, and they thought it no great fault whatsoever they said or did by their neighbour, so that they did not harm or meddle with their corporal bodies, which was a false opinion in them, as prove well the three last other sentences following the first part of this card.

Now as concerning the three other sentences, you must note and take heed what difference is between these three manner of offences: 1. To be angry with your neighbour. 2. To call your neighbour brainless, or any such word of disdain. 3. Or to call your neighbour fool: whether these three manner of offences be of themselves more grievous one than the other, it is to be opened unto you. Truly, as they be of themselves divers offences, so they kill diversly one more than the other, as you shall perceive by the first of these three, and so forth: A man which conceiveth against his neighbour or brother, anger or wrath in his mind, by some manner of occasion given unto him, and although he be angry in his mind against his said neighbour, he will peradventure express his anger by no manner of sign, either in word or deed; yet nevertheless he of-fendeth against God, and breaketh this commandment in killing his own soul; and is therefore in danger of judgment.

Now to the second part of these three: That man that is moved with anger against his neighbour, and in his anger calleth his neighbour brainless, or some other like word of displeasure; as a man might say in a fury, I shall handle thee well enough, which words and countenances do more represent and declare anger to be in this man, than in him that was but angry, and spake no manner of word, nor shewed any countenance to declare his anger: wherefore as he that so declareth his anger either by word or countenance, offendeth more against God, so he both killeth his own soul, and doth what in him is to kill his neighbour's soul in moving him to anger, wherein he is faulty himself, and so this man is in danger of a council.

Now to the third offence, and last of the three: That man that called his neighbour fool, doth more declare his angry mind towards him, than he that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such word moving anger; but to call a man a fool, that word representeth more envy in a man, than brainless doth. Wherefore he doth most offend, because he doth most earnestly with such words express his anger, and so he is in danger of hell-fire: wherefore you must understand now these three parts of this card be three offences, and that one is more grievous to God than the other, and that one killeth more the soul of the man than the other.

Now peradventure there will be some that will marvel that Christ did not declare this commandment by some greater fault of anger, than by these which seem but small faults, as to be angry and speak nothing of it, to declare it and to call a man brainless, and to call his neighbour fool: truly these be the smallest, and the least faults that belong to anger, or to killing in anger. Therefore beware how you offend in any kind of anger: seeing that the smallest be damnable to offend in, see that you offend not in the greatest. For Christ thought, if he might bring you from the smallest manner of faults, and give you warning to avoid the least, he reckoned you would not offend in the greatest and worst, as to call your neighbour thief, whoreson, whore, drab, &c. into more blasphemous names, which offences must needs have punishment in hell, considering how that Christ hath appointed these three small faults, to have three degrees of punishment in hell, as appeareth by these three terms, judgment, council, and hell-fire; these three terms do signify nothing else but three divers punishments in hell, according to the offences. Judgment is less in degree than council, therefore it signifieth a lesser pain in hell, and it is ordained for him that is angry in his mind with his neighbour, and doth express his malice neither by word nor countenance. Council is a less degree in hell than hell-fire, and is a greater degree in hell than judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such word that declareth his anger and malice: wherefore it is more pain than judgment. Hell-fire is more pain in hell than council or judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour fool, by reason that in calling his neighbour fool, he declareth more his malice, in that it is an earnest word of anger. Wherefore hell-fire is appointed for it, that is, the most pain of the three punishments.

Now you have heard, that to these divers offences of ire and killing, punishments are appointed according to their degrees: for observe, as the offence is, so shall the pain be: if the offence be great, the pain shall be accordingly: if it be less, there shall be less pain for it. I would not now that you should think because that here are but three degrees of punishment spoke of, that there be no more in hell: no doubt Christ spake of no more here but of these three degrees of punishment, thinking they were sufficient enough for example, whereby we might understand, that there are as many pains as there are offences: and so by these three offences, and these three punishments, all other offences and punishments may be compared with each other: yet I would satisfy your minds farther in these three terms, terms, judgment, council and hell-fire. Where you might say, what was the cause that Christ declared more the pains of hell by these terms than by any other terms? I told you before that he knew well to whom he spake them; these terms were natural, and well known among the Jews and the Pharisees. Wherefore Christ taught them with their own terms, to the intent they might understand the better his doctrine; and these terms may be likened unto three terms which we have common and usual amongst us, that is to say, the sessions of inquirance, the sessions of deliverance, and the execution day: sessions of inquirance is like unto judgment; for when sessions of inquiry is, then the judges cause twelve men to give verdict of the felon's crime, whereby he shall be judged to be indicted: sessions of deliverance is much like council; for at sessions of deliverance the judges go among themselves to council, to determine sentence against the felon. Execution day is to be compared to hell-fire: for the Jews had a place of execution amongst themselves named Hell-fire: and surely when a man goeth to his death, it is the greatest pain in this world: wherefore you may see that there are degrees in these our terms, as there be in those terms. The evil disposed affections and sensualities in us are always contrary to the rule of our salvation. What shall we do now or imagine to thrust down these Turks, and to subdue them? It is a great ignominy and shame for a christian man to be bound and subject to a Turk: nay, it shall not be so, we will first cast a trump in their way, and play with them at cards who shall have the better; let us play therefore on this card. Whensoever it shall happen these foul passions and Turks to rise in our stomachs against our brother or neighbour, either for unkind words, injuries, or wrongs, which they have done unto us, contrary to our mind, straightways let us call unto our remembrance, and speak this question unto ourselves, Who art thou? The answer is, I am a christian man. Then further we must say to ourselves, What requireth Christ of a christian man? Now turn up your trump, your heart, (heart is trump, as I said before) and cast your trump, your heart, on this card, and upon this card you shall learn what Christ requireth of a christian man, not to be angry, nor moved to ire against his neighbour, in mind, countenance, nor otherwise by word or deed. Then take up this card with your heart, and lay them together; that done, you have won the game of the Turk, whereby you have defaced and overcome by true and lawful play: but, alas, for pity, the Rhodes are won and overcome by the false Turks, and strong castle faith is decayed, so that I fear it is almost impossible to win it again.

The great occasion of the loss of this Rhodes is, by reason that christian men do so daily kill their own nation, that the very true number of Christians is decayed: which murder and killing one of another is increased, especially two ways, to the utter undoing of Christendom, that is to say, by example and silence. By example thus: When the father, the mother, the lord, the lady, the master, the dame, be themselves overcome with these Turks, they be continual swearers, adulterers, disposers to malice, never in patience, and so forth in all other vices: think you not when the father, the mother, the master, the dame, be disposed unto vice or impatience, but that their children and servants shall incline and be disposed to the same? No doubt as the child shall take disposition natural of his father and mother, so shall the servants apply unto the vices of their masters and dames; if the heads be false in their faculties and crafts, it is no marvel if the children, servants, and apprentices do join therein. This is a great and shameful manner of killing christian men, that the fathers, the mothers, the masters, and the dames, shall not only kill themselves, but all their's, and all that belongeth unto them, and so this way is a great number of christian lineage murdered and spoiled. The second manner of killing is silence. By silence also is a great number of christian men slain; which is on this fashion: although the father and mother, master and dame, of themselves be well disposed to live after the law of God, yet they may kill their children and servants in suffering them to do evil before their own faces, and do not use correction according to their offences; the master seeth his servant or apprentice take more of his neighbour, than the king's laws, or the order of his faculty doth admit him, or he suffereth him to take more of his neighbour, than he himself would be content to pay if he were in like condition: thus doing, I say, such men kill willingly their children and servants, and shall go to hell for so doing; but also their fathers and mothers, masters and dames, shall bear them company for so suffering. Wherefore I exhort all true christian men and women to give good example unto your children and servants, and suffer not them by silence to offend: every man must be in his own house, according to St. Augustine's mind, a bishop, not only giving good example, but teaching according to it, rebuke and punish vice, not suffering your children and servants to forget the laws of God: you ought to see them have their belief, to know the commandments of God, to keep their holy days, not to lose their time in idleness; if they do so, you shall all suffer pain for it, if God be true of his saying, as there is no doubt thereof: and so you may perceive that there be many that break this card, "Thou shalt not kill," and play therewith oftentimes, at the blind trump, whereby they be no winners, but great losers; but who be those now-a-days that can clear themselves of these manifest murders used to their children and servants? I think not the contrary, but that many have these two ways slain their own children unto their own damnation, were not the great mercy of God ready to help them when they repent therefore.

Wherefore considering that we be so prone and ready to continue in sin, let us cast ourselves down with Mary Magdalen, and the more we bow down with her towards Christ's feet, the more we shall be afraid to rise again in sin: and the more we know and submit ourselves, the more we shall be forgiven, and the less we know and submit ourselves, the less we shall be forgiven, as appeareth by the following example.

When Christ was in the world amongst the Jews and Pharisees, there was a great Pharisee whose name was Simon; this Pharisee desired Christ on a time to dine with him, thinking with himself that he was able and worthy to give Christ a dinner: Christ refused not his dinner, but came unto him. In time of their dinner, there happened to come into the house a great sinner named Mary Magdalen. As soon as she perceived Christ, she cast herself down, and called unto her remembrance what she was of herself, and how greatly she had offended God, whereby she conceived in Christ great love, and so came near unto him, and washed his feet with bitter tears, and shed upon his head precious ointment, thinking that by him she should be delivered from her sins. This great and proud Pharisee seeing that Christ did accept her oblation in the best part, had great indignation against this woman, and said to himself, If this man Christ were a holy prophet, as he is taken for, he would not suffer this sinner to come so nigh him. Christ understanding the naughty mind of this Pharisee, said to him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee: say what you please (quoth the Pharisee). Then, said Christ, I pray thee tell me this: if there be a man to whom there is owing twenty pounds to one, and forty by another, this man to whom this money is owing, perceiving these two men be not able to pay him, he forgiveth them both. Which of these two debtors ought to love this man most? The Pharisee said, That man ought to love him best that had most forgiven him. Likewise, said Christ, it is by this woman. She hath loved me most, therefore most is forgiven her; she hath known her sins most, whereby she hath most loved me; and thou hast least loved me, because thou hast least known thy sins; therefore because thou hast least known thine offences, thou art least forgiven. So this proud Pharisee had an answer to allay his pride: and think you not but there be amongst us a great number of these proud Pharisees, which think themselves worthy to bid Christ to dinner, who will perk and presume to sit by Christ in the church, and have disdain of this poor woman Magdalen, their poor neighbour, with an high disdainful and solemn countenance; and being always desirous to climb highest in the church, reckoning themselves more worthy to sit here than another, I fear me poor Magdalen under the boord and in the belfry, hath more forgiven of Christ than they have: for it is like that these Pharisees do less know themselves and their offences, whereby they less love God, and they be less forgiven.

I would to God we would follow this example, and be like unto Magdalen. I doubt not but we be all Magdalens in falling into sin, and offending: but we be not again Magdalens in knowing ourselves, and in rising from sin. If we be the true Magdalens, we should be as willing to forsake our sin, and rise from sin, as we were willing to commit sin, and to continue in it; and we then should know ourselves best, and make more perfect answer than ever we did, unto this question, Who art thou? To which we might answer, that we be true christian men and women: and then, I say, you shall understand and know how you ought to play at this card, "Thou shalt not kill," without any interruption of your deadly enemies the Turks, and so triumph at the last by winning everlasting life in glory, Amen.

It would require a long discourse to declare what a stir there was in Cambridge upon this preaching of Mr. Latimer. Belike Satan began to feel himself and his kingdom to be touched too near, and therefore thought it time to look about him, and to make out his men of arms.

First came out the prior of Black Friars, called Buckneham, who thinking to make a great hand against Mr. Latimer, about the same time of Christmas, when Mr. Latimer brought forth his cards to deface belike the doings of the other, brought out his Christmas dice, casting there to his audience Cinque and Quarter, meaning by the Cinque five places in the New Testament, and the four doctors by the Quarter; by which his Cinque and Quarter he would prove that it was not expedient for the scriptures to be in English, lest the ignorant and vulgar sort, through the occasion thereof, might aptly be brought in danger to leave their vocation, or else to run into some convenience: as for example:

The ploughman, when he heareth this in the gospel: "No man that layeth his hand on the plough and looketh back, is meet for the kingdom of God;" might peradventure hearing this, cease from his plough. Likewise the baker, when he hears that a little leaven corrupteth a whole lump of dough, may perchance leave our bread unleavened, and so our bodies shall be unseasoned. Also the simple man, when he heareth in the gospel, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee," may make himself blind, and so fill the world with beggars. These, with some others, this clerkly friar brought out, to the number of five, to prove his purpose.

Mr. Latimer hearing this sermon of Dr. Buckneham, came again in the afternoon, or shortly after, to the church to answer the friar, where resorted to him a great multitude, as well of the university as of the town, both doctors and other graduates, with great expectation to hear what he could say: among whom also, directly in the face of Latimer, underneath the pulpit, sat Buckneham the aforesaid friar, prior of the Black-Friars, with his black friar's cowl about his shoulders.

Then Mr. Latimer first repeating the friarly reasons of Dr. Buckneham, whereby he would prove it a dangerous thing for the vulgar people to have the scriptures in the vulgar tongue, so refuted the friar, so answered to his objections, so dallied with his bald reason of the ploughman looking back, and of the baker leaving his bread unleavened, that the vanity of the friar might to all men appear, well proving and declaring to the people, that there was no such fear nor danger for the scriptures to be in English, as the friar pretended; at least requiring this, that the scriptures might be so long in the English tongue, till Englishmen were so mad, that either the ploughman durst not look back, or the baker should leave his bread unleavened: And proceeding moreover in his sermon, he began to discourse of the mystical speeches and figurative phrases of the scriptures; which phrases he said were not so diffuse and difficult, as they were common in the scriptures, and in the Hebrew tongue are commonly used and known: and not only in the Hebrew tongue, but also every speech (saith he) hath it's like metaphors and figurative significations, so common and vulgar to all men, that the very painters do paint them on walls and on houses.

As for example (saith he, looking towards the friar that sat over against him) when they paint a fox preaching out of a friar's cowl, none is so mad to take this to be a fox that preacheth, but know well enough the meaning of the matter; which is to point out unto us, what hypocrisy, crafts, and subtle dissimulation lieth hid many times in these friar's cowls, willing us thereby to beware of them. In fine, friar Buckneham was so dashed with this sermon, that he durst never after peep out of the pulpit against Mr. Latimer.

Besides this Buckneham, there was also another railing friar, not of the same coat, but of the same note and faction, a gray friar and a doctor, an outlandish man, named Dr. Venetus, who likewise in his brawling sermon railed and raged against Mr. Latimer, calling him a mad and brainless man, and willing the people not to believe him, &c. To whom Mr. Latimer answering again, taketh for his ground the words of our Saviour Christ, Matt. v. Thou shalt not kill, &c. But I say unto you, Whosoever is angry with his neighbour shall be in danger of judgment; and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour Racha, (or any other like words of rebuking, as brainless) shall be in danger of council: and whosoever shall say to his neighbour, Fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire.

In discussing of which place, first he divideth the offence of killing into three branches. One to be with hand, the other with heart, the third with word. With hand, when we use any weapon drawn, to spill the life of our neighbour. With heart, when we be angry with him. With word, when in word or countenance we disdainfully rebuke our neighbour, or despitefully revile him. Words of rebuking are, when we speak any opprobrious or unseemly thing, whereby the patience of our neighbour is moved, as when we call him mad (saith he) or brainless, or such like, which are guilty of council: words of spite, or reviling are, when we call him fool; which Christ saith is guilty of hell-fire.

Thus Mr. Latimer in handling and trimming this matter, after that with the weight of Christ's words, and the explaining of the same, he had sufficiently borne the friar clean down, then he turned to the fifth chapter of the book of Wisdom. Out of which chapter he declared to the audience, how the true servants and preachers of God in this world, commonly are scorned and reviled by the proud enemies of God's word, which account them here as mad-men, fools, brainless, and drunken: so did they (saith he) in the scripture call them which most purely preached, and set forth the glory of God's word. But (saith he) what will be the end of these jolly fellows, or what will they say in the end? We mad men, we mad fools, we, we ourselves, &c. And that will be their end except they repent. And thus ending his sermon, he so confounded the poor friar, that he drove him not only out of countenance, but also clean out of the university.

But what should I here stand deciphering the names of his adversaries, when whole swarms of friars and doctors flocked against him on every side, almost through the whole university, preaching and likewise barking against him? Amongst whom was Dr. Watson, master of Christ's college, whose scholar Latimer had been before, Dr. Notaries, master of Clare-hall, Dr. Philo, master of Michael-house, Dr. Metcalfe, master of St. John's, Dr. Blithe, of the King's-hall, Dr. Bullock, master of the Queen's college, Dr. Cliffe, of Clement-house, Dr. Donnes, of Jesus college, Dr. Pfalms, master of St. Nicholas Hostel, Bain, Rud, and Greenwood, bachelors of divinity, all three of St.

John's college; also Brickenden, bachelor of divinity, of the same house, and scholar sometime to the said Latimer. In short, almost as many as were heads of houses, so many enemies did this worthy standard-bearer of Christ's gospel sustain.

Then came at last Dr. West, bishop of Ely, who preaching against Mr. Latimer at Barwell-abbey, forbade him within the churches of that university to preach any more. Notwithstanding, so the Lord provided, that Dr. Barnes, prior of the Augustine friars, did license Mr. Latimer to preach in his church of the Augustines, and he himself preached at the next church, called St. Edward's church, which was the first sermon of the gospel that Dr. Barnes preached, being Sunday, and Christmas Eve. Whereupon certain articles were gathered out of his sermon, and were commenced against him by Mr. Tirell, fellow of the King's-hall, and so by the vice-chancellor presented to the cardinal.

Thus Mr. Latimer (as you have heard) being baited by the friars, doctors, and masters of that university, about the year aforesaid, 1529, notwithstanding the malice of these malignant adversaries, continued yet in Cambridge preaching for the space of three years together, with favour and applause of the godly, also with such admiration of his enemies that heard him, that the bishop himself coming in, and hearing his gift, wished himself to have the like, and was compelled to commend him upon the same.

So Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney, after this, continued in Cambridge for some time, where they so frequently conferred together, that the field wherein they usually walked, was for a long time after called, The heretics' hill.

The society of these two, as it was much noted by many in that university, so it was full of many good examples, to all such as would follow them, both in visiting the prisoners, relieving the needy, and in feeding the hungry. Mr. Latimer maketh mention of a certain history which happened about this time in Cambridge, between them both and a certain woman then prisoner in the castle or tower of Cambridge, which I thought here worthy to be mentioned. The story is this: It so happened, that after Mr. Latimer had been so acquainted with the aforesaid Mr. Bilney, he went with him to visit the prisoners in the tower of Cambridge, and being there, among other prisoners, there was a woman who was accused that she had killed her own child, which act she plainly and stedfastly denied. Whereby it gave them occasion to search for the matter, and at length they found that her husband loved her not, and therefore sought all means he could to make her away. The matter was thus:

A child of her's had been sick a whole year, and at length died in harvest time, as it were in a consumption: which when it was gone, she went to have her neighbours to help her at the burial, but all were abroad in the harvest, whereby she was enforced with heaviness of heart, alone to prepare the child for the burial. Her husband coming home, and not loving her, accused her of murdering the child. This was the cause of her trouble; and Mr. Latimer, by earnest inquisition, of conscience thought the woman not guilty. Then immediately after he was called to preach before king Henry the eighth at Windsor, where after his sermon the king's majesty sent for him, and talked familiarly with him. At which time Mr. Latimer, finding an opportunity, kneeled down, opened the whole matter to the king, and desired her pardon, which the king most graciously granted, and gave it to him at his return homeward. In the mean time the woman was delivered of a child in the prison, whose godfather was Mr. Latimer, and Mrs. Cheek godmother. But all the while he would not tell her of the pardon, but laboured to have her confess the truth of the matter. At length the time came when she expected to suffer, and Mr. Latimer came as he was wont, to instruct her; unto whom she made great lamentation and moan, to be purified before her suffering, for she thought she must be damned if she died without purification.

Then Mr. Bilney being with Mr. Latimer, both told her, that that law was made for the Jews, and not for us, and that women be as well in the favour of God before they be purified as after; and rather it was appointed for a civil and political law, for natural honesty's sake, than they should any thing the more be purified from sin thereby, &c. So they thus argued with this woman till they had better instructed her, and at length shewed her the king's pardon, and let her go.

This good act, among many others about that time, happened in Cambridge by Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney. But this was not all, for many more like matters were wrought by them. Among his adversaries was Dr. Redman, a man favouring more of superstition than of true religion, after the zeal of the Pharisees, yet not so malignant or hurtful, but of a civil and quiet disposition, and also liberal in well-doing, that few poor scholars were in that university who fared not better by his purse. Dr. Redman was a man of great authority in the university of Cambridge, and perceiving the bold enterprize of Mr. Latimer, in setting abroad the word and doctrine of the gospel, at this time, or much about the same, he wrote to him, seeking by persuasion to revoke Latimer from that kind and manner of teaching: but Mr. Latimer in his answer said, Christ's sheep hear no man's voice but Christ's.

After Mr. Latimer had thus laboured in preaching and teaching in the university of Cambridge about the space of three years, at length he was called up to the cardinal for heresy, by the procurement of some of the said university, where he was content to subscribe and grant to such articles as they then propounded.

After that he returned to the university again, where shortly after, by the means of Dr. Buts, the king's physician, he was in the number of them which laboured in the cause of the king's supremacy. At last being weary of the court, having a benefice in Wiltshire offered by the king, at the suit of the lord Cromwel and Dr. Buts, he accepted the same and instructed his flock with much diligence. In fine, his diligence was so great, his preaching so powerful, the manner of his teaching so zealous, that there in like sort he could not escape without enemies.

His chief enemies and molesters, besides country priests, were Dr. Powel, of Salisbury, Dr. Wilson, sometime of Cambridge, Mr. Hubberdin, and Dr. Sherwood. Of whom some preached and some wrote against him.

prescribed by the canons, and by custom received of the christians, (except necessity otherwise require) are to be observed and kept.

That God in every one of the seven sacraments giveth grace to a man, rightly receiving the same.

That consecrations, sanctifyings and blessings, by use and custom received in the church, are laudable and profitable.

That it is laudable and profitable, that the venerable images of the crucifix and other saints should be had in the churches as a remembrance, and to the honour and worship of Jesus Christ and his saints.

That it is laudable and profitable to deck and to clothe those images, and set up burning lights before them to the honour of the said saints.

Whether he was compelled by the bishops to sign these articles cannot here be ascertained; but in a letter to the bishop, he avows his detestation of the propositions, and declares himself averse from subscribing, "lest I be the author of my own damnation."

As the diligence of this man of God never ceased all the time of king Edward, to profit the church both publicly and privately, so it is likewise to be observed, that the same good Spirit of God that assisted and comforted him in preaching the gospel, did also enable him to sortel all those kinds of plagues, which afterwards ensued; if England ever had a prophet, he seemed to have been one. As touching himself, he ever affirmed, that the preaching of the gospel would cost him his life, and was persuaded that Winchester was kept in the tower for the same purpose, as the event did too truly prove. After the death of the said pious king Edward, when queen Mary was proclaimed, a pursuivant was sent down (by the means, no doubt, of Winchester) into the country, to call him up, of whose coming, although Mr. Latimer lacked no forewarning, being premonished about six hours before by one John Careless, yet he was so far from endeavouring to escape, that he prepared himself for his journey before the said officer came to his house.

Thus Mr. Latimer being sent for, and coming up to London, (entering Smithfield, he merrily said, That Smithfield had long groaned for him) was brought before the council, where he patiently endured all the mocks and taunts of scornful papists, and was again sent to the Tower.

Having passed a long time in the Tower, with as much patience as a man in his case could do, from thence he was transported to Oxford, with Dr. Crammer, archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, there to dispute upon articles sent down from Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, as is before mentioned: the manner and order of which disputations between them and the university doctors, is also before sufficiently expressed. Where also is declared, how, and by whom the said Latimer, with his other fellow-prisoners, were condemned after disputations, and so committed again to the prison, and there they continued from the month of April till the month of October, where they were most godly occupied, either with brotherly conference, or with fervent prayer, or with fruitful writing.

Albeit, Mr. Latimer, by reason of the feebleness of his age, wrote least of them all, in this latter time of his imprisonment; yet in prayer he was fervently occupied, wherein oftentimes so long he continued kneeling, that he was not able to rise without help; and amongst other things, these were three principal matters that he prayed for.

First, That as God had appointed him to be a preacher of his word, so also he would give him grace to stand to his doctrine until his death, that he might give his heart's blood for the same.

Secondly, That God of his mercy would restore his gospel to England once again.

The third matter was, to pray for the preservation of the lady Elizabeth, whom in his prayer he used to name, and even with tears desired God to make her a comfort to this comfortless realm of England.

Neither were these things of him desired in vain, for the Lord most graciously did grant all those his requests.

First, Concerning his constancy, even in the most extremity the Lord graciously assisted him. For when he stood at the stake without Bocardo-gate at Oxford, and the tormentors about to set the fire to him, and to the learned and pious Dr. Ridley, he lifted up his eyes towards heaven, with an audible and comfortable countenance, saying these words, "God is faithful, which doth not suffer us to be tempted above our strength:" and so afterwards shed his blood in the cause of Christ, which blood ran out of his heart in such abundance, that all those that were present, being godly, did marvel to see the most part of the blood in his body to be gathered to his heart, and with such violence to gush out, his body being opened by the force of the fire; by which things God most graciously granted his request, which was, That he might shed his heart's blood in the defence of the gospel.

How mercifully the Lord heard his second request, in restoring his gospel once again unto this realm, these present days can bear record.

Again, Concerning his third request, it seemeth likewise most effectually granted, to the great praise of God, the furtherance of his gospel, and to the unspeakable comfort of this realm. For the recovery of God's word, queen Elizabeth was appointed and anointed, for whom this gray-headed father so earnestly prayed in his imprisonment; through whose true, natural, and imperial crown, the brightness of God's word was set up again to confound the dark and false vizored kingdom of Antichrist, the true temple of Christ re-edified, the captivity of sorrowful christians released.

The same God, who at the requests of his holy, faithful saints hath poured upon us such benefits of his mercy, peace, and tranquillity, assist our most virtuous and christian prince, and his subjects, that we may every one in his state and calling serve to his glory, and walk in our vocation, that we lose not that which we have obtained, but may proceed in all faithfulness to build and keep up the house and temple of the Lord, to the advancing of his glory, and our everlasting comfort in him. And thus much concerning the laborious travels of Mr. Latimer. Now after these things thus finished and discoursed, pertaining to the story of his life, let us come to his letters, which he wrote at divers and sundry times from the first beginning of his preaching, all which here to comprehend, which he wrote both in English and Latin, want of room at present will not permit; nevertheless some we shall insert, and first concerning the articles above mentioned, for which he was troubled by the priests of the country about his benefice at West-Kingston; which he writeth thereof to Mr. Morrice, the copies whereof follow.

ARTICLES untruly, unjustly, falsely, and uncharitably, imputed to me by Dr. POWEL, of SALISBURY.

First, That our LADY was a SINNER.

Occasioned of some, not only laymen, but also priests and beneficed men, who gave so much to our lady of devotion without judgment, as though she had not needed Christ to save her. To prove Christ her Saviour, to make Christ a whole Saviour of all that be, or shall be saved, I reasoned after this manner: That either she was a sinner or no sinner; there is no mean. If she was a sinner, then she was redeemed or delivered from sin by Christ, as other sinners be: if she was no sinner, then she was preserved from sin by Christ; so that Christ saved her, and was her necessary Saviour, whether she sinned or no. Now certain authors, said I, as Chrysostom, Theophylact, and others, write, as though she had been something faulty in her time. Also I said, that certain scriptures stand to the same, unless they be the more warily understood and taken, (as in Rom. iii. 10, 20.) All have declined, that every mouth be stopped, and all the world be bounden or in danger to God. And after in the same chapter, all have sinned, and need the glory of God. And in the fifth, And so death passed through into all men and women, forasmuch as all have sinned. But to these scriptures I said it might be answered, that the privilege of one, or of a few, doth not derogate or diminish the verity of an universal exposition in scriptures.

And as to the doctors, I said, that others say otherwise; and forasmuch as now it is universally and constantly received and applied that she was no sinner, it becometh every man to stand and agree to the same; and so will I, said I, nor any man that is wise, will the contrary: but to my purpose it is neither to nor from, to prove neither this nor that; for I will have her saved, and Christ her Saviour, whether ever she was, &c.

And to that, what need you to speak of this? I answered, great need, what man cannot be content that she was a creature saved, but as it were a Saviouress, not needing salvation, it is necessary to set her in degree to the glory of Christ, Creator and Saviour of all that be or shall be saved. Good authors have written that she was not a sinner: but good authors never wrote that she was not saved: for though she never sinned, yet she was not so impeccable, but she might have sinned, if she had not been preserved: it was of the goodness of God that she never sinned: it had come of her own illnes if she had sinned: there was difference between her and Christ. And I will give as little to her as I can (doing her no wrong) rather than Christ her Son and Saviour shall lack any thing of his glory; and I am sure that our lady will not be displeased with me for so doing, for our lady sought his glory here upon earth, she would not defraud him now in heaven: but some are so superstitiously religious, or so irreligiously superstitious, so preposterously devout toward our lady, as though there could not too much be given to her: such are zeals without knowledge and judgment to our lady's displeasure.

No doubt our lady was, through the goodness of God, a good and a gracious creature, a devout hand-maid of the Lord, endued with singular gifts and graces from above, which through the help of God she used to God's pleasure, according to her duty, so giving example to do likewise, so that all the goodness that she had, she had it not of herself, but of God the author of all goodness: the Lord was with her favourably, and poured graces unto her plenteously, as it is in the Ave Maria. The Son of God, when he would become man to save both man and woman, did chuse her to be his mother, which love he shewed to her alone, and to no other, of his benign goodness, by which she was the natural mother of Christ: and through faith in Christ she was the spiritual sister of Christ, saved by Christ, blessed by hearing Christ's word, and keeping the same. It would not have availed to her salvation, to have been his natural mother, if she had not done the will of his heavenly Father: by him she was his mother, by him she did the will of his Father: she the hand-maiden, he the Lord. The hand-maiden did magnify the Lord, the hand-maiden would that all should magnify the Lord, to whom be honour and glory for ever, Amen.

To honour him worthily, is not to dishonour our lady; he is as able to preserve from sin, as to deliver from sin; he was then subject to Joseph his father-in-law, his mother's husband; Joseph is now subject to him. He never dishonoured Joachim and Anna, his grandfather and grandmother, and yet I have not read that he preserved them from all sin.

To say that Peter, and Paul, David, and Mary Magdalen, were sinners, is not to dishonour them: for then scripture doth dishonour them. It had not been for our profit to have preserved them all that he could have preserved.

For remembrance of that fall and up-rising keepeth us in our fall from despairing: both is of God, to have not sinned, and to have forsaken and left sin. And as sure is this of heaven as that, and this more common than that, and to us that have been sinners more comfortable.

It hath been said in times past, without sin, that our lady was a sinner: but it was never said without sin, that our lady was not saved, but a Saviour: I do not go about to make my lady a sinner, but to have Christ her Saviour. When mine adversaries cannot reprove the thing that I say, then they will belie me, to say the thing that they can reprove. They will sin to make our lady no sinner, to prove that, that no man dieth. So that provers, and so cold probations saw you never. It were better unproved, than so weakly proved. But they be devout towards honouring of our lady, but a sin to have our lady no sinner, or to say she was no sinner.

I would be as loth to dishonour our lady as they, I pray God we may honour her as she would be honoured: for verily she is worthy to be honoured.

To make a pernicious and damnable lie, to have our lady no sinner, is neither honour, nor yet pleasure to our lady, but great sin, to the dishonour and displeasure both of God and her.

They should both please and honour our lady much better, to believe their sinful living, and to keep themselves from sinfulness, as our lady did, than so sinfully to lie to make our lady no sinner; which if they do not, they shall certainly go to the devil, though they believe ever so surely that our lady was no sinner.

And for the Ave Maria they lie falsely, I never denied it: I know it was a heavenly salutation or greeting of our lady, spoken by the angel Gabriel, and written in the holy scripture of St. Luke. But yet it is not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noster is. Saluting or greeting, lauding or praising, is not properly praying. The angel was sent to greet our lady, and to communicate and to shew the will of God towards her, and therefore it is called the Annunciation of our lady, and not to pray to her, or to pray to her properly: shall the Father of heaven pray to our lady? When the angel spake it, it was not properly a prayer. And is it not the same thing now as it was then? Nor yet he that denieth the Ave Maria to be properly a prayer, denieth the Ave Maria; so that we may salute our lady with Hail Mary! as the angel did, though we be not sent of God so to do, as the angel was. Yet though we may so do, we have no plain command for so doing, as the angel had; so that the angel had been more to blame peradventure to have left it unsaid, than we be, forasmuch as he was appointed of God to say it, and not we: but as I deny not, but as we may say the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria together, that to God, this to our lady, so we may say them separately, the Pater Noster by itself, and the Ave by itself; and the Pater Noster is a whole and a perfect prayer, without the Ave Maria; so that it is but a superstition to think that a Pater Noster cannot be well said without an Ave Maria at his heel. For Christ was no fool, and when he taught the people to say a Pater Noster to God, he taught them not to say, neither Pater Noster, neither Ave Maria to our lady, nor yet Pater Noster to St. Peter, as Mr. Hubberdin doth: therefore to teach to say twenty Ave-Marias for one Pater Noster, is not to speak the word of God as the word of God. And one Ave Maria well said, and devoutly with affection, sense and understanding, is better than twenty-five said superstitiously. And it is not like, but our lady said many times the Pater Noster, forasmuch as her son Christ, whom she loved and honoured over all, did make it, and taught it to be said; whether she made an Ave Maria with all, or ten or twenty Ave Marias for one Pater Noster, I will leave that to learned men, as Hubberdin and Powel, to discuss and determine: she was not saved by often saying of the Ave Maria, but by consenting to the will of him that sent the angel to salute her with Hail Mary: wherefore if the praying of them which decline their ear from hearing the law of God is execrable ble in the fight of God, yea, though they say the Pater Noster, I doubt not but the salvation of them hath been unpleasant to our lady in her sight, for whatsoever pleaseth not her Son, pleaseth not her; for she hath delight and pleasure in nothing, but in him, and in that which delighteth and pleaseth him. Now we will be traitors to her Son by customable sinful living, and yet we shall think great perfection and holiness in numbering every day many Ave Marias to our lady, and so we think to make her our friend and patroness, and then we care not for God; for having our lady on our side, we may be bold to take our pleasure; for we fancy as though the very work and labour of repeating the Ave Maria is very acceptable to our lady, and the more, the more acceptable, not minding how they be said, so that they be said; if the Pater Noster which Christ both made, and commanded us to use, may be used to Christ's displeasure, much more the Ave Maria, which neither Christ nor our lady bid us say, may be said to her displeasure: and better never once said, than often so said. I would have difference between well saying and often saying, and between that which Christ bid us say, and that which he bid us not say: and whether Ave Maria be said in heaven or no, who can tell but Dr. Powel? and if it be said always there without a Pater Noster, why may not Pater Noster be said here without Ave Maria; and whether doth our lady say it in heaven or no? Which thing I speak not to withdraw you from saying of it, but to withdraw you from superstitious and unfruitful saying of it. So that by occasion of false faith and trust that you have in the daily saying of it, you set not aside imitation and following of holy living, which will serve at length, when superstitious greeting will neither serve nor stand in strength: it is meet that every thing be taken, esteemed, and valued as it is.

We salute also and greet well the holy cross, or the image of the holy cross, saying, All hail, holy cross, which hath deserved to bear the precious talent of the world: and yet who will say that we pray properly to the holy cross? whereby it may appear that greeting is one thing, praying another thing. The cross can neither hear nor speak again, no more than this pulpit: there we do salute it, not properly pray to it.

The angel spake also to Zachary, before he spake to our lady. Be not afraid, Zachary, for thy prayer is heard, and thy wife Elizabeth shall bring thee forth a child which shall be called John, and great joy and gladness shall be at his birth, and he shall be great and full of the Holy Ghost from the womb of his mother, &c.

What if a man should say these words every day, between the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria, in the worship of St. Zachary, who I think is a saint in heaven, and was ere ever our lady came there to be honoured, I think he might please and honour St. Zachary, as well some other way, and better too, though they were words sent from God, spoken by an angel, and written by St. Luke in the holy Scripture.

And yet if it were once begun and accustomed, I warrant some men would make it more than sacrilege to leave it off, though the devil should fow ever so much superstition by process of time unto it.

Christ made the Pater Noster for a prayer, and bid his people say it to his heavenly Father, One God in Trinity of Persons, one Father and Comforter, one Worker and Doer of all things here in this world, saying unto us, After this manner shall ye pray, Our Father, &c. God sent his Son, amongst other things, to teach his people to pray: God sent his angel to greet our lady, not to teach his people to pray. For neither Christ nor the angel said to the people, This shall you pray, Ave Maria. When the apostles said to Christ, Teach us to pray; Christ said, When you pray, say, Our Father: he said not when you pray, say, Ave Maria. I suppose Christ could teach to pray, as well as Dr. Powel and Mr. Hubberdin. I say that the Ave Maria was before the Pater Noster: Dr. Powel saith, it shall endure after the Pater Noster: I can prove my saying by scripture, which he cannot: yet as it is no good argument, The Ave Maria was before the Pater Noster: therefore, it is properly a prayer: so it is no good argument, The Ave Maria shall last after the Pater Noster: therefore it is properly a prayer; without the antecedent be impossible, which is not credible to come out of such a fantastical brain.

Who was ever so mad as to think that words of holy scripture could not be well said: and yet we may not be so peevish as to allow the superstitious saying of holy scripture. The devil is crafty, and we frail and prone to superstition and idolatry; God give me grace to worship him and his, not after our own curiosity, but according to his ordinance with all humility.

St. Zachary is to be honoured, and in no wise to be dishonoured: so that we may leave unsaid that which the angel said without dishonouring him.

It is not necessary to our salvation to make an ordinance of honouring him, with saying as the angel did.

It is better for a mortal man to do the office of a man, which God biddeth him to do, than to leave that undone, and to do the office of an angel which God biddeth us not to do: if the other be presumption, I had rather presume to pray to God, which is God's bidding and man's office, than to presume into the office of an angel without God's bidding.

It is a godly presumption, to presume to do the bidding of God.

Here I neither say, that our lady was a sinner, nor yet deny the Ave Maria.

SAINTS are not to be HONoured.

I said this word [Saints] is diversly taken by the vulgar people; images of saints are called saints, and inhabitants of heaven are called saints. Now by honouring of saints, is meant praying to saints. Take honouring so, and images for saints; so saints are not to be honoured: that is to say, dead images are not to be prayed unto; for they have neither ears to hear withal, nor tongue to speak withal, nor heart to think withal, &c.

They can neither help me nor mine ox, neither my head nor my tooth, nor work any miracle for me, one no more than another: and yet I shewed the good use of them to be laymen's books as they are called, reverently to look upon them, to remember the things that are signified by them, &c.

And yet I would not have them so costly and curiously gilt and decked, that the quick image of God, (for whom Christ shed his blood, and to whom whatsoever is done Christ reputeth it done to himself) lack necessities to be unprovided for by that occasion, for then the layman doth abuse his book.

A man may read upon his book, though it be not very curiously gilded; and in the day-time a man may behold it without many candles, if he be not blind.

Now I say there be two kinds of mediators, one by way of redemption, another by way of intercession; and I said that these saints, that is to say, images called saints, be mediators neither way.

As touching pilgrimages, I said, that all idolatry, superstition, error, false faith, and hope in the images, must be pared away, before they can be well done, household looked upon, poor christian people provided for, restitutions made, all ordinances of God discharged, or ever they can be well done. And when they be at best, before they be vowed, they need not to be done: they shall never be required of us, though they be never done, and yet we shall be blamed when they be all done; wives must advise with their husbands, and husbands with their wives, both with curates, ere ever they may be vowed to be done.

And yet idolatry may be committed in doing of them, as it appeareth by St. Paul, in the first epistle to the Corinthians, chap. x. where he biddeth the Corinthians this; to beware of idolatry, and that after they had received the true faith in Christ; which had been vain, if they could not have done idolatry: and expostors add, to beware not only of the act of idolatry, but also of all occasion of that act: which is plain against Mr. Hubberdin, and parson of Christ's church, who went about to prove, that now there could be no idolatry.

As touching the saints in heaven, I said, They be not our mediators by way of redemption: for so Christ alone is our Mediator and their's both: so that the blood of martyrs hath nothing to do by way of redemption: the blood of Christ is enough for a thousand worlds, &c.

But by way of intercession, so saints in heaven may be mediators, and pray for us, as I think they do, when we call not upon them; for they be charitable, and need no spurs, and we are not openly required of God in scripture to call upon them, as we are to call upon God, nor yet may we call upon them without any diffidence or mistrust in God; for God is more charitable, more merciful, more able, more ready to help than them all, so that though we may desire the saints in heaven to pray to God for us, yet it is not so necessary to be done, but that we may pray to God ourselves, without first making suit to them, and obtain of him whatsoever we need, if we continue in prayer; so that whatsoever we ask the Father in the name of Christ, his Son, the Father will give it us: for saints can give nothing without him, but he can without them, as he did give to them; scripture doth set saints that be departed before our eyes for our examples, so that the chiefest and most principal worship and honouring of them is to know their holy living, and to follow them, as they followed Christ, &c.

God biddeth us come to him with prayer, and to follow his advice is no presumption, it is rather presuming to leave it undone to do that which he biddeth us not do, &c. We must have saints in reverent memory, and learn of God's goodness towards them, to trust in God, and mark well their faith towards God and his word, their charity towards their neighbour, their patience in all adversity, and pray to God who gave them grace so to do, that we may do likewise, for such like doings we shall have like speedings, they be well honoured when God is well pleased; the saints were not saints by praying to saints, but by believing in him that made them saints: and as they were saints, so we may be saints; yea, there be many saints that never prayed to saints, and yet I deny not, but we may pray to saints, but rather to him who can make us saints who calleth us to him, biddeth us call upon him, promiseth help, cannot deceive us and break his promise; when we pray faithfully to him, we honour him, not after our own fantastical imagination, but even after his own wise ordinances, whom to honour is not to dishonour saints; therefore they lie that say, that I would not have saints to be honoured, &c.

There is no FIRE in HELL.

I Never knew a man that said so. I spake of divers opinions that have been written of the nature of that fire; some that it is a spiritual fire, or at least way a spiritual pain in the corporal fire; for as it is called a fire, so it is called a worm, but a spiritual and metaphorical worm, so they think of the fire. Some that it is a corporal and natural fire; some have thought diversly before the resurrection without the body, and after with the body; some that the soul without the body suffereth in the fire, but not of the fire; some both in and of the fire. The scholastic authors think, that the souls before the resurrection, because they be of spiritual substance, do not receive the heat of the fire into them, which is a sensible and corporal quality, so that Athanasius, a Greek author, calleth their pain Tristitiam, a heaviness or anguish; and this opinion is probable enough: some think, though they be always in pain, yet they be not always in fire; but go from waters of snow to exceeding heat; but it is when their bodies be there; but whether in cold or heat, in water or in fire, in air or in earth, they lack no pain, their torment goeth with them, for they think that the devils that tempt us, though they have pain with them, yet they have not fire with them, for then they should be known by the heat of the fire.

I am certain, saith St. Augustine, that there is a fire in hell, but what manner of fire, or in what part of the world, no man can tell but he that is of God's privy council: I would advise every man to be more careful to keep out of hell, than trust he shall find no fire in hell. Chrysostom saith, That to be deprived the fruition of the Godhead, is greater pain than being in hell: there is fire burning, there is heat, there is cold, there is pain without pleasure, torment without ease, anguish, heaviness, sorrow, and pensiveness, which tarrieth and abideth for all liars and hinderers of the truth.

There is no PURGATORY after this LIFE.

NOT for such liars as will bear me in hand to say that I said not; I shewed the state and condition of them that be in purgatory: then I denied it, not that they have charity in such surety that they cannot lose it, so that they cannot murmur against God, cannot dishonour God, can neither displease God, nor be displeased with God, cannot be dissevered from God, cannot die, nor be in peril of death, cannot be damned, nor be danger of damnation; cannot be but in surety of salvation; they be members of the mystical body of Christ as we be, and in more surety than we be: they love us charitably; charity is not idle, that is, it worketh and sheweth itself, and therefore I say, they wish us well, and pray for us; they need not cry loud to God, they be in Christ, and Christ in them, they be with Christ, and Christ with them, they joy with the Lord Christ always, taking thankfully whatsoever God doth with them, ever giving thanks to their Lord God, ever lauding and praising him in all things that he doth, discontent with nothing that he doth, &c.

And forasmuch as they be always in charity, and when they pray for us, they pray always in charity, and be always God's friends, God's children, brethren and sisters to our Saviour Christ, even in God's favour, even have Christ with them, to offer their prayer to the Father of heaven, to whom they pray in the name of the Son. And we many times for lack of charity, having malice, envy, rancour, and hatred one towards another, be the children of the devil, inheritors of hell, adversaries to Christ, hated of God, his angels, and all his saints; they in their state may do us more good with their prayers, than we in this state. And they do us always good, unless the lack and impediment be in us; for prayer said in charity is more fruitful to him that it is said for, and more acceptable to God, than said out of charity; for God looketh not to the work of praying, but to the heart of the prayer. We may well pray for them, and they much better for us, which they will do of their charity, though we desire them not.

I had rather be in purgatory than in the bishop of London's prison; for in this I might die bodily for lack of meat; in that I could not. In this I might die spiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counsel; in that I could not. In this I might be in extreme necessity, in that I could not, if extreme necessity be peril of perishing. And then you know what followeth, if we be not bounden by precept to help, but them that be in extreme necessity, we see not who needeth in purgatory, but we see who needeth in this world. And John saith, If thou see thy brother, and help him not, how is the charity of God in thee? Here, either we be, or we may be in extreme necessity, both in body and soul; in purgatory neither one nor other. Here we be bound to help one another, as we would be helped ourselves under pain of damnation. Here for lack of help, we may murmur and grudge against God, dishonour God, undo ourselves, which inconveniences shall not follow, if we do our duty to one another. I am sure the souls in purgatory be so charitable, and of charity so loth to have God dishonoured, that they would have nothing withdrawn from the poor here in this world, to be bestowed upon them which might occasion the dishonour of God, &c.

Therefore, howsoever we do for purgatory, let us provide to keep out of hell. And had I a thousand pounds to bestow, as long as I saw necessary occasion offered to me of God to dispense it upon my needy brother here in this world, according to God's commandment, I would not withdraw my duty from him for any provision of purgatory, purgatory, as long as I saw dangerous ways unrepaired, poor men's daughters unmarried, men beg for lack of work, sick and sore for lack of succour. I would have difference between that which may be done, and that which ought to be done, and this to go before that, and that to come after this. If God command one way, mine own devotion moveth me another way, which way should I go? I may by no trentals, no masses, no ladders of heaven, make a foundation for myself with other men's goods; goods wrongfully gotten must needs come again, must needs be restored to the owners, if they can be known, if not, they be poor men's goods: debts must needs be paid, creditors satisfied and content, God's ordinance towards my neighbour here in this world discharged, all affections and lusts moving to the contrary purged. Or else, though our soul-priests sing till they be blear-eyed, or say mass till they have worn their tongues to the stumps, neither their singings nor their sayings shall bring us out of hell, whither we shall go for contemning God's prohibitions.

He that purgeth all errors of false opinions, all unwillingness to do God's ordinance, provideth not for hell or purgatory. Purgatory's iniquity hath set aside restitutions, and brought poor christians to extreme beggary, replenished hell, and left heaven almost empty.

In Purgatory there is no pain

That can break their charity.
That can break their patience.
That can disserve them from Christ.
That can disserve Christ from them.
That can cause them to dishonour God.
That can cause them to displease God.
That can cause them to be displeased with God.
That can cause them to be discontent with God.
That can bring them to peril of death.
That can bring them to peril of damnation.
That can bring them to extreme necessity.
That can bring them from surety of salvation.

And yet it followeth not that there is no pain.

Howbeit, if the bishop's two fingers can shake away a good part, if a friar's cowl, or the pope's pardon, or Scala Coeli of a groat, can dispatch for all together, it is not so greatly to be cared for, I have not leisure to write at large, and I wrote before such things which in this haste come now to mind.

They that can reclaim at this, that the souls in purgatory do pray for us, if they could get as much money for the prayer, that the souls in purgatory say for us, as they have done for that that they have said for them, they would not reclaim: you know the wasp that doth sting them, and make them so swell, they that reclaim at that, do not reclaim at this, nor at this following.

Christ's blood is not sufficient without the blood of martyrs.

Magdalen did not know Christ to be God before his resurrection.

There can be no idolatry.

Rome cannot be destroyed.

The pope is lord of all the world.

Whatsoever he doeth is well done.

Pater Noster is to be said to St. Peter.

Pater Noster is but a beggarly prayer.

Ave Maria is infinitely better.

Twenty Ave Marias for one Pater Noster.

It was not necessary for scripture to be written.

He that leaveth father and mother maketh for our pilgrimage.

With many more.

Mr. LATIMER's LETTER to Mr. MORRICE, concerning the ARTICLES written, which were falsely laid against him.

RIGHT worshipful, and mine own good master Morrice, health in Christ Jesus. And I thank you for all hearty kindness, not only heretofore shewed unto me, but also that now of late you would vouchsafe to write unto me so poor a wretch, to my great comfort among all these my troubles. I trust and doubt nothing in it, but God will reward you for me, and abundantly supply mine inability, &c. Mr. Morrice, you would wonder to know how I have been treated at Bristol, I mean by some of the priests, who first desired me, welcomed me, made me cheer, heard what I said, and allowed my saying in all things while I was with them; when I was gone home to my benefice, perceiving that the people favoured me so greatly, and that the mayor had appointed me to preach at Easter, privily they procured an inhibition for all them that had not the bishop's license, which they knew well enough I had not, and so craftily defeated master mayor's appointment, pretending they were sorry for it, procuring also certain preachers to rail against me, as Hubberdin and Powel, with others, whom when I had brought before the mayor, and the wise council of the town, to know what they could lay to my charge, wherefore they so declaimed against me, they said they spake as they were informed: however no man could be brought forth that could stand to any thing: so that they had place and time to belie me shamefully, but they had no place or time to lay to my charge when I was present and ready to make them answer. God amend them, and assuage their malice, that they have against the truth and me, &c.

Our LADY was a SINNER.

SO they did belie me to have said, when I had said nothing so, but to reprove certain, both priests and beneficed men, which do give so much to our lady, as though she had not been saved by Christ, a whole Saviour, both of her, and of all that be, or shall be saved: I did reason after this manner, that either she was a sinner, or no sinner; if a sinner, then she was delivered from sin by Christ; so that he saved her, either by delivering or preserving her from sin, so that without him, neither she, nor none other, either be, or could be saved. And to avoid all offence, I shewed how it might be answered, both to certain scriptures, which maketh all generally sinners, and how it might be answered unto Chrysostom and Theophylact, which makes her namely and specially a sinner. But all would not serve, their malice was so great; notwithstanding that five hundred honest men can and will bear record. When they cannot reprove that thing that I do say, then will they belie me, to say that thing which they can reprove; for they will needs appear to be against me.

SAINTS are not to be WORSHIPPED.

SO they lied when I had shewn certain divers significations of this word (Saints) among the vulgar people: First, images of saints are called saints, and so they are not to be worshipped: take worshipping of them for praying to them; for they are neither mediators by way of redemption, nor yet by way of intercession. And yet they may be well used when they be applied to the uses for which they were ordained, to be laymen's books for remembrance of heavenly things, &c.

Take saints for inhabitants of heaven, and worshipping of them, for praying to them, I never denied, but that they might be worshipped, and be our mediators, though not by the way of redemption, (for so Christ alone is a whole Mediator, both for them and for us) yet by the way of intercession.

PILGRIMAGE.

AND I never denied pilgrimage. And yet I have said that much scurf must be pared away, ere ever it can be well done; superstition, idolatry, false faith, and trust in the image, unjust estimation of the thing; debts must be paid, restitution, made, wife and children must be provided for, duty to our neighbours discharged. And when it is at the best, before it be vowed, it need not be done, for it is neither under the command of God nor man to be done. And wives must advise with husbands, husbands, and husbands and wives with curates, before it be done.

AVE MARIA.

AS for Ave Maria, who can think that I would deny it? I said it was an heavenly greeting or saluting of our blessed lady, wherein the angel Gabriel, sent from the Father of heaven, did annunciate and shew unto her the good-will of God towards her, what he would with her, and to what he had chosen her. But I said it was not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noster, which our Saviour Christ himself made for a proper prayer, and bid us to say it for a prayer, not adding that we should say ten or twenty Aves or Marias withal: and I denied not but that we may well say Ave Marias also, but not so that we shall think that the Pater Noster is not good, a whole and perfect prayer, nor cannot be well said without Ave Maria; so that I did not speak against the well saying of it, but against superstitious saying of it, and of the Pater Noster too; and yet I put a difference betwixt that, and that which Christ made to be said for a prayer.

No FIRE in HELL.

WHO ever could say or think so? However, good authors do make a difference betwixt suffering in the fire with bodies, and without bodies. The soul without the body is a spiritual substance, which they say cannot receive a corporal quality, and some make it a spiritual fire, and some a corporal fire. And as it is called a fire, so it is called a worm, and it is thought of some not to be a material worm, that is, a living beast, but it is a metaphor, but that is nothing to the purpose; for a fire it is, a worm it is, pain it is, torment it is, anguish it is, a grief, a misery, a sorrow, a heaviness inexplicable, and intolerable, whose nature and condition in every point, who can tell, but he that is of God's privy council? saith St. Austin. God give us grace rather to be diligent to keep us out of it, than to be curious to discuss the property of it; for certain we be, that there is little ease, yea, none at all, but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, which be two effects of extreme pain, rather certain tokens what pain there is, than what manner of pain there is.

No PURGATORY.

HE that sheweth the state and condition of it, doth not deny it. But I had rather be in it than in Lollard's Tower, the bishop's prison, for divers reasons.

First, In this I might die bodily for lack of meat and drink; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might die spiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counsel; there I could not.

Item, In this I might be in extreme necessity; in that I could not, if it be peril of perishing.

Item, In this I might lack charity; there I could not.

Item, In this I might lose my patience; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be in danger of death; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be without surety of salvation; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might dishonour God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might murmur and grudge against God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might displease God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be displeased with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be judged to perpetual prison, as they call it; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be craftily handled; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be brought to bear a faggot; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be discontented with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be separated and dissevered from Christ; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be a member of the devil; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be an inheritor of hell; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might pray out of charity, and in vain; in that I could not.

Item, In this my lord and his chaplains might manacle me by night; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might strangle me, and say that I hanged myself; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might have me to the consistory, and judge me after their fashion; from thence they could not.

Therefore, I had rather to be there than here. For though the fire be called ever so hot, yet if the bishop's two fingers can shake away a piece, a friar's cowl another part, and Scali Coeli all together, I will never found abbey, college, nor chauntry, for that purpose.

For seeing there is no pain that can break my charity, break my patience, cause me to dishonour God, to displease God, to be displeased with God, cause me not to joy in God, nor that can bring me to danger of death, or to danger of desperation, or from surety of salvation, that can separate me from Christ, or Christ from me, I care the less for it. John Chrysostom saith, the greatest pain that damned souls have, is to be separate and cut off from Christ for ever; which pains the souls in purgatory neither have nor can have.

Consider, Mr. Morrice, whether provision for purgatory hath not brought thousands to hell. Debts have not been paid; restitution of evil-gotten lands and goods hath not been made; christian people (whose necessities we see, to whom whatsoever we do Christ reputeth done to himself, to whom we are bound under pain of damnation to do for, as we would be done for ourselves) are neglected and suffered to perish; last wills unfulfilled and broken; God's ordinance set aside: and also for purgatory, foundations have been taken for sufficient satisfaction; so we have trifled away the ordinances of God and restitutions. Thus we have gone to hell with masses, dirges, and ringing of many a bell. And who can pull pilgrimages from idolatry, and purge purgatory from robbery, but he shall be in peril to come in suspicion of heresy with them? So that they may fleece one with pilgrimage, and spoil with purgatory. And verily the abuse of them cannot be taken away, but great lucre and advantage shall fall away from them, who had rather have profit with abuse, than lack the same with use; and that is the wasp that doth sting them, and maketh them to swell. And if purgatory were purged of all that it hath gotten, by setting aside restitution, and robbing of Christ, it would be but a poor purgatory; so poor, that it should not be able to feed so fat, and trick up so many idle and slothful lubbers.

I take God to witness, I would hurt no man, but it grieveth me to see such abuse continue without remedy; I cannot understand what they mean by the pope's pardoning of purgatory, but by way of suffrage; and as for suffrage, unless he do his duty, and seek not his own, but Christ's glory, I had rather have the suffrage of Jack in the skultery, who in his calling doth exercise both faith and charity; but as for his mass, that is as good of another simple priest as of him. As for authority of keys, it is too loose from guiltiness of sin and eternal pain, due to the same, according to Christ's word, and not to his own private will: and as for pilgrimage, you would wonder what juggling there is to get money withal. I dwell within half a mile of the Foss-way, and you would wonder to see how they come by flocks out of the West-country to many images, but chiefly to the blood of the Hailes. And they believe verily that it is the very blood that was in Christ's body, shed upon the mount of Cavalry for our salvation, and that the sight of it with their bodily eye doth certify them, and putteth them out of doubt, but they be clean in life, and in a state of salvation without spot of sin, which doth embolden them to do many things. For you would wonder if you should commune with them both coming and going, what faith they have. For as for forgiving their enemies, and reconciling their christian brethren, they they cannot away withal; for the sight of that blood doth quit them for a time.

I read in scripture of two certifications; one to the Romans: "We being justified by faith have peace with God."

If I see the blood of Christ with the eye of my soul, that is true faith, that his blood was shed for me, &c.

Another in the epistle of St. John: We know that we are translated from death to life, because we love the brethren." But I read not that I have peace with God, or that I am translated from death to life, because I see with my bodily eye the blood of the Hailes. It is very probable, that all the blood that was in the body of Christ, was united and knit to his Divinity, and then no part thereof shall return to his corruption. And I marvel that Christ shall have two resurrections. And if it were that they did violently and injuriously pluck it out of his body when they scourged him and nailed him to the cross, did see it with their bodily eye, yet they were not in clean life. And we see the self-same blood in form of wine, when we have consecrated, and may both see it, feel it, and receive it to our damnation, as touching bodily receiving. And many do see it at Hailes without confession, as they say. God knoweth all, and the devil in our time is not dead.

Christ hath left a doctrine behind him, wherein we be taught how to believe, and what to believe; he doth suffer the devil to use his craftiness, for our trial and probation. It were little thank-worthy to believe well and rightly, if nothing should move us to false faith, and to believe superstitiously. It was not in vain that Christ, when he had taught truly, by and by said, Beware of false prophets, who would bring in error sily. But we be secure and careless as though false prophets could not meddle with us, and as if the warning of Christ were no more earnest and effectual, than is the warning of mothers when they trifle with their children, and bid them beware of the bugg, &c.

Lo, sir, how I run at riot beyond measure. When I began, I was minded to have written but half a dozen lines; but thus I forgot myself, whenever I write to a trusty friend, who will take in worth my folly, and keep it from mine enemy, &c.

As for Dr. Wilson, I know not what I should say; but I pray God endue him with charity. Neither he nor any of his country-men did ever love me, since I did inveigh against their factions, and partiality in Cambridge. Before that, who was more favoured of him than I? This is the bile that may not be touched, &c.

A certain friend shewed me, that Dr. Wilson is gone now into his country, about Beverly, in Holderness, and from thence he will go a journey through Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and from thence to Bristol. What he intendeth by this progress, God knoweth, and not I. If he come to Bristol, I shall hear, &c.

As for Hubberdin (no doubt) he is a man of no great learning, nor yet of stable wit. He is here Servus Hominum; for he will preach whatsoever the bishops will bid him preach. Verily in my mind they are more to be blamed than he. He doth magnify the pope more than enough. As for our Saviour Christ and christian kings, they are little beholden to him. No doubt he did miss the cushion in many things. However, they that did send him, men think, will defend him; I pray God amend him and them both. They would fain make matter against me, intending so either to deliver him by me, or else to rid us both together, and so they would think him well bestowed, &c.

As touching Dr. Powel, how highly he took upon him in Bristol, and how little he regarded the sword, which representeth the king's person, many can tell you. I think there is never an earl in this realm that knoweth his obedience by Christ's commandment to his prince, and knoweth what the sword doth signify, that would have taken upon him so stoutly. However Mr. Mayor, as he is a profound wise man, did flout him prettily; it were too long to write all. Our pilgrimages are not a little beholden to him, in favour of which he alledged this text: Whoever leaveth father, house, wife &c. By that you may perceive his hot zeal and crooked judgment, &c. Because I am so belied, I could wish that it would please the king's grace to command me to preach before his highness a whole year together every Sunday, that he himself might perceive how they belie me, saying, that I have neither learning nor utterance worthy thereunto, &c. I pray you pardon me, I cannot make an end.

A brief DIGRESSION concerning the RAILING of Mr. HUBBERDIN against Mr. LATIMER.

FORASMUCH as mention hath been made in this letter of Mr. Hubberdin, an old divine of Oxford, a right painted pharisee, and a great strayer abroad in all quarters of the realm, to deface and impeach the purity of God's holy gospel, something will be added more concerning that man, whose doings and pageants, if they might be described at large, it were as good as any interlude for the reader to behold. Who in all his life, and in all his actions (in one word to describe him) seemeth nothing else but a right image or a counterfeit, setting out unto us in lively colours the pattern of perfect hypocrisy. But because the man is now gone, to spare therefore the dead, (although he little deserved to be spared, who never spared to work what villainy he could against the true servants of the Lord) this shall be enough for example's sake, for all christian men necessarily to observe, how the said Hubberdin, after his long railing in all places against Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, John Frith, Tindal, Latimer, and all other like professors, after his hypocritical open alms given out of other men's purses, his long prayers, devout fallings, his mean habit, and other his prodigious demeanor, riding in his long gown down to the horse heels like a pharisee, or rather like a sloven dirted up to the horse's belly, after his forged tales and fables, dialogues, dreams, dancings, hoppings and leaping, with other player-like toys and gestures used in the pulpit, and all against heretics; at last riding by a church side, where the youth of the parish were dancing in the church-yard, he suddenly alighting from his horse, by the occasion of their dancing, came into the church, and there causing the bell to toll in the people, thought instead of a fit of mirth, to give them a sermon of dancing. In which sermon, after he had patched up certain common texts out of the scriptures, and then coming to the doctors, first to Augustine, then to Ambrose, so to Jerome and Gregory, Chrysostom, and other doctors, had made them every one (after his dialogue manner) by name to answer to his call, and to sing after his tune for the probation of the sacrament of the altar against John Frith, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Luther, Tindal, Latimer, and other heretics (as he called them): at last to shew a perfect harmony of all these doctors together, as he had made them before to sing after his tune, so now to make them dance also after his pipe, first he calleth out Christ and his apostles, then the doctors and ancient seniors of the church, as in a round ring all to dance together; with pipe up Hubberdin. Now dance Christ, now dance Peter, Paul, now dance Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome; and thus old Hubberdin, as he was dancing with his doctors lustily in the pulpit against the heretics, how he stamped and took on I cannot tell, but crash came the pulpit, down cometh the dancer, and there lay Hubberdin, not dancing, but sprawling in the midst of his audience; where although he brake not his neck, yet he brake so his leg at the same time, and bruised his old bones, that he never came in the pulpit more, and died not long after the same. Whereupon when the church-wardens were called, and charged for the pulpit not being stronger, they made answer again, excusing themselves that they had made their pulpit for preaching and not for dancing, &c. But to spend no more paper about this idle matter, now to our purpose again.

Amongst many other accusers and adversaries, whereof there was no small sort which did infect this good man in sermons, some also there were which attempted the pen against him. In the number of whom was one Dr. Sherwood, who upon the same occasion of preaching of the virgin Mary (or as they thought against the virgin) did invade him with his pen, writing against him in Latin, a long epistle, which Mr. Latimer answered, observing, "I have read your letter through carefully, but it is more worthy of the flames than of my perusal, it abounds so much with slanders. What you have truly said you shall soon see. It is now a great while ago since several persons, who heard the sermon preached at Marchfield, told me, you being present, suffered the person openly, and with authority, to say, that those were unworthy and miserable wretches who saluted the virgin mother of God with the angelic salutation, unless they could raise her up again that she might bear Christ."

L E T T E R

From Mr. LATIMER to Sir EDWARD BAYNTON, Knight.

RIGHT worshipful sir, I recommend myself unto you, with hearty thanks for your friendly, charitable, and mindful remembrance of so poor a wretch. Whereas of late I received your letters by Mr. Bonnam, and perceiving therein who are grieved with me, and what behoveth me to do in case I must needs come up, for which your goodness towards me, whereas I myself am not able to recompense, I shall not cease to pray to my Lord God, who is both able, and also doth indeed reward all them that favour the favourers of his truth for his sake; for the truth is a common thing, pertaining to every man, for which every man shall answer another day. And I desire favour neither of your mastership, nor of any man else, but in the truth and for the truth, I take God to witness, which knoweth all.

In very deed Mr. Chancellor did shew me, that my lord bishop of London had sent letters to him for me; and I made answer that he was mine ordinary, and that he might and should reform me as far as I needed reformation, as well and as soon as my lord of London. And I would be very loth (now this deep winter) being so weak and so feeble, (not only exercised with my old disease in my head and side, but also with new, both the cholic and stone) to take such a journey; and though he might so do, yet he needed not, for he was not bound so to do. Notwithstanding I said, if he, to do my lord of London pleasure, to my great displeasure, would needs command me to go, I would obey his command, yea, though it should be ever so great a grievance and painful to me. With which answer he was content, saying, he would certify my lord of London thereof, trusting his lordship would be content with the same.

Mr. Chancellor also said, that my lord of London seemed greatly displeased with me, because I contemned his authority at my last being in London. Forsooth, I preached in Abbey-church, not certain then (as I remember) whether in his diocese or no, intending nothing less than to contemn his authority; and this I did at the request of honest merchantmen, as they seemed to me, whose names I do not know, for they were not of my acquaintance before; and I am glad thereof for their sakes, lest if I knew them, I should be compelled to utter them so, and their good desire to hear godly preaching should turn to their trouble: for they required me very earnestly, and to say the truth, very importunately. Whether they were of that parish or no, I was not certain: but they shewed not only themselves, but also many others, to be very desirous to hear me, pretending great hunger and thirst of the word of God, and spiritual doctrine. And upon consideration, and to avoid all inconveniences, I put them off, and refused them twice or thrice, till at last they brought me word, that the parson and curate were not only content, but also desired me: notwithstanding that they certified him both of my name plainly, and also that I had not the bishop's seal to shew for me, but only a license of the university: which curate did receive me, welcomed me, and when I should go into the pulpit, gave me the common benediction; so that I had been not only uncharitable, but also churlishly uncharitable, if I should have said nay. Now all this supposed to be truth, (as it is) I marvel greatly how my lord of London can alledge any contempt of him in me.

First, He did never inhibit me in my life; and if he did inhibit his curate to receive me, what pertained that to me, who did neither know thereof, nor yet made any suit to the curate deceitfully; nor did it appear to me very likely, that the curate would so little have regarded my lord's inhibition, which he maintaineth so vigilantly, not knowing my lord's mind before. Therefore I conjectured with myself, that either the curate was of such acquaintance with my lord, that he might admit whom he would; or else (and rather) that it was a train and a trap laid before me, to the intent that my lord himself, or some pertaining to him, appointed to have been there, and to have taken me if they could in my sermon; which conjecture both occasioned me somewhat to suspect those men which desired me, though they spake ever so fair and friendly, and also rather to go. For I preach nothing, but if it might be so, I would my lord himself might hear me every sermon I preach. So certain I am, that it is truth which I take in hand to preach. If I had with power in my friends (the curate gainsaying and withstanding me) presumed to have gone into the pulpit, there had been something wherefore to pretend a contempt. I preached in Kent also, at the earnest request of a curate; yet I do not hear that his ordinary layeth any contempt to my charge, or yet doth trouble the curate.

I marvel not a little how my lord bishop of London, having so large and populous a diocese committed to his charge, can have leisure for preaching and teaching the word of God, opportunely and pressingly, in season and out of season, publicly and privately, to his own flock, in persuading, confuting, exhorting, and admonishing with all mildness and doctrine, have leisure (I say) either to trouble me, or to trouble himself with me, so poor a wretch; a stranger to him, and nothing pertaining to his cure, but as every man pertaineth to every man's cure, so intermixing and intermeddling himself with another man's cure, as though he had nothing to do in his own. If I would do as some men say my lord doth, gather up riches warily and covetously, and yet neither preach for it in mine own cure, nor elsewhere, peradventure he would deny me nothing. In the very deed I did admonish both judges, and ordinaries, to use charitable equity in their judgments towards such as be accused, namely of such accusers, who be as like to hear and betray, as others be to say amiss, and to take men's words in the meaning thereof, and not to wrest them in another sense than they were spoken in: for all such accusers and witnesses do evil before God, as St. Jerome saith, upon the 26th chapter of St. Matthew. Nor yet do I account those judges well advised, who wittingly will give sentence after such witnesses, much less those who procure such witnesses against any man; nor do I think judges now-a-days so deeply confirmed in grace, or so impeccable, but that it may become preachers to admonish them to do well, as well as other men both great and small. And this I did, occasioned of the epistle which I declared, Rom. vi. wherein is this sentence: Ye are not under the law but under grace: ye christian men that believe in Christ, are not under the law. What a saying is this, (says I) if it be not rightly understood, that is, as St. Paul did understand it? for the words sound as though he would go about to occasion christian men to break the law, seeing they be not under the law: and what if pseudo-apostles, adversaries to St. Paul, would have so taken them, and accused St. Paul to my lord of London? If my said lord would have heard St. Paul declare his own mind of his own words, then he should have escaped, and the false apostles put to rebuke; if he would have rigorously followed whatsoever was alledged and proved, and have given sentence after relation of the accusers, then good St. Paul must have borne a faggot at Paul's Cross, my lord of London being his judge. O, it had have been a godly sight to have seen St. Paul with a faggot on his back, even at Paul's Cross, my lord of London, bishop of the same, sitting under the cross. Nay, verily I dare say, my lord would sooner have burned him, for St. Paul did not mean that christian men might break the law, and do whatsoever they would, because they were not under the law: but he did mean, that christian men might keep the law, and fulfil the law, if they would, because they were not under the law, but under Christ, by whom they were divided from the tyranny of the law, and above the law, that is to say, able to fulfil the law, to the pleasure of him that made the law, which they could never do of their own strength, and without Christ: so that to be under the law, after St. Peter's meaning, is to be weak to satisfy the law; and what could St. Paul do with all, though his adversaries would so take it? But peradventure my lord would say, that men will not take the preacher's words otherwise than they mean therein. Well said; as though St. Paul's words were not otherwise taken, as it appeareth in the third chapter of the Romans, where he saith, Our unrighteousness commendeth and maketh more excellent the righteousness of God, which soundeth to many as though they should be evil, that good should come of it, and by unrighteousness to make the righteousness of God more excellent. So that St. Paul was reported to mean: yet he did mean nothing so, but shewed the inestimable wisdom of God, who can use our naughtiness to the manifestation of his unspeakable goodness; not that we should do naughtily to that end and purpose.

Now I think it were no reproach to my lord, but very commendable, rather to joy with St. Paul, and be glad that Christ be preached, in whatever manner, yea, though it were for envy, that is to say, in disdain, despight, and contempt of his lordship, (which thing no man well advised will attempt) than when the preaching cannot be reprov'd justly, to demand of the preacher austerely, as the pharisees did of Christ, By what authority do you these things, and who gave you this authority? As my authority is good enough, and as good as any my lord can give me, yet I would be glad to have his also, if it would please his lordship to be so good unto me. As for my preaching itself, I trust in God, my lord of London cannot justly blame, nor reprove it; if it be taken with the circumstance thereof, and as I spake it, or else it is not my preaching, but his that falsely reporteth it, as the poet Martial said, to one that depraved his book,

To me ('tis true) you say those lines belong,
But they're your own, whilst you repeat them wrong.

I have thought in times past, that the pope could have spoiled purgatory at his pleasure with a word of his mouth; now learning might persuade me otherwise, or else I would marvel why he should suffer so much money to be bestowed that way, which is so needful to be bestowed otherwise, and to deprive us of so many patrons in heaven as he might deliver out of purgatory, &c. I have thought in times past, that if I had been a friar, and in a cowl, I could not have been damned, nor afraid of death, and by occasion of the same I have been minded many times to have been a friar, namely, when I was sore sick, and diseased: now I abhor my superstitious foolishness, &c. I have thought in times past, that divers images of saints could have helped me, and done me much good, and delivered me of my diseases: now I know that one can help as well as another. And it grieves my heart that my lord, and such as my lord is, can suffer the people to be so craftily deceived. It were too long to tell you what blindness I have been in, and how long it was ere I could forsake such folly, it was so incorporated in me: but by continual prayer, continual study of scripture, and oft communing with men of more right judgment, God hath delivered me, &c. Yea, men think my lord himself hath thought in times past, that by God's law a man might marry his brother's wife, which now both dare think and say the contrary; and yet this his boldness might have chanced, in pope Julius's days, to stand him either in a fire, or else in a faggot. Which thing deeply considered and pondered by my lord, might something stir him to charitable equity, and to be something remiss towards men, which labour to do good as their power serveth with knowledge, and do hurt to no man with their ignorance: for there is no greater distance than between God's law, and not God's law.

L E T T E R

From Sir EDWARD BAYNTON, Knight, in Answer to BISHOP LATIMER.

MASTER LATIMER, after hearty recommendations, I have communicated the effect of your letters to divers of my friends, such as for christian charity (as they say) rather desire in you a reformation, either in your opinion (if it swerve from the truth), or at least in your manner of behaviour, inasmuch as it giveth occasion of slander and trouble, to the hindrance of your good purposes, than any other inconvenience to your person or good name. And forasmuch as your said letter misliketh them in some part, and that I have such confidence in your christian breast, as in my judgment you will conformably and gladly both hear what may be reformed in you, and also (as it is worthy) so acknowledge and confess the same: I have therefore desired them to take the pains to note their mind in this letter which I send to you, as the sum of their sayings, and sent from me your assured friend and favourer, in that that is the very truth of God's word: wherein nevertheless, as I trust you will temper your own judgment, and in soberness affirm no truth of yourself, which should divide the unity of the congregation in Christ, and the received truth agreed upon by holy fathers of the church, consonant to the scripture of God, even so whatsoever you will do therein, (as I think you will not do otherwise than you should do) I being unlearned, and not of the knowledge to give sentence in this altercation and contention, must rather of good congruence shew myself in that you disagree with them, readier to follow their doctrine in truth than your's, unless it may please Almighty God to inspire and confirm the hearts of such people to testify the same in some honest number, as ought to induce me to give credence unto them.

Only God knoweth the certain truth, which is communicated to us, as our capacity may understand it by faith, but that is through a glass darkly. And there have been those who have had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. Among whom I repute not you, but to this purpose I write it, that to call this or that truth; it requireth a deep and profound knowledge, considering that to me unlearned, what I take for truth may be otherwise, not having a sense exercised enough, as St. Paul saith, to discern good and evil: and it is shewed me, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which causeth dissention in a christian congregation, is not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epistle, where he saith, All who confess that Christ is come in the flesh, &c. are of God. And like as the word of God hath always caused dissention among men unchristened, whereupon hath ensued and followed martyrdom to the preacher; so in Christ's congregation, among them that profess Christ's name in one Lord, one baptism, and one faith, they that preach and stir rather contention than charity, though they can defend their saying, yet their teaching is not to be taken as of God, in that it breaketh the chain of christian charity, and maketh division in the people, congregate and called by God into an unity of faith and baptism. But for this point I would pray to God, that not only in the truth may be agreement, but also such soberness and uniform behaviour used in teaching and preaching, as men may wholly express (as they may) the charity of God, tending only to the union and love of us all, to the profit and salvation of our souls.

EDWARD BAYNTON.

From BISHOP LATIMER, in Answer to SIR EDWARD BAYNTON.

RIGHT worshipful sir, and my singular good master, &c. Whereas you have communicated my last letters to some of your friends, which rather desire this or that in me, &c. what I think therein I will not now say; not that there could be any peril or danger in the said letters (well taken) as far as I can judge, but for that they were rashly and unadvisedly scribbled, as you might well know both by my excuse, and by themselves also, though no excuse had been made.

But as to my presumption and arrogancy; either I am certain or uncertain that it is truth that I preach. If it be truth, why may I not say so, to encourage my hearers to receive the same more ardently, and pursue it more studiously? if it be uncertain, why dare I be so bold as to preach it? And if your friends, in whom you trust so greatly, be preachers themselves, after their sermon, I pray you ask them whether they be certain and sure that they have taught you the truth or no, and send me word what they say, that I may learn to speak after them. If they say they be sure, you know what followeth; if they say they be unsure, when shall you be sure, that have so doubtful and unsure teachers? And you yourself, whether are you certain or uncertain that Christ is your Saviour, and so forth of other articles that you are bound to believe? Or whether are you sure or unsure, that civil ordinances are the good works of God, and that you do God service in doing of them, if you do them for a good intent? If you are uncertain, take heed he is your sure friend that heareth you say so, and then with what conscience do you doubt, seeing, Whatsoever is not of faith is sin? But contrary say you, God alone knoweth certain truth, and you have it but through a glass darkly; and there are some who have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge: and to call this or that truth, it requireth a deep knowledge, considering that to you unlearned, what you take for truth may be otherwise, not having a sense exercised to discern good and evil, as you reason against me, and so you do best to know surely nothing for truth at all, but to wander meekly here and there, with every wind of doctrine, &c. Our knowledge here, you say, is but through a glass darkly: what then? Therefore, it is not certain and sure.

I deny your argument by your leave; yea, if it be by faith, as you say, it is more sure, because the certainty of faith is the surest certainty, as Duns and other school-doctors say: that there is a great disagreement between certain knowledge and clear knowledge, for that may be of things absent that appear not, this requireth the presence of the object, I mean of the thing known; so that I certainly and surely know the thing which I perfectly believe, though I do not clearly and evidently know it. I know your school subtleties as well as you, which dispute as though enigmatical knowledge, that is to say, dark and obscure knowledge, might not be certain and sure knowledge, because it is not clear, manifest, and evident knowledge; and yet there have been (say they) which have had a zeal, but not after knowledge. True it is there have been such, and yet are too many to the great hindrance of Christ's glory, which nothing doth more obscure, than a hot zeal accompanied with great authority without right judgment.

And such manner of arguments might well serve the devil against cowards, to occasion them to wander and waver in the faith, and to be uncertain in things in which they ought to be certain: or else it may appear to make and serve against such preachers as will define great subtleties and high matters in the pulpit, which no man can be certain and sure of by God's word to be truth, unless a man had a superlative sense to discern good and evil; as whether, if Adam had not sinned, we should have had stock-fish out of Iceland; how many larks for a penny if every star in the element were a flickering hobby: how many years a man shall lie in purgatory for one sin, if he buy not plenty of the oil that runneth over our lamps to flake the sin with, and so forget hell which cannot be flaked, to provide for purgatory.

Such argumentation (I say) might appear to make well against such preachers, not against me, which simply and plainly utter true faith and the fruits of the same, which be the good works of God, which he hath prepared for us to walk in, every man to do the thing that pertaineth to his office and duty in his degree and calling, as the word appointeth; which thing a man may do with soberness, having a sense but indifferently exercised to discern good and evil. For it is but foolish humility, willingly to continue always an infant in Christ and in infirmity. In reproof of which it was said, Ye have need of milk and not of strong meat. For St. Paul saith not, Be ye humble, that ye be not deceived. For though he would not that we should think arrogantly of ourselves, and above what it becometh us to think of ourselves, but so to think of ourselves that we may be sober and modest; yet he biddeth us so to think of ourselves, as God hath distributed to every one the measure of faith. For he that may not with meekness think in himself what God hath done for him, and of himself as God hath done for him, how shall he, or when shall he give due thanks to God for his gifts? And if your friends will not allow the same, I pray you enquire of them whether they may with sobriety and modesty follow St. Paul's advice, where he saith unto us all, Be not children in understanding, but in maliciousness be ye infants. God give us all grace to keep the mean, and to think of ourselves neither too high nor too low, but so that we may restore unto him who hath sent abroad his gifts again, with good use of the same, so that we do our part with the same, to the glory of God, Amen.

For my life, I trust in God that I neither (by God's grace) shall, neither in soberness, nor yet in drunkenness, affirm any truth of myself, therewith intending to divide that unity of the congregation of Christ, and the received truth agreed upon by the holy fathers of the church, consonant to the scripture of God, though it be shewed you ever so often, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which causeth dissention in a christian congregation is not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epistle, where he saith, Every one that confesseth Christ in the flesh, is of God. First, Not every thing whereupon followeth dissention, causeth dissention, as I would that they shewed you, that would also shew you, whether this opinion, that a man may not marry his brother's wife, be of God or of men; if it be of men, then as Gamaliel said, dissolve it; if it be of God, as I think it is, and perchance your friends also, who can dissolve it, but shall seem to repugn against God.

The Galatians having for preachers and teachers the false apostles, by whose teaching they were degenerate from the sweet liberty of the gospel into the four bond of ceremonies, thought themselves, peradventure, a christian congregation, when St. Paul did write his epistle unto them, and were in a quiet trade under the dominion of masterly curates, so that the false apostles might might have objected to St. Paul, that his apostleship was not of God, forasmuch as there was a dissention in a christian congregation by occasion thereof, whilst some would renew their opinions by the occasion of the epistle, some would judge, as they were wont to do, and follow their great lords and masters the false apostles, which were not heathen and unchristened, but christened and high prelates of the professors of Christ. For your friends, I know right well what Erasmus hath said in an epistle set before the pharisees of the first epistle to the Corinthians, which Erasmus hath caused no small dissention with his pen in a christian congregation, inasmuch as many have dissented from him, not only in cloisters (men more than christened men) of high perfection, but also at Paul's Cross, and St. Mary Spittle, besides many that with no small zeal have written against him, but not without answer.

And I would fain learn of your friends, whether St. Jerome's writings were of God, which caused dissention in a christian congregation, as it appeareth by his own words in the prologue before the canonical epistles, which be these: And whilst that you, Eustochium, virgin of Christ, inquire so earnestly of me the truth of the scripture, you seem in some measure to put off my old age, corroded with teeth and bites of the envious, who style me a falsiter and corrupter of scriptures; but I am not affrighted at their envy in such a work, nor will deny the truth of the scriptures to those that require it. I pray you, what were they that called St. Jerome a falsiter and corrupter of scripture, and for envy would have bitten him with their teeth; unchristian or christian? What had the unchristian to do with the christian doctrine? They were worshipful fathers of a christian congregation, men of much hotter stomachs than right judgments, of a greater authority than good charity. But St. Jerome would not cease to do good for the evil speaking of them that were naught, giving in that an example to us of the same: and if this dissention were in St. Jerome's time, what may be in our time? From ill to worse.

And I pray you what mean your friends by a christian congregation? All those (think you) that have been baptized? But many of those be in a worse condition, and shall have greater damnation than many unbaptized. For it is not enough to a christian congregation that it is of God, to have been baptized: but it is to be considered what we promise when we are baptized, to renounce Satan, his works, his pomps. Which things if we busy not ourselves to do, let us not boast that we profess Christ's name in a christian congregation.

And where they add, in one Lord; I read in Mat. xvii. Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, &c. And in Luke, the Lord himself complaineth and rebuketh such professors and confessors, saying to them, Why call ye me Lord, and do not that I bid you? But I would your friends would take the pains to read over Chrysostom upon Matt. Hom. xlix. cap. xxiv. to learn to know a christian congregation, if it will please them to learn of him. And where they add, in one faith, St. James saith boldly, Shew me thy faith by thy works. And St. Jerome, if we believe, we shew the truth in working. And the scripture saith, He that believeth God, attendeth to his commandments. And the devils do believe to their little comfort. I pray God to save you and your friend, from that believing congregation, and from that faithful company.

I do marvel why our christian congregations be so greatly grieved that lay-people would read the scripture, seeing that St. Jerome alloweth and approveth of the same, which compareth not here the unchristened to the christened, but the lay-people christened to their curates christened, under which they have been rocked and locked asleep in a subtle trade a great while full soundly, though now of late they have been awaked, but to their pain, at least to the pain of those that awakened them with the word of God; and it is properly said of St. Jerome to call themselves masters and not servants, meaning that servants teach not their own doctrine, but the doctrine of their master Christ, to his glory: Masters teach not Christ's doctrine, but their own, to their own glory; which matterly curates cannot be quiet, till they have brought the people asleep again: but Christ the very true master saith, Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.

And where your friends think that I made a lie, when I said, that I have thought in times past that the pope had been lord of the world, though your friends are much better learned than I, yet I am sure that they know not what either I think or have thought better than I, according to that, No man knoweth the things of a man, &c. as though better men than I have not thought so, as Bonifacius Octavus (as I remember) the great learned man John of the Burnt Tower, Presbyter Cardinalis in his book where he proveth the pope to be above the council general and special; and where he saith that the pope is king of kings, and lord of lords, and that he is the true lord of the whole world by good right, although in fact he is not so; and that Constantine did but restore his own unto him when he gave unto him Rome; so that, as St. John saith Christ did, He came unto his own, and his own received him not; and yet I hear not that any of our christian congregations have declaimed against him, until now of late dissention began: Who be your friends I cannot tell; but I wish you would desire them to be my good masters, and if they will do me no good, at least do me no harm; and though they can do you more good than I, yet I am sure I would be as loth to hurt you as they, either with mine own opinions, manner of preaching, or writing.

And as for the pope's high dominion over all, there is one Raphael Maruphus in London, an Italian, and in past times a merchant of dispensations, which I suppose would die in the quarrel, as God's true knight and true martyr. As touching purgatory, and worshipping of saints, I shewed to you my mind before my ordinary: and yet I marvelled something, that after private communication had with him, you would (as it were) adjure me to open my mind before him, not giving me warning before, saying I cannot interpret your evil doings towards me; and yet neither my ordinary nor you disallowed the thing that I said, and I looked not to escape better than Dr. Crome: but when I have opened my mind ever so much, yet I shall be reported to deny my preaching, by them that have belied it, as he was: I shall have need of great patience to bear the false report of the malignant church.

Sir, I had just made an end of this scribbling, and was beginning to transcribe it more correctly, but there came a man of my lord of Farley's, with a citation to appear before my lord of London in haste, to be punished for such excesses as I committed at my last being there, so that I could not perform my purpose; I doubt whether you can read it as it is. If you can, well be it; if not, I pray you send it me again, and that so do, whether you can read it or not.

The Ungodly and Erroneous SAYING contained in an ENGLISH WORK, inscribed, An EXPOSITION upon the 7th Chapter of the First EPISTLE to the CORINTHIANS.

WHOSOEVER in himself doth not feel this godly thing, this gift of chastity, but doth feel incontinency, to him, I say, a commandment is given that he may be married.

Hereof doth follow, that no person may make a vow, or promise to live chaste or single, and that none are bound to keep any such vows, but rather to break them: and he that shall observe them, it is damnable, and by the law of God already condemned.

The touching of women, some persons have compassed too straightly, so that they dare not touch a woman's hand or skin; moreover they imagined many, both statutes and ceremonies, to keep them from company of women, as they thought that built abbies, but how fortunately that hath come to pass, what place thereby thereby hath been given to Satan, it were horrible to be spoken of.

He that is compelled outwardly to abstain from women, and is inwardly full of lust, is a dissembler, and it is double lechery.

Mark what soul-slayers they be that provoke foolish youth to a vow of chastity, compelling them to nourish inwardly hidden malice.

All other evils may be suffered with a mean conscience.

This cannot so be endured, this can be helped by no medicine but by marriage.

It is good for a man not to touch a woman; this word good is not understood of merit and deserving before God, as though an unmarried man were better before him, than the married, like as St. Jerome hath expounded this text; for it concerneth only faith, and no deed or work, but it is spoken of temporal quietness of this life, so that the virgin and maid hath much more joy and tranquillity.

Chastity is a good thing, if lust and incontineny make it not so common a thing as we have hitherto used to do, and yet do, but all amiss; but the apostle willeth, that all men universally be conjugal: but all the bishops since his time have destroyed this godly ordinance, when they babble and rail in pulpits, changing this word every into certain.

Men ought to stint of their statutes-making, for a better statute can none be than this, that men without any respect of time use their wife, not to exempt certain days as they have which they call vigils, and women conceived.

Fasting is a measurable usage of meats and drinks; prayer is a crying, sighing, desiring, and mourning.

No man ought to enforce and compel men to fasting and prayer, as they hitherto by laws have done.

Before God, all things are alike and equal.

Abominably they do sin who make nuns swell in pride, when they babble, that their religion is more precious than matrimony, and then feign that they shall have a crown or garland of gold, so making them arrogant, wicked, unfaithful; chastity is a gift of God, and therefore can no man neither promise, nor vow, nor keep it.

The sects of all them that are called religious, and of all manner of shavelings, are falsely called the spiritual orders: for matrimony like as in very deed, so it ought to be called the spiritual state before other orders worldly and secular; matrimony is of all other the highest religion, and most spiritual estate.

By testimony of scriptures, all the apostles and all the bishops' successors were married.

St. Paul saith, That he ought to be chosen to be a bishop, that is the husband of one wife.

Seeing you chuse not married men to be bishops, either Christ must be a fool and unrighteous, who did not so chuse, or you Antichrists and deceivers.

You put away universal marriage from priests, contrary unto God, to nature, to reason, to right, only of presumption, without any manner of cause.

There is no sin nor mischief in all the world so great, that can hinder a man from priest-hood, but godly matrimony.

What other thing is it to say, that a priest should not marry, than to say, that a man should not be a man?

This I dare be bold to say, that where one is chaste, there ought to be more than an hundred thousand to live married.

To keep a young man in a cloister to live chaste, is as much as to offer a child to Moloch there to be burnt.

All which great errors and pestilent heresies being contagious and damnable, with all the books containing the same, with the translation of scripture corrupted by William Tindal, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, and all other books in English containing such errors were in the reign of king Henry VIII, 1531, by the advice and assent of the prelates and clerks, as well of the universities, as of all other assembled together, determined utterly to be repelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to be suffered to go abroad among his subjects: and his highness further willed that his pleasure and determination should be notified by preachers abroad unto the people, as well for putting away of all such books, as reading, retaining, or having hereafter of any other like, delivering unto certain preachers the form of a writing to be published in effect unto the people in their sermons, whereof the form here followeth, willing them in all his realm to publish the same.

The BILL in ENGLISH, to be published by the PREACHER.

IT is the office and duty of every preacher and teacher of the word of God, not only to shew and declare unto his audience that which might be profitable and wholesome for the wealth of their souls, to be followed and taken, but also to note and signify unto them such things as may be dangerous and contagious, to the intent they might be avoided and eschewed, and also as near as they can judge who be teachers and authors of the same; this example we have of our Saviour Christ where he saith, Beware of false prophets, &c. St. Paul likewise many times giveth warning to such as he wrote unto, that they should beware of the false apostles, that in his absence went about to corrupt the doctrine that he had taught them being present. Wherefore considering that it hath pleased the king's highness, like a noble and a virtuous prince, tendering not only the present bodily wealth and tranquillity of all his subjects, for his and their worldly benefit and advantage, but most chiefly regarding the wealth of their souls and their due order towards God, thereby to deserve and attain immortal glory, to assemble and call together the chief personages of his prelates, and a great number of learned men of both universities, charging and commanding them for the discharge and exoneration of his conscience, to find, read, examine and discuss, the contents of such books as are now spread abroad within this his grace's realm in the English tongue, concerning the points and articles of our faith, and after their learning and conscience to make relation unto his highness, whether the same books be expedient and profitable for his people, to the direction and ordering of their conscience and soul, or else contagious and pestiferous for the same: and whether the opinions contained in them, were agreeable to God's word and doctrine or no, soasmuch as the said congregation and assembly had free liberty and licence granted unto every man to say as his conscience and learning served him, without any reproof or blame to be imputed, or arrested for any thing to be spoken there, whose person soever it touched, or any necessity to agree to the greater part, but only to say that his own learning and conscience could maintain and justify; after mature deliberation and consultation had, it was there, by a whole consent, no man repugning or gain-saying, determined and agreed that the books now being abroad in the English tongue contain false traditions and corrupt doctrine, far different from the true sense of the gospel and catholic understanding of the scripture, only persuading pernicious heresies to the destruction of the souls of good christian men, and that the certainty hereof, I can report unto you of mine own knowledge, being one of the said assembly, and hearing and seeing the said opinions read, declared and examined, and by the true sense and meaning of God's learning reprov'd and rejected: I think therefore my duty is, taking upon me the office of preacher, following the example of our master Christ and St. Paul, as is aforesaid, to warn and admonish you by the words of Christ, as I spake before; Beware of false prophets, &c. and take heed yourself that you be not infected by the contagion and infection of such false apostles, as have in our English tongue set forth books to seduce you from the true knowledge of God's laws, and bring you by their false interpretations of scripture into detestable and abominable heresies, to the destruction destruction of our souls: wherefore you that have the books called, The obedience of a christian man; The sum of scripture; The revelation of Antichrist; The supplication of beggars; The mammon of unrighteousness; The matrimony of Tindal; The New Testament in English, of the translation which is now printed, and such other books in English, the authors whereof either dare not, or do not put to their names, be pernicious books: detest them, abhor them, keep them not in your hands, deliver them to the superiors such as call for them: and if by reading them heretofore, any thing remaineth in your breasts of that teaching, either forget it, or by information of the truth expel and purge it, to the intent that you being so purified and cleansed of that contagious doctrine and pestiferous traditions, may be fit and apt to receive and retain the true doctrine and understanding of Christ's laws, to the comfort and edification of your souls; thus I move and exhort you in God to do, this is your duty to do.

The prelates of the church having the cure and charge of your souls ought to compel you, and your prince to punish and correct your not doing of the same, unto whom, as St. Paul saith, the sword is given by God's ordinance for that purpose: you shall also farther understand that the king's highness, soasmuch as it was reported unto him that there is engendered in divers of his subjects, an opinion, that it is his grace's duty to cause the scripture of God to be translated into the English tongue to be communicated unto the people, and that the prelates and also his highness, do wrong in hindering of the same, his highness willed therefore every man there present in the said assembly, freely and frankly to shew and open unto him what might be proved, and conferred by scripture, and holy doctors in that behalf, to the intent that his highness (as he there openly protested) might conform himself thereunto, minding to do his duty towards his people, as he would they should do their duties towards him: in which matter, after the scripture declared, holy doctors and authors alledged and read, and all things said, which might be on both sides, and for both parts spoken, deduced, and brought forth, finally it appeared, that the having of the whole scripture in English, is not necessary to christian men; but that without having any such scripture, endeavouring themselves to do well, and to apply their minds to take and follow such lessons as the preacher teacheth them, and so learned by his mouth, may as well edify spiritually in their souls, as if they had the same scriptures in English. And like as the having the scriptures in the vulgar tongue, and in the common people's hands, hath been by both holy fathers of the church heretofore in some times thought meet and convenient, so at another time it hath been thought to holy fathers not expedient to be communicated amongst them; wherein soasmuch as the king's highness, by the advice and deliberation of his council, and the agreement of the great learned men, thinketh in his conscience, that the divulging of the scripture at this time in the English tongue, to be committed to the people, considering such pestilent books, and such evil opinions, as be now spread amongst them, should rather be to their further confusion and destruction, than the edification of their souls, and that as holy doctors testify, upon such-like considerations, the same hath been done in times past, it was thought there in that assembly to all and singular in that congregation, that the king's highness and prelates, in so doing and not suffering the scripture to be divulged and communicated in the English tongue unto the people, at this time doth well. And also I think and judge the same, exhorting and moving you, that in consideration his highness did there openly say and protest that he would cause the New Testament to be, by learned men, faithfully and purely translated into the English tongue, to the intent that he might have it in his hands ready to be given to his people, as he might see their manners and behaviour meet, apt, and convenient to receive the same, that you will so detest those pernicious books, so abhor these heresies and new opinions, so decline from arrogancy of knowledge and understanding of scripture after your fancies, and shew yourself in cunning and reasoning, so sober, quiet, meek, and temperate, as all fear of misusing the gift of scripture taken away, you may appear such in your prince's eyes, and eyes of your prelates, as they shall have no just cause to fear any such danger; persuading unto yourself in the mean time, without grudging or murmuring, the very truth, which is this, that we cannot require or demand scripture to be divulged in the English tongue, otherwise than upon the discretion of our superiors, so as whensoever they think in their conscience it may do you good, they may and do well to give it unto you: and whensoever it shall be seen otherwise unto them, they do amiss in suffering you to have it. O stand upon which decree, order, and determination above recited, his gracious highness being in person in the chapel, called the old chapel, which sometime was called St. Edward's chamber, sat on the east side of the parliament chamber, within his grace's palace at Westminster, upon the 24th day of May in the year of our Lord God 1530, and in the two and twentieth year of his reign, called before his grace the three notaries hereunder written, and then and there in the presence of all the personages there assembled and gathered together, willed and required the said three notaries to make public and authentic instruments, and us to set thereunto our seal accordingly in and for witness, and perpetual memory and monument of this his grace's desire, order, and determination, and of all and singular the premises, and all the personages then and there being present, to testify the same, and bear record and testimony thereupon: in witness of all and singular the premises, We William. archbishop, primate and legate, aforesaid, have commanded and obtained these present letters testimonial, or present public or authentic instrument, containing therein the order, decree, and determination aforesaid, to be made and to be subscribed, and consigned by the hands of the notaries hereafter named, and to be sealed with our own seal. All which premises have been done in manner and form above specified, then and there being present the noble personage of Thomas Moor, knight, great chancellor of England; our reverend brother in Christ, Cuthbert, by the permission of God, bishop of Durham; and worshipful personages, Mr. Stephen Gardiner, secretary; Mr. Richard Samson, dean of the chapel, doctor of law; Mr. Richard Wolman, master of the requests; Mr. John Bell, counsellor, doctors of holy decrees; Mr. Nicholas Wilson, the king's counsellor, Mr. Richard Duck, archdeacon of Wiltshire, doctors of divinity; Mr. John Oliver, Mr. Edmund Steward, doctors of the law, chaplains to our sovereign lord the king's grace; Mr. Richard Mawdley, Mr. William Mortimer, Mr. Edward Crome, Mr. Edward Wiggin, doctors also of divinity; Mr. Robert Carter, Mr. Edward Leighton, Mr. Hugh Latimer, and Roger Tilson, masters of arts in both the universities aforesaid, with many more learned men of both universities, in a great number assembled then and there together, witness to the premises required and exhibited. These being premised, now let us see the answer of bishop Latimer again to this aforesaid proposal or instrument of the bishops, in a letter which the said Latimer wrote to king Henry the same time in that behalf.

Here followeth a letter of bishop Latimer's written to king Henry the eighth upon this occasion. You heard before of two proclamations set out by the bishops in the name of king Henry, one in the year 1531, and the other in the year 1546; in which proclamations, being authorized by the king's name, were inhibited all English books, either containing or tending to any matter of the scripture. Where also we have expressed a catalogue of some of the errors which the said bishops have falsely picked out, and maliciously imputed to godly writers. Now bishop Latimer growing in some favour with the king, and seeing the great decay of Christ's religion by reason of these two proclamations, and touched therefore with the zeal of conscience, directed unto king Henry this letter here ensuing, thereby intending by all means possible, to persuade the king's mind to set open again the freedom of God's holy word amongst his subjects. The copy of which lettere followeth.

L E T T E R

From BISHOP LATIMER to KING HENRY the EIGHTH, for restoring again of the free LIBERTY of Reading the HOLY SCRIPTURES.

To the most mighty Prince, King of England, HENRY the Eighth, Grace, Mercy, and Peace, from GOD the FATHER, by our Lord JESUS CHRIST.

THE holy doctor St. Augustine, in an epistle which he wrote to Casalanus, saith, That he which for fear of any power hideth the truth, provoketh the wrath of God to come upon him, for he feareth men more than God. And according to the same, the holy man St. John Chrysostom saith, that he is not only a traitor to the truth, which openly for truth teacheth a lie; but he also which doth not freely pronounce and shew the truth that he knoweth. These sentences (most redoubted king) when I read now of late, and marked them earnestly in the inward parts of mine heart, they made me sore afraid, troubled and vexed me grievously in my conscience, and at last drove me to this strait, that either I must shew forth such things as I have read and learned in scripture, or else be of that sort that provoke the wrath of God upon them, and be traitors unto the truth: which thing, rather than it should happen, I had rather suffer extreme punishment.

For what other thing is it to be a stranger unto the truth, than to be a traitor and a Judas unto Christ, who is the very truth, and cause of all truth? Who saith that whosoever denieth him before men, he will deny him before his Father in heaven. Which denying ought more to be feared and dreaded, than the loss of all temporal goods, honour, promotion, fame, prison, slander, hurts, banishments, and all manner of torments and cruelties, yea and death itself, be it ever so painful and shameful. But alas? how little do men regard those sharp sayings of these two holy men? And how little do they fear the terrible judgment of Almighty God! And especially they which boast themselves to be guides and captains unto others, and challenging unto themselves the knowledge of holy scripture, yet will neither shew the truth themselves, (as they be bound) or suffer them that would. So that unto them it may be said, that which our Saviour Christ said to the pharisees; Matth. xiii. Woe be unto you, scribes and pharisees, who shut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and neither will you enter in yourselves, neither suffer them that would to enter in. And they will, as much as in them lieth, debar not only the word of God, which David calleth a light to direct and shew every man how to order his affections and lusts, according to the commandments of God, but also by their subtil wiliness they instruct, move, and provoke in a manner, all kings in Christendom, to aid, succour, and help them in this their mischief: and especially in this your realm they have so blinded your liege people and subjects with their laws, customs, ceremonies, and Banbury glosses, and punished them with curfings, excommunications, and other corruptions (corrections I would say) and now at the last, when they see they cannot prevail against the open truth (which the more it is persecuted, the more it increaseth by their tyranny) they have made it treason to your noble grace, to have the scripture in English.

Here I beseech your grace to pardon me a while, and patiently to hear me a word or two; yea, though it be so that as concerning your high majesty and regal power, whereunto Almighty God hath called your grace, there is as great difference between you and me, as between God and man: for you be here to me and to all your subjects, in God's stead, to defend, aid, and succour us in our right, and so I should tremble and quake to speak to your grace. But again, as concerning that you be a mortal man, in danger of sin, having in you the corrupt nature of Adam, in which we are all both conceived and born: so have you no less need of the merits of Christ's passion for your salvation, than I and other of your subjects have, which be all members of the mystical body of Christ. And though you be an higher member, yet you must not disdain the lesser. For as St. Paul saith, Those members that are taken to be most vile, and had in least reputation, be as necessary as the other, for the preservation and keeping of the body. This, most gracious king, when I considered, and also your favourable and gentle nature, I was bold to write this rude, homely, and simple letter to your grace, trusting that you will accept my true and faithful mind, even as it is.

First, I will exhort your grace to mark the life and process of our Saviour Christ, and his apostles, in preaching and setting forth of the gospel; and to note also the words of our master Christ, which he said to his disciples when he sent them forth to preach his gospel, and to these have ever in your mind the golden rule of our Saviour Christ. The tree is known by it's fruit. For by the diligent marking of these, your grace shall clearly know and perceive who are the true followers of Christ, and teachers of his gospel, and who are not. And concerning the first, all scripture sheweth plainly that our Saviour Jesus Christ's life was very poor.

Begin at his birth, and I beseech you, who ever heard of a poorer, or so poor as he was? It were too tedious to write how poor Joseph and the blessed virgin Mary took their journey from Nazareth toward Bethlehem, in the cold and frosty winter, having nobody to wait upon them, but he both master and man, and she both mistress and maid. How vilely, thinks your grace, were they treated in the inns and lodgings by the way? and in how vile and abject a place was this poor maid, the mother of our Saviour Jesus Christ, brought to bed, without company, light, or any other thing necessary for a woman in that condition? Was not here a poor beginning, as concerning this world? Yes truly. And according to this beginning was the process and end of his life in this world, and yet he might by his godly power have had all the goods and treasures of this world at his pleasure when and where he would.

But this he did to shew us, that his followers and vicars should not regard and set by the riches and treasures of this world, but after the saying of David we ought to take them, which saith thus; If riches, promotions, and dignity happen to a man, let him not set his affiance, pleasure, trust, and heart upon them. So that it is not against the poverty in spirit, which Christ preacheth in the gospel of St. Matthew, chap. v to be rich, to be in dignity and in honour, so that their hearts be not fixed and set upon them so much, that they neither care for God nor good men. But they be enemies to this poverty in spirit, have they ever so little, that have greedy and desirous minds to the goods of this world, only because they would live after their own pleasures and lusts. And they also be private enemies (and so much the worse) which have professed, as they say, wilful poverty, and will not be called worldly men, as they have lord's lands, and king's riches; yea, rather than they would lose one jot of that which they have, they will set debate between king and king, realm and realm, yea, between the king and his subjects, and cause rebellion against the temporal power, to which our Saviour Christ himself was obedient, and paid tribute as the gospel declareth; unto whom the holy apostle St. Paul teacheth every christian man to obey. Yea, and beside all this, they will curse and censure, as much as in them lieth, even into the deep pit of hell, all that gainsay their appetite, whereby they think their goods, promotions, or dignities should decay.

Your grace may see what means and craft the spirituality (as they will be called) imagine, to break and withstand the acts which were made in your grace's last parliament against their superfluities. Wherefore they that thus do, your grace may know them not to be true followers of Christ. And although I named the spirituality to be corrupt with this unthrifty ambition; yet I mean not all to be faulty therein, for there be some good of them. Neither will I that your grace should take away the goods due to the church, but take away all evil persons from their goods, and set better in their stead.

I name nor appoint no person nor persons, but remit your grace to the rule of our Saviour Christ, as in Matthew the 7th chapter, By their fruits you shall know them. As touching the words that our Saviour Christ spake to his disciples when he sent them to preach his gospel, they be read in Matthew, the fifteenth chapter, where he sheweth, That here they shall be hated and despised of all men worldly, and brought before kings and rulers, and that all evil should be said of them for their preaching sake; but he exhorteth them to take patiently such persecution by his own example, saying, It cometh not the servant to be above his master. And seeing they call me Belzebub, what marvel is it if they call you devilish persons and heretics. Read the fourteenth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, and there your grace shall see that he promised to the true preachers no worldly promotions or dignity, but persecution and all kinds of punishment, and that they should be betrayed even by their own brethren and children. In John also he saith, In the world ye shall have oppression, and the world shall hate you; but in me you shall have peace. And in the tenth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, saith our Saviour Christ also, Lo I send you forth as sheep, among wolves. So that the true preachers go like sheep, harmless, and be persecuted, and yet they revenge not their wrongs, but remit all to God; so far is it off that they will persecute any other but with the word of God only, which is their weapon. And so this is the most evident token that our Saviour Jesus Christ would that his gospel and the preachers of it should be known by, that it should be despised among those worldly wise men, and that they should repute it but foolishness and deceivable doctrine, and the true preachers should be persecuted and hated, and driven from town to town, yea, and at the last lose both goods and life.

And yet they that did this persecution, should think that they did well, and a great pleasure to God. And the apostles remembering this lesson of our Saviour Christ, were content to suffer such persecutions, as you may read in the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles. But we never read that they ever persecuted any man. The holy apostle St. Paul saith, That every man that will live godly in Christ Jesus, should suffer persecution. And also he saith further, in the epistle to the Philippians, in the first chapter, That is not only given to you to believe in the Lord, but also to suffer persecution for his sake.

Wherefore take this for a sure conclusion, that there where the word of God is truly preached, there is persecution, as well of the hearers, as of the teachers; and where is quietness and rest in worldly pleasure, there is not the truth. For the world loveth all that are contrary to it. And, to be short, St. Paul calleth the gospel the word of the cross, that word of punishment. And the holy scripture doth promise nothing to the favourers and followers of it in this world, but trouble, vexation and persecution, which these worldly men cannot suffer, nor away withal.

Therefore pleaseth it your good grace, to return to this golden rule of our master and only Saviour Jesus Christ, which is this, By their fruits you shall know them. For where you see persecution, there is the gospel, and there is the truth: and they that do persecute, be void without all truth; not caring for the clear light, which (as our Saviour Jesus Christ saith, in the third chapter of St. John's gospel) is come into the world, and which shall utter and shew forth every man's works. And they whose works be naught, dare not come to this light, but go about to stop and hinder it, endeavouring to prevent, as much as possible, the reading of the holy scripture in our mother tongue, saying, that it would cause heresy and insurrection, and so they persuade, at least they would fain persuade your grace to keep it back. But here mark their shameless boldness, who be not ashamed, contrary to Christ's doctrine, to gather figs of thorns, and grapes of thistles, and to call light darkness and darkness light, sweet bitter and bitter sweet, good evil and evil good; and to say, that that which teacheth all obedience should cause dissention and strife; but such is their belly-wisdom, wherewith they judge and measure every thing, to hold and keep still this wicked mammon, the goods of this world, which is their god, and hath so blinded the eyes of their hearts that they cannot see the clear light of the sacred scripture, though they babble ever so much of it.

But, as concerning this matter, other men have shewed your grace their minds, how necessary it is to have the scripture in English. Which thing also your grace hath promised by your last proclamation: which promise I pray God that your gracious highness may shortly perform, even to-day before to-morrow. Nor let the wickedness of these worldly men detain you from your godly purpose and promise. Remember the subtle worldly wise counsellors of Hanun the son of Naas; king of the Ammonites, whom, when David sent his servants to comfort the young king for the death of his father, by crafty imaginations counselled Hanun, not only not to receive them gently, but to treat them most shamefully and cruelly, saying, "That they came not to comfort him, but to espy and search his land, so that afterward, they bringing David word how every thing stood, David might come and conquer it. And he caused the young king to shear their heads, and to cut their coats by the points, and sent them away like fools; whom he ought rather to have made much of, and to have treated them gently, and have given them great thanks and rewards: O wretched counsellors. But see what followed of this carnal and worldly wisdom: truly nothing but destruction of all the whole realm, and also of them that took their parts.

Therefore, good king, seeing that the right David, that is to say our saviour Christ, hath sent his servants, that is to say, his true preachers, and his own word also to comfort our weak and sick souls, let not these worldly men make your grace believe, that they will cause insurrections and heresies, and such mischiefs as they imagine of their own mad brains, lest that he be avenged upon you and your realm, as was David upon the Ammonites, and as he hath ever been avenged upon them which have obstinately withstood and gainsaid his word. But peradventure they will lay this against me, and say that experience doth shew, how that such men as call themselves followers of the gospel, regard not your grace's commandment, neither obey your proclamation; and that was well proved by those persons which of late were punished in London for keeping such books as your grace had prohibited by proclamation: and so like as they regarded not this, so they will not regard or esteem other your grace's laws, statutes, or ordinances. But this is but a crafty persuasion. For your grace knoweth, that there is no man living, especially that loveth worldly promotion, that is so foolish to set forth, promote, or advance his enemies, whereby he should be hindered of his worldly pleasures and fleshly desires; but rather he will seek all the ways possible that he can, utterly to confound, destroy, and put him out of the way. And so as concerning your last proclamation, prohibiting such books, the very true cause of it, and chief counsellors (as men say, and of likelihood it should be) were they whose evil living and cloaked hypocrisy these books uttered and disclosed. And howbeit that there were three or four that would have had the scripture to go forth in English, yet it happened there, as it is always seen, that the most part overcometh the better, and so it might be that these men did not take this proclamation as your's, but as their's set forth in your name, as they have done many times more, which hath put this your realm in great hindrance and trouble, and brought it in great penury; and more would have done, if God had not mercifully provided to bring your grace to knowledge of the falsehood and privy treason, which their head and captain was about: and be you sure not without adherents, if the matter be duly searched. For what marvel is it, that they being so nigh of your counsel, and so familiar with your lords, should provoke both your grace and them to prohibit these books, which before by their own authority have forbidden the New Testament under pain of everlasting damnation: for such is their manner to send a thousand men to hell, ere they send one one to God, and yet the New Testament (and so I think by the other) was meekly offered to every man that would and could, to amend it, if there were any fault.

Moreover, I will ask them the cause of all insurrections, which have heretofore been in this realm. And whence is it that there be so many extortioners, bribers, murderers, and thieves, which daily do not only break your grace's laws, ordinances, and statutes, but also the laws and commandments of Almighty God? I think they will not say these books, but rather their pardons, which cause many a man to sin in trust of them. For as for those malefactors which I now rehearsed, you shall not find one among a hundred, but he will cry out, both of these books, and also of them that have them, yea and will be glad to spend the goods which he hath wrongfully gotten, upon faggots, to burn both the books, and them that have them.

And as touching these men that were lately punished for these books, there is no man, I hear say, that can lay any word or deed against them that should sound to the breaking of any of your grace's laws, this only except, if it be your's, and not rather their's. And be it so that there be some that have these books, that be evil, unruly, and self-willed persons, not regarding God's laws, nor man's, yet these books be not the cause thereof, no more than was the bodily presence of Christ and his words the cause that Judas fell, but their own froward mind and carnal wit, which should be amended by the virtuous example of living of their curates, and by the true exposition of the scripture. If the lay-people had such curates that would thus do their office, neither these books, nor the devil himself, could hurt or put them out of order, so that the lack of good curates is the destruction and cause of all mischief. Neither do I write these things because that I will either excuse these men lately punished, or to affirm all to be true written in these books, which I have not all read, but to shew that there cannot such inconvenience follow of them, and especially of the scripture, as they would make men believe should follow.

And though it be so that your grace may by other books, and namely by the scripture itself, know and perceive the hypocrite wolves clad in sheep's cloathing, yet I think myself bound in conscience to utter unto your grace such things as God puts in my mind to write. And this I do (God so judge me,) not for hate of any person or persons living, nor for that I think the word of God should go forth without persecution, if your grace had commanded that every man within your realm should have it in his mother's tongue. For the gospel must needs have persecution unto the time that it be preached throughout all the world, which is the last sign that Christ shewed to his disciples should come before the day of judgment; so that if your grace had once commanded that the scripture should be put forth, the devil would set forth some wile or other to persecute the truth. But my purpose is, for the love that I have to God principally, and the glory of his name, which is only known by his word, and for the true allegiance that I owe unto your grace, and not to hide in the ground of my heart the talent given me by God, and to chaffer it forth to others, that it may increase to the pleasure of God, to exhort your grace to avoid and beware of these mischievous flatterers, and their abominable ways and counsels.

And take heed whose counsels your grace doth take in this matter; for there be some that for fear of losing of their worldly worship and honour, will not leave off their opinion, which rashly, and that to please men withal by whom they had great promotion, they took upon them to defend by writing, so that now they think that all their felicity which they put in this life should be marred, and their wisdom not so greatly regarded, if that which they have so slanderously oppressed should be now put forth and allowed. But alas, let these men remember St. Paul, how fervent he was against the truth (and that of a good zeal) before he was called;

he thought no shame to suffer punishment and great persecutions for that which before he despised and called heresy. And I am sure that their living is not more perfect than St. Paul's was, as concerning the outward works of the law, before he was converted.

Also the king and prophet David was not ashamed to forsake his good intent in building of the temple, after that the prophet Nathan had shewed him that it was not the pleasure of God that he should build any house for him; and notwithstanding that Nathan had before allowed and praised the purpose of David, yet he was not ashamed to revoke and eat his words again, when he knew that they were not according to God's will and pleasure.

Wherefore they be fore drowned in worldly wisdom, that think it against their worship to acknowledge their ignorance; whom I pray to God that your grace may espy, and take heed of their worldly wisdom, which is foolishness before God, that you may do what God commandeth, and not what seemeth good in your own sight without the word of God, that your grace may be found acceptable in his sight, and one of the members of his church; and according to the office that he hath called your grace unto, you may be found a faithful minister of his gifts, and not a defender of his faith, for he will not have it defended by man or man's power, but by his word only, by which he hath evermore defended it, and that by a way far above man's power or reason, as all the stories of the Bible make mention.

Wherefore, gracious king, remember yourself, have pity upon your soul, and think that the day is even at hand when you shall give account of your office, and of the blood that hath been shed with your sword. In which day that your grace may stand stedfastly, and not be ashamed, but be clear and ready in your reckoning, and to have, as they say, your discharge sealed with the blood of our Saviour Christ, which only serveth at that day, is my daily prayer to him that suffered death for our sins, who also prayeth to his Father for grace for us continually. To whom be all honour and praise for ever, Amen. The Spirit of God preserve your grace.

December 1, 1530.

In this letter of Bishop Latimer to the king above prefixed, many things we have to consider: First, his good conscience to God, his good will to the king, the duty of a right pastor unto truth, his tender care to the commonwealth, and especially to the church of Christ. Further, we have to consider the abuse of prince's courts, how kings may be abused with flatterers and wicked counsellors about them; and especially we may note the subtle practices of prelates, in abusing the name and authority of kings, to set forth their own malignant proceedings. We may see moreover, and rather marvel at in the said letter, the great boldness and divine stoutness in this man, who as yet being no bishop, so freely and plainly without any fear of death, adventuring his own life to discharge his conscience, durst so boldly, to so mighty a prince, in such a dangerous case, against the king's law and proclamation set out in such a terrible time, take upon him to write, and to admonish that which no counsellor durst so much as once mention unto him in defence of Christ's gospel. Whose example, if the bishops and prelates of this realm, for their parts likewise, in like cases would follow (as indeed they ought to do), it is very probable that many things would not be so out of frame as they be.

Finally, this moreover in the said letter is to be noted, how blessedly Almighty God wrought with his faithful servant's bold adventure, and wholesome counsel, though it did not prevail through the iniquity of the time, yet God so wrought with his servant in doing his duty, that no danger, nor yet displeasure rose to him thereby, but rather thanks and good will of the prince; for not long after the same he was advanced by the king to the bishopric of Worcester, as is above declared.

Seeing bishop Latimer was so bold and plain with the king (as is before specified) no great marvel if he did use the like freedom and plainness towards other meaner persons, in admonishing them of their disorder, especially if any such occasion were given, where truth and equity required his defence against injury and oppression. Accordingly he wrote another letter to a certain justice of the peace in Warwickshire, who as he is long since departed, so he shall be here unnamed.

In this epistle, which is very long, he says, Ah, master N. what manner of man do you shew yourself to be? or what manner of conscience do you shew yourself to have? For, first, as touching your brother, you know well that sir Thomas Coking, with a letter of his own hand writing, hath witnessed unto your brother's agreement; which letter he sent to me unsealed, and I shewed the same to my neighbour, and others before I sealed it, and perchance have a copy of the same yet to shew. With what conscience then can you say that I shall never be able to prove it? Shall not three men upon their oaths make a sufficient proof, think you? The Lord himself says, in the mouth of two or three, &c. Yea, you think it true, I dare say, in your conscience, if you have any conscience, though I were in my grave, and so unable to prove any thing. As for the two tenants, they be as they be, and I trust to see them handled according as they be; for there be three men yet alive, that dare swear upon a book, that they both did agree. But what should we look for at such men's hands, when you yourself play the part you do? But God is yet alive, and seeth all, and judgeth justly.

Worthy justices having ever the fear and dread of God before their eyes, (of which sort we have fewer amongst us than I wish we had) will have no respect at all in their judgments and proceedings, to vicinity of blood, but altogether to the worth and justice of the cause, judging that to be just which is so in the sight of God, though not of men; of which number I pray God make you one. He is just that doth justice. But he that sinneth (as they all do which do unjustly for favour and pleasure of men) is of the devil, faith he, of which sort all our partaking and natural justices be with all their partiality and naturalty. Wherefore it would be right and just that as many as be such justices, be justly deprived of their offices, and further also to be punished, according to the quantity or quality of their crime, so that by that means they may be cut off, as men born and bred to the hurt and detriment of the common-wealth, which trouble us when they ought to help us, Amen.

During the time that Bishop Latimer was prisoner at Oxford, we read not much of what he did write, besides his conference with Dr. Ridley, and his protestation at the time of his disputation. There are very few or none of letters to his friends abroad, save these few lines, which he sent to one Mrs. Wilkinson of London, a pious woman, and afterwards an exile for the gospel's sake.

From Mr. HUGH LATIMER to Mrs. WILKINSON, Widow, in London.

IF the gift of a pot of water shall not be in oblivion with God, how can God forget your manifold and bountiful gifts, when he shall say to you, I was in prison and you visited me? God grant us all to do and suffer while we are here, as may be to his will and pleasure, Amen.

Your's in Bocardo,

HUGH LATIMER.

Touching the memorable actions of this worthy man, among many others this is not to be neglected, what a bold enterprize he attempted, in sending to king Henry a present, the manner whereof is this. There was then, and remaineth still an old custom received from the old Romans, that upon New-year's day, being the first day of January, every bishop with some handsome new-year's gift should gratify the king; and so they did, some with gold, some with silver, some with a purse full of money, and some one thing, some another: but bishop Latimer being then bishop of Worcester, among the rest, presented a New Testament for his new-year's gift, with a napkin having this posy about it, Fornicators and adulterers God will judge.

And thus hast thou (gentle reader) the whole life, both of Dr. Ridley and bishop Latimer, two worthy fathers in the church of Christ, their writings, disputations, sufferings, their painful travels, and faithful preachings, studious service in Christ's church, their patient imprisonment, and constant fortitude in that which they had taught, with all their proceedings from time to time, since their first springing years to this present month of queen Mary, being the month of October, Anno 1555. In which month they were brought forth together, to their final examination and execution. Wherefore as we have heretofore declared both their lives severally and distinctly one from another; so now jointly to couple them both together, as they were both together joined in one society or cause of martyrdom, we will, by the grace of Christ, prosecute the rest that remaineth concerning their last examination, degrading and constant suffering, with the order and manner also of the commissioners, and what were their words, their objections, their orations there used, and what again were the answers of those men to the same, as in the process here followeth to be seen.

The ORDER and MANNER of the EXAMINATION of Dr. RIDLEY, and BISHOP LATIMER, in Sept. 1555.

FIRST, after the appearing of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, before the pope's delegate, and the queen's commissioners in St. Mary's church at Oxford, about the 12th of September, whereof more shall be said (by God's grace) when we come to the death of the said archbishop; shortly after, on the 28th of the said month, another commission was sent down to Oxford from cardinal Poole, to John White, bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, and Dr. Holyman, bishop of Bristol. The contents and virtue of which commission was, that the said bishops of Lincoln, Gloucester, and Bristol, or two of them, should have full power and authority to cite, examine and judge, Mr. Hugh Latimer and Dr. Ridley, for divers and sundry erroneous opinions, which the said Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley did hold and maintain in open disputations had in Oxford, in the months of May, June, and July, in the year 1554, as long before in the time of perdition, and since. Which opinions, if the named persons would now recant, giving and yielding themselves to the determination of the universal and catholic church planted by Peter in the blessed see of Rome, that then the deputed judges, by the said authority of their commission, should have power to receive the said penitent persons, and forthwith administer unto them the reconciliation of the holy father the pope; but if the said Hugh Latimer, and Nicholas Ridley, would stoutly and stubbornly maintain these their erroneous opinions and assertions, that then the said lords by their commission should proceed in form of judgment, according to the law of heretics; that is, degrading them from their promotion and dignity of bishops, priests, and all other ecclesiastical orders, should pronounce them as heretics, and therefore clean cut them off from the church, and so yield them to receive punishments due to all such heresy and schism.

Wherefore the last of September the said two persons, Nicholas Ridley and Hugh Latimer, were cited to appear before the said lords in the divinity school at Oxford at eight of the clock. At which time the lords repaired thither, placing themselves in the high seat made for public lectures and disputations, according to the usage of that school, being then fair set and trimmed with cloth of tissue, and cushions of velvet: and after the said lords were placed and set, the said Latimer and Ridley were sent for. And first Dr. Ridley appeared, and by and by bishop Latimer. But because it seemed good feverally to examine them, bishop Latimer was kept back until Dr. Ridley was thoroughly examined. Therefore soon after the coming of Dr. Ridley into the school, the commission was published by an appointed notary, and openly read. But Dr. Ridley standing bareheaded, humbly expecting the cause of that his appearance, as soon as he had heard the cardinal named, and the pope's holiness, put on his cap. Wherefore after the commission was published, the bishop of London spake as followeth.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, although neither I, nor yet my lords here, in respect of our own persons do look for cap or knee, yet because we bear and represent such persons as we do, that is, my lord cardinal's grace, legate a latere to the pope's holiness, as well in that he is of a noble parentage (and there Dr. Ridley moved his cap with lowly obeisance) descending from the royal blood, as in that he is a man worthy to be revered with all humility, for his great knowledge and learning, noble virtues and godly life, and especially in that he is here in England deputy to the pope's holiness, it should have become you at this name to have uncovered your head. Wherefore except you will of your ownself take the pains to put your hand to your head, and at the nomination, as well of the said cardinal, as of the pope's holiness, uncover the same, lest that this your contumacy, exhibited now before us, should be prejudicial to the said most reverend persons, (which thing we may in no case suffer) you shall cause us to take the pains to oblige some man to pluck off your cap from you. To whom Dr. Ridley (desiring licence) answered:

Ridley. As touching what you said, my lord, that you of your own persons desire no cap or knee, but only require the same in consideration that you represent the cardinal's grace's person, I would have you know, and thereupon make my protestation, that I did put on my cap at the naming of the cardinal's grace, neither for any contumacy that I bear towards your own persons, neither for any derogation of honour towards the lord cardinal's grace. For I know him to be a man worthy of all humility, reverence and honour, in that he came of the most regal blood, and in that he is a man endued with manifold graces of learning and virtue; and as touching these virtues and points, I, with all humility (therewith he put off his cap, and bowed his knee) and obeisance that I may, will reverence and honour his grace; but in that he is legate to the bishop of Rome (and therewith put on his cap) whose usurped supremacy and abused authority I utterly refuse and renounce, I may in no wise give any obeisance or honour unto him, lest that my so doing might be prejudicial to mine oath, and a derogation to the verity of God's word: and therefore that I might not only by confession profess the verity, in not reverencing the renounced authority, contrary to God's word, but also in gesture, in behaviour, and all my doings, express the same, I have put on my cap, and for this consideration only, and not for any contumacy to your lordships, neither contempt of this worshipful audience, neither derogation of any honour due to the cardinal's grace, both for his noble parentage, and also his excellent qualities, I have kept on my cap.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, you excuse yourself of that with which we pressed you not, in that you protest you keep on your cap, neither for any contumacy towards us (who look for no such homage from you) neither for any contempt of this audience: which although justly they may, yet (as I suppose) in this case do not require any such obeisance of you, neither in derogation of any honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, for his regal descent (at which word Dr. Ridley moved his cap) and excellent qualities; for although in all the premises honour be due, yet in these respects we require none of you, but only in that my lord cardinal's grace is here in England, deputy of the pope's holiness (at which word the lords and others put off their caps, and Dr. Ridley put on his) and therefore we say unto you the second time, that except you take the pains yourself, to put your hand to your head, and put off your cap, you shall put us to the pains to cause some man to take it from you, except you alledge some infirmity and sickness, or other more reasonable cause, upon the consideration whereof we may do as we think good.

Ridley. The premises I said only for this end, that it might as well appear to your lordships, as to this worshipful audience, why and for what consideration I used such kind of behaviour, in not humbling myself to your lordships with cap and knee: and as for my sickness, I thank my Lord God, that I am as well at ease as I have been this long time; and therefore I do not pretend that which is not, but only this, that it might appear by this my behaviour, that I acknowledge in no point that usurped supremacy of Rome, and therefore condemn and utterly despise all authority coming from him. In taking off my cap, do as it shall please your lordships, and I shall be content.

Then the bishop of Lincoln, after the third admonition, commanded one of the beaules (that is, an officer of the university) to pluck his cap from his head; Dr. Ridley bowing his head to the officer, gently permitted him to take it away.

After this, the bishop of Lincoln, in a long oration, exhorted Dr. Ridley to recant, and submit himself to the universal faith of Christ, in this manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, I am sure you have sufficiently pondered with yourself the effect of this our commission with good advice, considering both points thereof, how that authority is given to us, if you shall receive the true doctrine of the church, which first was founded by Peter at Rome immediately after the death of Christ, and from him by lineal succession hath been brought to this our time, if you will be content to renounce your former errors, recant your heretical and seditious opinions, content to yield yourself to the undoubted faith and truth of the gospel, received and always taught by the catholic and apostolic church, which the king and queen, all the nobles of this realm, and commons of the same, all christian people have and do confess, you only standing alone by yourself: you understand and perceive, I am sure, that authority is given to us to receive you, to reconcile you, and upon due penance to join and associate you again into the number of the catholics and Christ's church, from which you have so long strayed, without which no man can be saved; which thing I and my lords here, yea, and all, as well nobles and commons of this realm, most heartily desire, and I, for my part, (here he put off his cap) most earnestly exhort you to do.

Remember, Mr. Ridley, it is no strange country whither I exhort you to return. You were once one of us, you have taken degrees in the school. You were made a priest, and became a preacher, setting forth the same doctrine which we now do. You were made bishop according to our laws; and, to be short, it is not so long ago since you separated yourself from us, and in the time of heresy, became a setter forth of that devilish and seditious doctrine which in these latter days was preached amongst us. For at what time the new doctrine of only faith began to spring, the council, willing to win my lord chancellor, sent you to him (I then being in my lord's house, unknown, as I suppose, to you); and after you had talked with my lord secretly, and were departed, immediately my lord declared certain points of your talk, and means of your persuasion, and amongst others this was one, that you should say, Tush, my lord, this matter of justification is but a trifle, let us not stick to condescend herein to them; but for God's love, my lord, stand stoutly in the verity of the sacrament: for I see they will assault thee also. If this be true, (as my lord is a man credible enough in such a matter) hereby it is declared of what mind you were then, as touching the blessed sacrament.

Also in a sermon of your's at Paul's Cross, you as effectually and catholicly spake of that blessed sacrament as any man might have done, whereby it appeareth that is no strange thing, nor unknown place whereunto I exhort you. I wish you to return thither from whence you came, that is, with us to acknowledge the church of God, wherein no man may err, to acknowledge the supremacy of our most reverend father in God the pope's holiness, which (as I said) lineally taketh his descent from Peter, upon whom Christ promised before his death, to build his church; which supremacy or prerogative the most ancient fathers in all ages, in all times did acknowledge: and here he brought a place or two out of the doctors, but especially fixed upon a place of St. Augustine, who writeth after this manner: All the christian countries beyond the sea are subject to the church of Rome. Here you see, Mr. Ridley, that all Christendom is subject to the church of Rome. What should hinder you therefore to confesse the same as St. Augustine and other fathers?

Then Dr. Ridley desired his patience to suffer him to speak somewhat of the premises, lest the multitude of things might confound his memory; and having leave granted him, he said in this manner:

Ridley. My lord, I most heartily thank your lordship, as well for your gentleness, as also for your sobriety in talk, and for your good and favourable zeal in this learned exhortation, in which I have marked especially three points, which you used to persuade me to leave my doctrine and religion, which I perfectly know and am thoroughly persuaded to be grounded, not upon man's imaginations and decrees, but upon the infallible truth of Christ's gospel, and not to look back and to return to the Romish see, contrary to mine oath, contrary to the prerogative and crown of this realm, and especially (which moveth me most) contrary to the expresse word of God.

The first point in this, that the see of Rome taking his beginning from Peter, upon whom you say Christ hath built his church, hath in all ages, lineally from bishop to bishop, been brought to this time.

Secondly, That even the holy fathers from time to time have confessed the same.

Thirdly, That in that I was once of the same opinion, and together with you I did acknowledge the same.

First, As touching the saying of Christ, from whence your lordship gathereth the foundation of the church upon Peter, truly the place is not to be understood as you take it, as the circumstance of the place will declare. For after that Christ had asked his disciples whom men judged him to be, and they answered, that some had said he was a prophet, some Elias, some one thing, some another; then he said, Whom say ye that I am? Then Peter said, I say that thou art Christ the Son of God. To whom Christ answered, I say, Thou art Peter, and upon this stone I will build my church; that is to say, Upon this stone, not meaning Peter himself, as though he would have constituted a mortal man, so frail and brittle a foundation of his stable and infallible church; but upon this rock-stone, that is, this confession of thine, that I am the Son of God, I will build my church. For this is the foundation and beginning of all christianity, with word, heart, and mind, to confesse that Christ is the Son of God. Whosoever believeth not this, Christ is not in him; and he cannot have the mark of Christ printed in his forehead, which confesseth not that Christ is the Son of God.

Therefore Christ said unto Peter, that upon this rock, that is, upon this confession, that he was Christ the Son of God, he would build his church; to declare, that without this faith no man can come to Christ: so that this belief, that Christ is the Son of God, is the foundation of our christianity, and the support of our church. Here you see upon what foundation Christ's church is built, not upon the frailty of man, but upon the stable and infallible word of God.

Now as touching the lineal descent of the bishops in the see of Rome, true it is, that the patriarchs of Rome in the apostles time, and long after, were great maintainers and setters-forth of Christ's glory, in which, above all other countries and regions, there especially was preached the true gospel, the sacraments were most duly administered; and as, before Christ's coming, it was a city so valiant in power, and martial affairs, that all the world was in a manner subject to it, and after Christ's passion divers of the apostles there suffered persecution for the gospel's sake: so after that the emperors, their hearts being illuminated, received the gospel, and became christians, the gospel there, as well for the fame of the place, flourished most, whereby the bishops of that place were had in more reverence and honour, most esteemed in all councils and assemblies, not because they acknowledged them to be their head, but because the place was most revered and spoken of, for the great power and strength of the same. As now here in England, the bishop of Lincoln, in sessions and sittings, hath the pre-eminence of other bishops, not that he is the head and ruler of them; but for the dignity of the bishopric (and therewith the people smiled.) Wherefore the doctors in their writings have spoken most reverently of this see of Rome, and in their writings preferred it; and this is the prerogative which your lordship did rehearse the ancient doctors to give to the see of Rome.

In like manner, I cannot, nor dare but commend, reverence, and honour the see of Rome, as long as it continued in the promotion and setting forth of God's glory, and in due preaching of the gospel, as it did many years after Christ. But after that the bishops of that see, seeking their own pride, and not God's honour, began to set themselves above kings and emperors, challenging to them the title of God's vicars, the dominion and supremacy over all the world, I cannot but with St. Gregory, a bishop of Rome also, confesse that place is the very true Antichrist, whereof St. John speaketh by name of the whore of Babylon; and say, with the said St. Gregory, He that maketh himself a bishop over all the world, is worse than Antichrist.

Now whereas you say St. Augustine should seem not only to give such a prerogative, but also supremacy to the see of Rome, in that he saith all the christian world is subject to the church of Rome, and therefore should give to that see a certain kind of subjection; I am sure that your lordship knoweth, that in St. Austin's time there were four patriarchs, of Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch, and Rome, which patriarchs had under them certain countries; as in England the archbishop of Canterbury hath under him certain bishoprics in England and Wales, to whom he may be said to be their patriarch. Also your lordship knoweth right well, that at the time St. Austin wrote that book he was then bishop in Africa. Farther, you are not ignorant, that between Europe and Africa lieth the sea called the Mediterranean sea, so that all the countries in Europe to him which is in Africa, may be called countries beyond the sea. Hereof St. Austin saith, All the christian countries beyond the seas and remote regions, are subject to the see of Rome. If I should say all countries beyond the sea, I do except England, which to me now being in England, is not beyond the sea. In this sense, St. Austin saith, All the countries beyond the sea are subject to the see of Rome; declaring thereby, that Rome was one of the sees of the four patriarchs, and under it Europe, by what subjection I pray you? Only for a pre-eminence; as we here in England say, that all the bishoprics in England are subject to the archbishop of Canterbury.

For this pre-eminence also the other doctors (as you recited) say, that Rome is the mother of churches, as the bishopric of Lincoln is mother to the bishopric of Oxford, because the bishopric of Oxford came from the bishopric of Lincoln, and they were once both one; and so is the archbishopric of Canterbury mother to the other bishoprics which are in her province. In like manner the archbishopric of York, is mother to the North bishoprics; and yet no man will say, that Lincoln, Canterbury, or York, is supreme head to the other bishoprics; neither then ought we to confess the see of Rome to be supreme head, because the doctors in their writings confess the see of Rome to be the mother of churches.

Now were you say, I was once of the same religion which you are of, the truth is I cannot but confess the same. Yet so was St. Paul a persecutor of Christ. But in that you say, I was one of you not long ago, in that I in doing my message to my lord of Winchester, should desire him to stand stout in that gross opinion of the supper of the Lord: in very deed I was sent (as your lordship said) from the council to my lord of Winchester, to exhort him also to receive the true confession of justification; and because he was very refractory, I said to him, What make you so great a matter herein? You see many anabaptists rise against the sacrament of the altar; I pray you my lord, be diligent in confounding of them: for at that time my lord of Winchester and I had to do with two anabaptists in Kent. In this sense I willed my lord to be stiff in the defence of the sacraments against the detestable errors of anabaptists, and not in the confirmation of that gross and carnal opinion now maintained.

In like sort, as touching the sermon which I made at St. Paul's Cross, you shall understand, that there were at St. Paul's, and divers others places, fixed railing bills against the sacrament, terming it Jack of the Box, The Sacrament of the Haltar, Round Robin, with such unseemly terms; for which causes, I, to rebuke irreverent behaviour of certain evil-disposed persons, preached as reverently of that matter as I might, declaring what estimation and reverence ought to be given to it, what danger ensued the mishandling thereof, affirming in that sacrament to be truly and verily the body and blood of Christ, effectually by grace and spirit; which words the unlearned understanding not, supposed that I had meant of the gross and carnal being which the Romish decrees set forth, that a body having life and motion, should be indeed under the shapes of bread and wine.

With that the bishop of Lincoln interrupting him, said:

You must consider that the church of Christ lieth not hid, but is a city on the mountain, and a candle in the candlestick. Ponder with yourself, that the church of Christ is catholic, and universally spread throughout the world, not contained in the alligation of places, not comprehended in the circuit of England, not contained in the compass of Germany and Saxony, as your church is.

Then Dr. Ridley, with often interruption, at length spake.

Ridley. My lord, I acknowledge an unspotted church of Christ, in which no man can err, without which no man can be saved, which is spread throughout all the world, that is, the congregation of the faithful; neither do I alligate or bind the same to any one place as you said, but confess the same to be spread throughout all the world; and where Christ's sacraments are duly administered, his gospel truly preached and followed, there doth Christ's church shine as a city upon a hill, and as a candle in the candlestick: but rather it is such as you that would have the church of Christ bound to a place, who appoint the same to Rome, that there and no where else is the foundation of Christ's church. But I am fully persuaded that Christ's church is every where founded, in every place where his gospel is truly received, and effectually followed. And in that the church of God is in doubt, I use herein the counsel of Vicentius Lyrinensis, whom I am sure you will allow, who giving precepts how the catholic church may be in all schisms and heresies known, writeth in this manner: When (saith he) one part is corrupted with heresies, then prefer the whole world before that one part; but if the greatest part be infected, then prefer antiquity.

In like manner now when I perceive the greatest part of christianity to be infected with the poison of the see of Rome, I repair to the usage of the primitive church, which I find quite contrary to the pope's decrees: as in that the priest receiveth alone, that it is made unlawful to the laity to receive in both kinds, and such like: wherefore it requireth, that I prefer the antiquity of the primitive church, before the novelty of the Romish church.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, these faults which you charge the see of Rome withal, are indeed no faults. For first, it was never forbid the laity, but that they might, if they demanded, receive under both kinds. You know also, that Christ after his resurrection, at the time he went with his apostles to Galilee, opened himself by breaking of bread. You know that St. Paul after his long sailing towards Rome, brake bread, and that the apostles came together in breaking of bread, which declareth that it is not unlawful to administer the sacrament under the form of bread only. And yet the church had just occasion to decree, that the laity should receive in one kind only, thereby to take away an opinion of the unlearned, that Christ was not wholly both flesh and blood, under the form of bread. Therefore to take away their opinion, and to establish better the people's faith, the Holy Ghost in the church thought fit to decree, that the laity should receive only in one kind; and it is no news for the church upon just consideration to alter rites and ceremonies. For you read in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul writing to certain of the Gentiles, who had received the gospel, biddeth them to abstain from things stifled, and from blood, so that this seemeth to be an express commandment: yet who will say but that it is lawful to eat bloodings? How is it lawful but by the permission of the church?

Ridley. My lord, such things as St. Paul enjoined to the Gentiles for a sufferance, by a little to win the Jews to Christ, were only commandments of time, and respected not the successors.

After further disputation the following articles were read, and answers required the succeeding day in St. Mary's church:

The ARTICLES.

IN the name of God, Amen. We John of Lincoln, James of Gloucester, and John of Bristol, bishops, &c.

1. We do object to thee, Nicholas Ridley, and to thee Hugh Latimer, jointly and severally, first, that thou Nicholas Ridley in this high university of Oxford, in the year 1554, hast affirmed and openly defended and maintained, that the true and natural body of Christ, after the consecration of the priest, is not really present in the sacrament of the altar.

2. Item. That in the year aforesaid thou hast publicly affirmed and defended, that in the sacrament of the altar remaineth still the substance of bread and wine.

3. Item. That in the said year thou hast openly affirmed, and obstinately maintained, that in the mass is no propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

4. Item. That in the year and place aforesaid, these the aforesaid assertions solemnly had been condemned by the scholastical censure of this school, as heretical and contrary to the catholic faith.

5. Item. That all and singular the premises be true, notorious, and openly known by the public fame.

BISHOP LATIMER appareth before the COMMISSIONERS.

BISHOP Latimer being brought in by the bailiffs according to orders, thus spoke to the lords:

Latimer. My lords, If I appear again, I pray you not to send for me until you be ready. For I am an old man, and it is great hurt to mine old age to tarry so long long gazing upon the cold walls. Then said the bishop of Lincoln:

Lincoln. Mr. Latimer, you shall understand, that I and my lords here have a commission from my lord cardinal Poole's grace, legate a latere to this realm of England, from our most reverend father in God, the pope's holiness, to examine you upon certain opinions and assertions of your's, which you, as well here openly in disputations in the year of our Lord 1554, as at sundry and at divers other times, did affirm, maintain, and obstinately defend. In which commission be specially two points; the one which we must desire you is, that if you shall now recant, revoke, and disannul these your errors, and together with all this realm, yea, all the world, confess the truth, we, upon due repentance on your part, shall receive you, reconcile you, acknowledge you no longer a strayed sheep, but adjoin you again to the unity of Christ's church, from which you, in the time of schism, fell. So that it is no new place to which I exhort you; I desire you to return thither from whence you went.

Consider, Mr. Latimer, that without unity of the church there is no salvation, and in the church there be no errors. Therefore what should hinder you to confess that which all the realm confesseth, to forsake that which their majesties the king and queen have renounced, and all the realm recanted: it was a common error, and it is now of all confessed: it will be no more shame to you than it was to us all. Consider, Mr. Latimer, that within these twenty years this realm also with all the world confessed one church, acknowledged in Christ's church an head, and by what means, and for what occasion it cut off itself from the rest of christi-anity, and renounced that which in all times and ages was confessed, it is well known, and might be now declared upon what good foundation the see of Rome was forsaken, save that we must spare them that are dead, to whom the rehearsal would be opprobrious; it is no usurped power, as it hath been termed, but founded upon Peter by Christ, a sure foundation, a perfect builder; as by divers places, as well of the ancient fathers, as by the express word of God, may be proved.

For Christ spake expressly to Peter, saying, Feed my sheep, and rule my sheep, which word doth not only declare a certain ruling of Christ's flock, but includeth also a certain pre-eminence and government; and therefore is the king called a King from ruling: so that in saying, Rule, Christ declared a power which he gave to Peter, which jurisdiction and power Peter by hand delivered to Clement, and so in all ages it hath remained in the see of Rome. This, if you will confess with us, and acknowledge with all the realm your errors and false assertions, then will you do what we most desire, then shall we rest upon the first part of our commission, then shall we receive you, acknowledge you one of the church, and according to the authority given unto us, minister unto you, upon due repentance, the benefit of absolution. But if you shall stubbornly persevere in your blindness, if you will not acknowledge your errors, if you, as you stand alone, will be singular in your opinions, if by schisms and heresy you will divide yourself from the church, then must we proceed to the second part of the commission, which we would be loth to do, that is, not to condemn you, for that we cannot do (that the temporal sword of the realm, and not we, will do), but to separate you from us, acknowledge you to be none of us, to renounce you as no member of the church, to declare that you are the son of perdition, a lost child, and as you are a rotten member of the church, so to cut you off from the church, and so to commit you to the temporal judges, permitting them to proceed against you, according to the tenor of their laws.

Therefore, Mr. Latimer, for God's love consider your estate, remember you are a learned man, you have taken degrees in the schools, borne the office of a bishop; remember you are an old man, spare your body, accelerate not your death, and especially remember your soul's health, and the peace of your conscience; consider that if you should die in this state, you shall be a stinking sacrifice to God; for it is the cause that maketh the martyr, and not the death: consider that if you die in this state, you die without grace, for without the church can be no salvation.

After the bishop had somewhat paused, then Mr. Latimer lift up his head (for before he leaned on his elbow) and asked whether his lordship had done speaking; and the bishop answered, Yea.

Latimer. Then will your lordship give me leave to speak a word or two?

Lincoln. Yea, Mr. Latimer, so that you use a modest kind of talk, without railing or taunts.

Latimer. Your lordship gently exhorted me in many words to come to the unity of the church. I confess (my lord) a catholic church, spread throughout all the world, in which no man may err, without which unity of the church no man can be saved, but I know perfectly by God's word, that this church is in all the world, and hath not its foundation in Rome only, as you say; and methought your lordship brought a place out of the scriptures to confirm the same, that there was a jurisdiction given to Peter, in that Christ bade him govern his people. Indeed, my lord, St. Peter did his office well and truly, in that he was bid to govern; but since the bishops of Rome have taken a new kind of government. Indeed they ought to govern, but how, my lord? not as they will themselves; but this government must be hedged in and ditched in. They must rule, but according to the word of God.

The bishop of Lincoln now said, that they came not to dispute with Mr. Latimer, but to take his determinate answers to their articles, and so began to propose the same articles which were proposed to Dr. Ridley, requiring bishop Latimer's answers to the first.

Latimer. I do not deny, my lord, that in the sacrament by spirit and grace is the very body and blood of Christ, because that every man by receiving bodily that bread and wine, spiritually receiveth the body and blood of Christ, and is made partaker thereby of the merits of Christ's passion: but I deny that the body and blood of Christ is in such manner in the sacrament as you would have it.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you, Mr. Latimer, to the second article? and recited the same.

Latimer. There is, my lord, a change in the bread and wine, and such a change as no power, but the omnipotency of God can make, in that which before was bread, should now have the dignity to exhibit Christ's body, and yet the bread is still bread, and the wine still wine; for the change is not in the nature, but the dignity, because now that which was common bread hath the dignity to exhibit Christ's body: for whereas it was common bread, it is now no more common bread, neither ought it to be so taken, but as holy bread sanctified by God's word.

So the notaries penned his answer in the affirmative.

Lincoln. What say you to the third question? and recited the same.

Latimer. No, no, my lord, Christ made one perfect sacrifice for all the world, neither can any man offer him again, neither can the priest offer up Christ again for the sins of man, which he took away by offering himself once for all (as St. Paul saith) upon the cross, neither is there any propitiation for our sins saving his cross only.

So the notaries penned his answer to this article also affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you to the fourth, Mr. Latimer? and then recited it. After the recital whereof, when Mr. Latimer answered not, the bishop asked whether he heard him or no?

Latimer. Yes, but I do not understand what you mean thereby.

Lincoln. Marry, only this, that these your assertions were condemned by Dr. Weston, as heresies; is it no so, Mr. Latimer?

Latimer. Yes, I think they were condemned. But how unjustly, he that is a judge of all, knoweth.

The notaries also took this answer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you, Mr. Latimer, to the fifth article? and then recited it.

Latimer. I know not what you mean by these terms. I am no lawyer, I wish you would propose the matter plainly.

Lincoln. In that we proceed according to the law, we must use their terms also. The meaning only is this, that these your assertions are notorious, evil spoken of, and yet common and frequent in the mouths of the people.

Latimer. I cannot tell how much, nor what men talk of them. I come not so much among them, in that I have been secluded a long time. What men report of them I know not, and care not.

This answer taken, the bishop of Lincoln said, Mr. Latimer, we mean not that these your answers shall be prejudicial to you. To-morrow you shall appear before us again, and then it shall be lawful for you to alter and change what you will. We give you respite till to-morrow, trusting that after you have pondered well all things against that time, you will not be ashamed to confess the truth.

The SECOND SESSION.

THE next day following (which was the first of October) somewhat after eight o'clock, the said lords repaired to St. Mary's church, and after they were set in a high throne, well trimmed with cloth of tiffue and silk, then appeared Dr. Ridley, who was set at a framed table a good space from the bishop's seat, which table had a silk cloak cast over it, and the place was encompassed about in a quadrate form, partly for gentlemen who repaired thither, (for this was the sessions-day of goal-delivery) and the heads of the university to sit, and partly to keep off the press of the audience: for the whole body, as well of the university, as of the town, came hither to see the end of these two persons. After Dr. Ridley's appearance, and the silence of the audience, the bishop of Lincoln spake in manner following.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yesterday when we challenged you for not uncovering your head, you excused yourself of that whereof no man accused you, in saying you did not put on your cap for any obstinacy towards us, who as touching our own persons desired no such obedience of you, but only in respect of those whose persons we bear; neither (you said) for any contempt that you bear to this worshipful audience, which, although justly, may yet, in this case, require no such humility of you; neither for any derogation of honour to my lord cardinal's grace, in that he is descended from the royal blood, in that he is a man most noble, both for his excellent qualities and singular learning; for as touching those points, you said, you would with all humility, honour, reverence, and worship his grace; but in that he is legate to the most reverend father in God, the pope's holiness, (with that the bishop, with all then present, put off their caps, but Dr. Ridley moved not his) you said you neither could, nor would by any means be induced to give him honour: but forasmuch as this is the point, as we told you yesterday, why we require honour and reverence of you, we tell you now as we did then, unless you take the pains to move your bonnet, we will take care to cause your bonnet to be taken from you, unless you pretend sickness, as yesterday you did not.

Ridley. I pretend now no other cause than I did yesterday, that is, only that hereby it may appear, that not only in word and confession, but also by all my gesture and behaviour, in no point I agree or admit any authority from the pope, and not for any pride of mind, (as God is my judge) neither for contempt of your lordships, or of this worshipful audience, neither for derogation of honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, as concerning those points which your lordship spake of, that is, his noble parentage, and singular graces in learning. And as for taking my cap away, your lordship may do as it shall please you, it shall not offend me, but I shall be content with your ordinance in that behalf.

Lincoln. Forasmuch as you do now answer as you did yesterday, we must do also as we did then, and forthwith one of the beadies very hastily snatched his cap from his head.

After this the bishop of Lincoln began the examination.

Lincoln. Now, Mr. Ridley, what say you to the first article? If you have brought your answer in writing, we will receive it: but if you have written any other matter, we will not receive it.

Then Dr. Ridley took a sheet of paper out of his bosom, and began to read that which he had written; but the bishop of Lincoln commanded the beadie to take it from him. But he desired license to read it, saying, that it was nothing but his answers, but the bishop would in no wise suffer him.

With that Dr. Ridley, seeing no remedy, delivered it to an officer, who immediately delivered it to the bishop of Lincoln, who after he had secretly communicated it to the other two bishops, declared the sense, but would not read it as it was written, saying, that it contained words of blasphemy.

Then the bishop of Lincoln recited the first article, and required Dr. Ridley's answer to it. Then Dr. Ridley said, that his answer was there in writing, and desired that it might be published; but the bishop would not read the whole, but here and there a piece of it. So the notaries took his answer, that he referred him to his answer in writing exhibited now, and also before at the time of disputation, Dr. Weston being prolocutor.

In like manner the bishop of Lincoln recited the second article, and required an answer, and Dr. Ridley referred to him his answer in writing exhibited now, and also before at the time of disputation: and like answers were taken to all the rest of the articles.

Their answers in this manner rehearsed, taken and penned by the notaries, the bishop of Gloucester began an exhortation to move Dr. Ridley to turn.

Gloucester. If you would once empty your stomach, captivate your senses, subdue your reason, and together with us consider what a feeble ground of your religion you have, I do not doubt but you might easily be brought to acknowledge one church with us, to confess one faith with us, and to believe one religion with us. For what a weak and feeble stay in religion is this, I pray you? Latimer leaneth to Cranmer, Cranmer to Ridley, and Ridley to the singularity of his own wit: so that if you overthrow the singularity of Ridley's wit, then must needs the religion of Cranmer and Latimer fall also. You remember well, Mr. Ridley, that the prophet speaketh most truly, saying, Woe, woe be to them which are singular and wise in their own conceits.

But you will say here, it is true that the prophet saith: but how know you, that I am wise in mine own conceit? Yes, Mr. Ridley, you refuse the determination of the catholic church; you must needs be singular and wise in your own conceit, for you bring scripture for the proof of your assertions, and we also bring scriptures: you understand them in one sense, and we in another. How will you know the truth herein? If you stand to your own interpretation, then you are singular in your own conceit: but if you say you will follow the minds of the doctors and ancient fathers, likely you understand them in one meaning, and we take them in another: how will you know the truth herein? If you stand to your own judgment, then are you singular in your own conceit, then can you not avoid the woe which the prophet speaketh of.

Wherefore if you have no stay but the catholic church in matters of controversy, except you will rest upon the singularity and wisdom of your own brain, if the prophet most truly saith, Woe, woe be to them that are wise in their own conceit: then for God's love, Dr.

Ridley,

Ridley, stand not singular, be not you wise in your own conceit, please not yourself overmuch. How were the Arians, the Manichees, Eutychians, with divers other heretics which have been in the church, how, I pray you, were they suppressed and convinced? By reasoning in disputations? No truly, the Arians had no more places for the confirmation of their heresy, than the catholics for the defence of the truth. How then were they convinced? Only by the determination of the church. And indeed except we do constitute the church our foundation, stay, and judge, we can have no end of controversies, no end of disputations. For in that we all bring scriptures and doctors for the proof of our assertions, who should be judge of this our controversy? If we ourselves then be singular and wise in our own conceits, then cannot we avoid the woe that the prophet speaketh of.

It remaineth therefore that we submit ourselves to the determination and arbitrement of the church, with whom God promised to remain to the world's end, to whom he promised to send the Holy Ghost which should teach it the truth. Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, if you will avoid the woe that the prophet speaketh of, be not wise in your own judgment: if you will not be wise and singular in your own judgment, captivate your own understanding, subdue your reason, and submit yourself to the determination of the church.

This is briefly the sum of the oration of the bishop of Gloucester, by which he endeavoured in many more words, amplifying and enlarging the matter eloquently with sundry points of rhetoric to move affections, to persuade Dr. Ridley to turn and forsake his religion.

To whom Dr. Ridley answered in few words, That he said most truly with the prophet, Woe be to him that is wise in his own conceit; but that he acknowledgeth no such singularity in him, nor knew any cause why he should attribute so much to himself. And whereas he said bishop Cranmer leaned to him, that was most untrue, in that he was but a young scholar in comparison of Dr. Cranmer; for when he was but a young scholar, Mr. Cranmer was then a doctor; so that he confessed Mr. Cranmer might have been his schoolmaster for many years. It seemed that he would have spoke more, but the bishop of Gloucester interrupted him, saying:

Why, Mr. Ridley, it is your own confession, for Mr. Latimer, at the time of his disputation, confessed his learning to lie in Mr. Cranmer's books, and Mr. Cranmer also said that it was your doing.

The bishop of Lincoln likewise with many words, and gently holding his cap in his hand, desired him to turn. But Dr. Ridley made an absolute answer, That he was fully persuaded the religion which he defended to be grounded upon God's word, and therefore without great offence towards God, great peril and damage of his soul, he could not forsake his master and Lord God; but desired the bishop to perform his grant, in that his lordship said the day before, that he should have license to shew his cause, why he could not with a safe conscience admit the authority of the pope. But the bishop of Lincoln said, that whereas then he had demanded license to speak three words, he was contented then that he should speak forty, and that grant he would perform.

Then stepped forth Dr. Weston, who sat by, and said, Why, my lord, he hath spoken four hundred already.

Dr. Ridley confessed he had, but they were not of his prescribed number, neither of that matter. The bishop of Lincoln bade him take his license: but he should speak but forty, and then he would tell them upon his fingers: and presently Dr. Ridley began to speak: but before he had ended half a sentence, the doctors sitting by, cried out, and said, that his number was out: and with that he was put to silence.

After this the bishop of Lincoln, who sat in the midst, did judge and condemn the said Nicholas Ridley as an heretic, and so adjudged him presently, to be degraded from the degree of a bishop, from priesthood, and all ecclesiastical order; declaring moreover the said

Nicholas Ridley to be no member of the church, and therefore committed him to the secular powers, of them to receive due punishment according to the tenor of the temporal laws; and further excommunicating him by the great excommunication.

The last APPEARANCE and EXAMINATION of BISHOP LATIMER before the COMMISSIONERS.

THIS sentence being published by the bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Ridley was committed as a prisoner to the mayor, and immediately Mr. Latimer was sent for: but in the mean time the carpet or cloth which lay upon the table whereat Dr. Ridley stood, was removed, because (as men reported) Mr. Latimer had never the degree of a doctor, as Dr. Ridley had. But as soon as Mr. Latimer appeared, as he did the day before, perceiving no cloth upon the table, he laid his hat, which was an old felt, under his elbows, and immediately spoke to the commissioners, saying:

Latimer. My lords, I beseech your lordships to set a better order here at your entrance: for I am an old man, and have a very sore back, so that the press of the multitude doth me much harm.

Lincoln. I am sorry, Mr. Latimer, for your hurt. With that Mr. Latimer thanked his lordship.

Mr. Latimer, although yesterday, after we had taken your answers to those articles which we proposed, we might have justly proceeded to judgment against you, especially in that you required the same; yet we having a good hope of your returning, desiring not your destruction, but rather that you would recant, revoke your errors, and turn to the catholic church, deferred farther process till this day; and now according to the appointment, we have called you before us, to hear whether you are content to revoke your heretical assertions, and submit yourself to the determination of the church, as we most heartily desire, and I for my part, as I did yesterday, most earnestly do exhort you, or to know whether you persevere still the man that you were, for which we would be sorry.

It seemed that the bishop would have farther proceeded, if Mr. Latimer had not interrupted him by saying:

Your lordship doth often repeat the catholic church, as though I should deny the same. No, my lord, I confess there is a catholic church, to the determination of which I will stand, but not the church which you call catholic, which ought rather to be termed diabolic.

To the first article I answer now as I did yesterday, that in the sacrament the worthy receiver receiveth the very body of Christ, and drinketh his blood by the spirit and grace. But after a corporal being, which the Romish church prescribeth, Christ's body and blood is not in the sacrament under the forms of bread and wine.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively. For the second article he referred himself to his answers made before.

After this the bishop of Lincoln recited the third article, and required a determinate answer.

Latimer. Christ made one oblation and sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, and that a perfect sacrifice; neither needeth there to be any other, neither can there be any other propitiatory sacrifice.

In like manner did he answer to the other articles, not varying from his answers made the day before.

After his answers were penned by the notaries, and the bishop of Lincoln had exhorted him in like manner to recant as he did Dr. Ridley, and revoke his errors and false assertions, and Mr. Latimer had answered that he neither would nor could deny his master Christ and his verity, the bishop of Lincoln desired Mr. Latimer to hearken to him: and then Mr. Latimer hearkening for some new matter and other talk, the bishop of Lincoln read his condemnation, after which the said three bishops brake up their sessions, and dismissed the audience. And so Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer continued in custody till the 16th day of the said month of October.

A COPY of DR. RIDLEY'S SUPPLICATION written to the QUEEN and given to his Brother to be presented.

MAY it please your majesty, for Christ our Saviour's sake, in a matter of conscience (and not for myself, but for other poor men) to vouchsafe to hear and understand this humble supplication. It is so (honourable prince) that in the time while I was in the ministry of the see of London, divers poor men, tenants thereof, have taken new leases of their tenancies and holding: and some have renewed and changed their old, and therefore have paid fines and sums of money, both to me and to the chapter of St. Paul's, for the confirmation of the same.

Now I say, that the bishop, who at present occupieth the same room, will not allow the aforesaid leases, which must redound to many a poor man's utter ruin and decay. Wherefore this is mine humble supplication unto your honourable grace, that it may please the same, for Christ's sake, to be unto the aforesaid poor men their gracious patroness and defender, either that they may enjoy their aforesaid leases and years renewed, as I suppose when their matter shall be heard with conscience, both justice, conscience, and equity shall require, for that their leases shall be found (I trust) made without fraud or cunning, either on their part, or of mine, and always also the old rents reserved to the see, without any kind of damage thereof: or if this will not be granted, then that it may please your gracious highness, to command that the poor men may be restored to their former leases and years, and to have rendered to them again such sums of money as they paid to me and to the Chapter-house for their leases and years, so now taken from them. Which thing, concerning the fines paid to me, may be easily done, if it shall please your majesty to command some portion of those goods which I left in my house, when I fled in hope of pardon for my trespasses towards your grace, which goods (as I have heard) be yet reserved in the same house. I suppose that half the value of my plate that I left in mine offices, and especially in an iron-chest in my bed-chamber, will go nigh to restore all such fines received, the true sums and parcels whereof are not set in their leases: and therefore if that way shall please your highness, they must be known by such ways and means, as your majesty, by the advice of men of wisdom and conscience, shall appoint: but yet, for Christ's sake, I crave and humbly beseech your majesty, of your gracious pity and mercy, that the former way may take place.

I have also a poor sister that came to me out of the north, with three fatherless children, whom I married after to a servant of mine own house: she is put out of that which I did provide for them. I beseech your honourable grace, that her case may be mercifully considered, and that the rather, in contemplation that I never had of him, which suffered indurance at my entrance into the see of London, not one penny of his moveable goods, for it was almost half a year after his deposition before I entered into that place; yea, and also if any were left, known to be his, he had license to carry it away, or there for his use it did lie safe, as his officers do know. I paid for the lead which I found there, when I occupied any of it to the behoof of the church, or of the house. And moreover, I had not only no part of his moveable goods, but also (as his old receiver, and then mine, called Mr. Stanton, can testify) I paid for them towards his servants common liveries and wages, after his deposition, fifty-three or fifty-five pounds, I cannot tell which.

In all these matters I beseech your honourable majesty to hear the advice of men of conscience, and especially the archbishop of York; which for that he was continually in my house a year and more, before mine imprisonment, I suppose he is not altogether ignorant of some part of these things; and also his grace doth know my sister, for whose succour, and some relief, now unto your highness I make humble suit.

N. R.

October 16, 1555.

The degradation being past, and all things finished, Dr. Brooks called the bailiffs, delivering to them Dr. Ridley, with this charge, to keep him safely from any man speaking with him, and that he should be brought to the place of execution when they were commanded. Then Dr. Ridley, in praising God, burst out in these words, and said, God, I thank thee, and to thy praise be it spoken, there is none of you able to lay to my charge any open or notorious crime: for if you could, it would surely be laid in my lap, I see very well. Whereunto Brooks said, he played the part of a proud pharisee, exalting and praising himself.

But Dr. Ridley said, No, no, no, as I have said before, to God's glory be it spoken. I confess myself to be a miserable wretched sinner, and have great need of God's help and mercy, and do daily call and cry for the same: therefore I pray you have no such opinion of me. Then in going away, a certain warden of a college, advised Dr. Ridley to repent and forsake that erroneous opinion. Whereunto Dr. Ridley said, Sir, repent you, for you are out of the truth: and, I pray God (if it be his blessed will) have mercy upon you, and grant you the understanding of his word.

THE night before he suffered, his beard was washed and his legs; and as he sat at supper, the same night, at the house of Mr. Irish, (who was his keeper) he asked his hostess, and the rest at the table, to his marriage: for, said he, to-morrow I must be married, and so shewed himself to be as merry as ever he was at any time before. And wishing his sister at his marriage, he asked his brother, sitting at the table, whether she could find in her heart to be there or no: and he answered, Yea, I dare say, with all her heart. At which word he said, He was glad to hear of her so much therein. At this discourse Mrs. Irish wept.

But Dr. Ridley comforted her, and said, O Mrs. Irish, you love me not now, I see well enough; for in that you weep, it doth appear you will not be at my marriage, neither are content therewith. Indeed you be not so much my friend as I thought you had been. But quiet yourself, though my breakfast shall be somewhat sharp and painful, yet I am sure my supper shall be more pleasant and sweet.

When they arose from the table, his brother offered to stay all night with him. But he said, No, no, that you shall not. For I intend (God willing) to go to bed, and to sleep as quietly to night, as ever I did in my life. So his brother departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer, and to take his cross quietly, for the reward was great, &c.

The BEHAVIOUR of DR. RIDLEY and MR. LATIMER, at the TIME of their DEATH, October 16, 1555.

UPON the north side of the town, in the ditch over-against Baliol-college, the place of execution was appointed: and for fear of any tumult that might arise to hinder the burning of them, the lord Williams was commanded by the queen's letters, and the householders of the city to be there assistant, sufficiently appointed; and when every thing was in readiness, the prisoners were brought forth by the mayor and bailiffs.

Dr. Ridley had a fair black gown furred, and faced with foins, such as he was wont to wear being bishop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewise about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, and a corner-cap upon the same, going in a pair of slippers to the stake, and going between the mayor and an alderman, &c.

After him came Mr. Latimer in a poor Bristow freeze frock much torn, with his buttoned cap and kerchief on his head, all ready to the fire, a new long shroud hanging over his hose down to the feet: which at the first sight stirred men's hearts to pity them, beholding on the one side the honour they sometime had, and on the other the calamity whereunto they were fallen.

Dr. Ridley, as he passed toward Bocardo, looked up where Dr. Cranmer lay, hoping belike to have seen him him at the glasse window, and to have spoke unto him: But Dr. Cranmer was then busy with friar Soto and his fellows disputing together, so that he could not see him through that occasion. Then Dr. Ridley looking back, espied Mr. Latimer coming after. Unto whom he said, Oh, be you there? Yea, said Mr. Latimer, have after as fast as I can follow. So he following a pretty way off, at length they came to the stake, the one after the other, where first Dr. Ridley entering the place, marvelously and earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven: then shortly after seeing Mr. Latimer with a wondrous chearful look he ran to him, embraced and kissed him, and as they that stood near reported, comforted him, saying, Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame, or else strengthen us to abide it.

With that he went to the stake, kneeled down by it, and earnestly prayed, and behind him Mr. Latimer kneeled, as earnestly calling upon God as he. After they arose, the one talked with the other a little while, till those who were appointed to see the execution removed themselves out of the sun. What they said I can learn of no man.

Then Dr. Smith began his sermon to them upon this text of St. Paul, in the 13th chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians: "If I yield my body to the fire to be burnt, and have not charity, I shall gain nothing thereby." Wherein he alledged, that the goodness of the cause, and not the order of death, maketh the holiness of the person: which he confirmed by the examples of Judas, and of a woman in Oxford that of late hanged herself, for that they and such like as he recited, might then be adjudged righteous, which desperately separated their lives from their bodies, as he feared that those men that stood before him would do. But he cried still to the people to beware of them, for they were heretics, and died out of the church. And on the other side, he declared their diversities in opinions, as Lutherans, Oecolampadians, Zuinglians, of which sect they were he said, and that was the worst: but the old church of Christ, and the catholic faith, believed far otherwise. At which place they lifted up both their hands and eyes to heaven, as it were calling God to witness of the truth. Which countenance they made in many other places of his sermon, where they thought he spake amiss. He ended with a very short exhortation to them to recant and come home again to the church, and save their lives and souls, which else were condemned. His sermon was scarce in all a quarter of an hour.

Dr. Ridley said to Mr. Latimer, Will you begin to answer the sermon, or shall I? Mr. Latimer said, Begin you first, I pray you. I will, said Dr. Ridley.

Then the wicked sermon being ended, Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer kneeled down on their knees to my lord Williams of Tame, the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and divers other commissioners appointed for that purpose, who sat upon a form thereby. Unto whom Dr. Ridley said, I beseech you, my lord, even for Christ's sake, that I may speak but two or three words: and whilst my lord bent his head to the mayor and vice-chancellor, to know (as it appeared) whether he might have leave to speak, the bailiffs, and Dr. Marshal, the vice-chancellor, ran hastily unto him, and with their hands stopped his mouth, and said, Mr. Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions, and recant the same, you shall not only have liberty so to do, but also the benefit of a subject, that is, have your life. Not otherwise? said Dr. Ridley. No, quoth Dr. Marshal: therefore if you will not do so, then there is no remedy but you must suffer for your deserts. Well, says Dr. Ridley, so long as the breath is in my body, I will never deny my Lord Christ, and his known truth: God's will be done in me. And with that he rose up, and said with a loud voice, Well then I commit our cause to Almighty God, who will indifferently judge all.

To which Mr. Latimer added his old possey, Well, there is nothing hid but it shall be opened: and he said he could answer Smith well enough, if he might be suffered. Incontinently they were commanded to make themselves ready, which they with all meekness obeyed. Dr. Ridley took his gown and his tipper, and gave it to his brother-in-law Mr. Shipside, who all the time of his imprisonment; although he might not be suffered to come to him, lay there at his own charges to provide him necessaries, which from time to time he sent him by the serjeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth he gave away, the others the bailiffs took away.

He gave away divers other small things to gentlemen standing by, and divers of them pitifully weeping; to Sir Henry Lea he gave a new groat, and to divers of my lord Williams's gentlemen, some napkins, some nutmegs, and races of ginger, his dial, and such other things as he had about him, to every one that stood next him. Some plucked the points off his hose. Happy was he that might get any rag of him.

Mr. Latimer gave nothing, but very quietly suffered his keeper to pull off his hose, and his other array which to look unto was very simple; and being stripped unto his shroud, he seemed as comely a person to them that were there present; as one could well see; and whereas in his cloaths he appeared a withered and silly old man, he now stood bolt upright; as comely a father as one might behold.

Then Dr. Ridley standing as yet in his truss, said to his brother, It were best for me to go in my truss still. No, says his brother, it will put you to more pain: and the truss will do a poor man good. Whereunto Dr. Ridley said, Be it in the name of God, and so unlaced himself. Then being in his shirt, he stood upon the aforesaid stone, and held up his hand and said, O heavenly Father, I give unto thee most hearty thanks, for that thou hast called me to be a professor of thee, even unto death; I beseech thee, Lord God, have mercy on this realm of England, and deliver the same from all her enemies.

Then the smith took a chain of iron, and brought the same about both their middles: and as he was knocking in the staple, Dr. Ridley took the chain in his hand and shook it, for it did gird in his belly; and looking aside to the smith, said, Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the flesh will have it's course. Then his brother brought him a bag of gunpowder, and tied it about his neck. Dr. Ridley asked him what it was, his brother said gunpowder. Then, said he, I will take it to be sent of God, therefore I will receive it as sent from him. And have you any, said he, for my brother? (meaning Mr. Latimer.) Yea, sir, that I have, says his brother. Then give it unto him, said he, betime, lest you come too late. So his brother went and carried some gunpowder to Mr. Latimer.

In the mean time Dr. Ridley spake unto my lord Williams, and said, My lord, I must be a suitor unto your lordship in the behalf of divers poor men, and especially in the cause of my poor sister: I have made a supplication to the queen's majesty in their behalf. I beseech your lordship, for Christ's sake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here hath the supplication, and will resort to your lordship to certify you hereof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my conscience, (I praise God) this only excepted. Whilst I was in the see of London, divers poor men took leases of me, and agreed with me for the same. Now I hear say the bishop that now occupieth the same room, will not allow my grants to them made, but contrary to all law and conscience, hath taken from them their livings, and will not suffer them to enjoy the same. I beseech you, my lord, be a means for them: you shall do a good deed, and God will reward you.

Then they brought a lighted faggot, and laid it at Dr. Ridley's feet. Thereupon Mr. Latimer said, Be of good comfort, Mr. Ridley, and play the man, we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England, as I trust never shall be put out. When Dr. Ridley saw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful loud voice, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit: Lord, receive my spirit; and after repeated this often, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit.

spirit. Mr. Latimer cried as vehemently on the other side, O Father of heaven receive my soul: who received the flame as it were embracing of it. After he had stroked his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, he soon died, (as it appeareth) with very little or no pain. And thus much concerning this old and faithful servant of God, Bp. Latimer, for whose laborious travels, fruitful life, and constant death, the whole realm hath cause to give thanks to Almighty God.

But Dr. Ridley, by the ill making of the fire, the faggots being green, and built too high about the goss, so that the fire being kept down by the green wood, burned fiercely beneath, which put him to such exquisite pain, that he desired them for God's sake to let the fire come unto him; which his brother-in-law heard, but not well understood, intending him to rid him of his pain, (for which cause he gave attendance) as one in such sorrow, not well advised what he did, heaped faggots upon him, so that he clean covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned clean all his nether parts, before it touched the upper, and that made him leap up and down under the faggots, and often desire them to let the fire come to him, saying, I cannot burn. Which indeed plainly appeared: for after his legs were consumed by reason of his struggling through the pain, (whereof he had no release, but only the comfort he had from God) he shewed that side towards us clean, shirt and all untouched with flame. Yet in all his torment he forgot not to call upon God still, having in his mouth, Lord have mercy upon me, intermingling his cry, Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burn. In which pains he laboured till one of the standers by, with his bill, pulled off the faggots above, and where he saw the fire flame up, he wrested himself to that side. And when the fire touched the gunpowder, he was seen to stir no more, but burned on the other side, falling down at Mr. Latimer's feet: which some said, happened by reason that the chain loosed, others said, that he fell over the chain, by reason of the poise of his body, and the weakness of the nether limbs.

In a farewell letter written to all true friends in God, Dr. Ridley concluded with this sharp admonition to Papists.

Instead of the Lord's holy table, they give the people with much solemn disguising a thing which they call their mass, but indeed and in truth, it is a very masking and mockery of the true supper of the Lord; or rather I may call it a crafty juggling, whereby these false thieves and jugglers have bewitched the minds of the simple people, that they have brought them from the true worship of God unto pernicious idolatry, and make them to believe that to be Christ our Lord and Saviour, which indeed is neither God nor man, nor hath any life in itself, but in substances is the creature of bread and wine, and in use of the Lord's table is the sacrament of Christ's body and blood: and for this holy use, for which the Lord hath ordained them in his table, to represent unto us his blessed body torn upon the cross for us, and his blood there shed, it pleased him to call them his body and blood: which understanding Christ declareth to be his true meaning, when he saith, Do this in remembrance of me. And again, St. Paul likewise doth set out the same more plainly, speaking of the same sacrament, after the words of consecration, saying, As often as ye shall eat of this bread and drink of this cup, ye shall set forth (he meaneth with the same) the Lord's death until his coming again. And here again these thieves have also robbed the people of the Lord's cup, contrary to the plain words of Christ written in his gospel,

Although the cause of the true man slain of the thief, helping his neighbour to recover his goods again, and the cause for which I am to be put to death, in a generality is both one (as I said before); yet know ye that there is no small difference. These thieves against whom I do stand, are much worse than the robbers and thieves of the borders. The goods which they steal are much more precious, and their kinds of fight are far different. These thieves are worse (I say) for they are cruel, more wicked, more false, more deceitful, and crafty: for those will but kill the body, but these will kill both body and soul. Those, for the general theft and robbery, be called, and are indeed, thieves and robbers; but these for their spiritual kind of robbery, are called Sacrilegi, as you would say, Church-robbers. They are more wicked: for those go about to spoil men of worldly things, worldly riches, gold and silver, and worldly substance; these go about in the ways of the devil their spiritual father, to steal from the universal church, and particularly from every man, all heavenly treasure, true faith, true charity, and hope of salvation in the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, yea, to spoil us of our Saviour Jesus Christ, of his gospel, of his heavenly Spirit, and of the heavenly heritage of the kingdom of heaven, so dearly purchased unto us, with the death of our Master and Saviour Christ.

These church-robbers be also much more false, crafty, and deceitful, than the thieves upon the borders; for these have not the craft so to commend their theft, that they dare avouch it, and therefore as acknowledging themselves to be evil, they steal commonly in the night, they dare not appear in judgments and sessions, where justice is executed, and when they are taken and brought thither, they never hang any man, but they be oftentimes hanged for their faults. But these church-robbers can so cloak and colour their spiritual robbery, that they can make people to believe falsehood to be truth, and truth falsehood; good to be evil, and evil good; light to be darkness, and darkness light; superstition to be true religion, and idolatry to be the true worship of God; and that which is in substance the creature of bread and wine, to be no other substance but only the substance of Christ the living Lord, both God and man.

The kind of fight against these church-robbers is also of another sort and kind, than that is which is against the thieves of the borders. For there the true men go forth against them with spear and lance, with bow and bill, and all such kind of bodily weapons as the true men have: but here as the enemies be of another nature, so the watchmen of Christ's flock, the warriors that fight in the Lord's war, must be armed, and fight with another kind of weapons and armour. For here the enemies of God, the soldiers of Antichrist, although the battle is set forth against the church by mortal men, being flesh and blood, and nevertheless members of their father the devil, yet for that their grand master is the power of darkness, their members are spiritual wickedness, wicked spirits, spirits of errors, of heresies, of all deceit and ungodliness, spirits of idolatry, superstition and hypocrisy, which are called by St. Paul, principalities and powers, lords of the world, rulers of the darkness of this world, and spiritual subtilties concerning heavenly things; therefore our weapons must be fit and meet to fight against such, not carnal nor bodily weapons, as spear and lance, but spiritual and heavenly: we must fight against such with the armour of God, not intending to kill their bodies, but their errors, their false craft and heresies, their idolatry, superstition, and hypocrisy, and to save (as much as lieth in us) both their bodies and their souls.

And therefore, as St. Paul teacheth us, "We fight not against flesh and blood," that is, we fight not with bodily weapons to kill the man, but with the weapons of God to put to flight his wicked errors and vice, and to save both body and soul. Our weapons therefore are faith, hope, charity, righteousness, truth, patience, prayer unto God; and our sword wherewith we smite our enemies, beat and batter and bear down all falsehood, is the Word of God. With these weapons, under the banner of the cross of Christ, we do fight, ever having our eye upon our grand master and captain, Christ; and then we reckon ourselves to triumph and to win the crown of everlasting bliss, when enduring in this battle without any shrinking or yielding to the enemies, after the example of our grand captain Christ, our master, after the the example of his holy prophets, apostles, and martyrs, when (I say) we are slain in our mortal bodies by our enemies, and are most cruelly and without all mercy murdered down like a flock of sheep. And the more cruel, the more painful, the more vile and spiteful the kind of death is whereunto we be put, the more glorious in God, the more blessed and happy we reckon (without all doubts) our martyrdom to be.

And thus much, dear lovers and friends in God, my countrymen and kinsfolk, I have spoke for your comfort, lest at my death ye might be abashed, or think any evil: whereas ye have rather cause to rejoice (if ye love me indeed) that it hath pleased God to call me to a greater honour and dignity, than ever I did enjoy before, either in Rochester, or in the see of London, or ever should have had in the see of Durham, whereunto I was last of all elected and named: yea, I count it greater honour before God indeed to die in his cause (whereof I nothing doubt) than is any earthly or temporal promotion or honour that can be given to a man in this world. And who is he that knoweth the cause to be God's, to be Christ's quarrel, and of his gospel, to be the common weal of all the elect and chosen children of God, of all the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven; who is he (I say) that knoweth this assuredly by God's word, and the testimony of his own conscience (as I through the infinite goodness of God, not of myself, but by his grace acknowledge myself to do;) who is he, I say, that knoweth this and both loveth and feareth God in deed and in truth, loveth and believeth his master Christ, and his blessed gospel; loveth his brotherhood, the chosen children of God, and also lusteth and longeth for everlasting life: who is he, I say again, that would not or cannot find in his heart in this cause to be content to die? The Lord forbid that any such should be that should forsake this grace of God. I trust in my Lord God, the God of mercies, and Father of all comfort through Jesus Christ our Lord, that he which hath put this mind, will, and affection by his Holy Spirit in my heart, to stand against the face of the enemy in his cause, and to chuse rather the loss of all my worldly substance, yea, and of my life too, than to deny his own truth: that he will comfort me, aid me, and strengthen me evermore even unto the end, and to the yielding up of my spirit and soul into his holy hands, whereof I most heartily beseech his most holy sacred Majesty of his infinite goodness and mercy, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

Farewel therefore (Cambridge) my loving mother and tender nurse. If I should not acknowledge thy manifold benefits, yea, if I should not for thy benefits at least love thee again, truly I were to be accounted too ungrateful and unkind. What benefits hadst thou ever, that thou usedst to give and bestow upon thy best beloved children, that thou thoughtest too good for me? Thou didst bestow on me all thy school-degrees, the common offices, the chaplainship of the university, the office of the proctorship, and of a common reader; and of thy private advantages and emoluments in colleges, what was it that thou madest me not partner of? First to be a scholar, then to be a fellow, and after my departure from thee, thou calledst me again to a mastership of a right worshipful college. I thank thee, my loving mother, for all thy kindness, and I pray God that his laws, and the sincere gospel of Christ may ever be truly taught and faithfully learned in thee.

Farewel, Pembroke Hall, of late mine own college, my cure, and my charge: what case thou art in now God knoweth, I know not well. Thou wast ever named since I knew thee, which is not thirty years ago, to be studious, well learned, and a greater promoter of gospel, and of God's true word; so I found thee, and, blessed be God, so I left thee indeed. Woe is me for thee mine own dear college, if ever thou suffer thyself by any means to be brought from that trade. In thy orchard (the walls, butts, and trees, if they could speak, would bear me witness) I learned without book almost all St. Paul's epistles, yea, and I think all the canonical epistles, save only the Apocalypse. Of which study, although in time a great part did depart from me, yet the sweet smell thereof I trust I shall carry with me into heaven: for the profit thereof I think I have felt in all my life-time ever after, and I think of late (whether they abide now or no, I cannot tell) there were others that did the like. The Lord grant that this zeal and love toward that part of God's word, which is a key and true commentary to all the holy scripture, may ever abide in that college so long as the world shall endure.

From Cambridge I was called into Kent by the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, that most reverend father, and of him preferred to be vicar of Herne, in East Kent. Wherefore, farewell, Herne, thou worshipful and wealthy parish, the first cure whereunto I was called to preach God's word. Thou hast heard of my mouth oftentimes the word of God preached, not after the popish trade, but after Christ's gospel: O that the fruit had answered to the seed. And yet I must acknowledge me to be thy debtor for the doctrine of the Lord's supper, which at that time I acknowledge God had not revealed unto me: but I bless God, in all that godly virtue and zeal of God's word, which the Lord by preaching of his word did kindle manifestly both in the heart and in the life and works of that godly woman there, lady Phines; the Lord grant that his word took like effect there in many others.

Farewel, thou cathedral church of Canterbury, the metropolitic see, whereof I once was a member. To speak things pleasant unto thee I dare not for danger of conscience, and displeasure of my Lord God, and to say what lieth in my heart were now too much, and I fear were able to do thee now but little good. Nevertheless, for the friendship I have found in some there, and for charity's sake, I wish thee to be washed clean of all worldliness and ungodliness, that thou mayest be found of God after thy name Christ's church, in deed and in truth.

Farewel, Rochester, some time my cathedral see, in whom (to say the truth) I did find much gentleness and obedience; and I trust thou wilt not say the contrary, but I did use it to God's glory, and unto thine own profit in God. O that thou hadst and mightest have continued and gone forward in the trade of God's law wherein I did leave thee: then thy charge and burden should not have been so terrible and dangerous, as I suppose verily it is like to be (alas) in the latter day.

O London, London, to whom now may I speak in thee, or whom shall I bid farewell? Shall I speak to the prebendaries of St. Paul's? Alas, all that loved God's word, and were the true setters-forth thereof, are now, (as I hear say) some burnt and slain, some exiled and banished, and some confined in hard prison, and appointed to be put to the most cruel death for Christ's gospel sake. As for the rest of them, I know they could never brook me well, nor could I ever delight in them.

Shall I speak to the see whereof, wherein of late I was placed almost, and not fully the space of three years? But what may I say to it, being (as I hear say I am) deposed and expelled by judgment as an unjust usurper of that room. O judgment, judgment! Can this be just judgment to condemn the chief minister of God's word, the pastor and bishop of the diocese, and never bring him into judgment that he might have heard what crimes were laid to his charge, nor even suffer him to have any place or time to answer for himself? Thinkest thou hereafter, when true justice shall have place, this judgment can ever be allowed either of God or man? Well, as for the cause or whole matter of my deposition, and the spoil of my goods which thou possessest yet, I refer it unto God, who is a just judge; and I beseech God, if it be his pleasure, that that which is but my personal wrong, be not laid to thy charge in the latter day, this only I can pray for.

O thou now wicked and bloody see, why dost thou set up again many altars of idolatry, which by the word of God were justly taken away? Why dost thou daily delude thy people, masking in thy masses instead of the Lord's holy supper, which ought to be common as well (saith Chrysostom, yea, the Lord himself) to the people as to the priest? How darest thou deny to the people of Christ, contrary to his express commandment in the gospel, his holy cup? Why babblest thou to the people the Common-prayer in a strange tongue, wherein St. Paul commandeth in the Lord's name, that no man should speak before the congregation, except it should be presently declared in their common tongue, that all might be edified? Nay, hearken, thou whorish bawd of Babylon, thou wicked limb of Antichrist, thou bloody wolf, why slayest thou down, and makest havoc of the prophets of God? Why murderest thou so cruelly Christ's poor silly sheep, which will not hear thy voice, because thou art a stranger, and will follow no other but their own pastor Christ's voice? Thinkest thou to escape, or that the Lord will not require their blood at thy hands? Thy God, which is the work of thy hands, and whom thou sayest thou hast power to make, that thy deaf and dumb god, I say, will not indeed, nor can, (although thou art not ashamed to call him thy Maker) make thee to escape the revenging hand of the high and Almighty God. But be thou assured, that the living Lord our Saviour and Redeemer, who sitteth on the right hand of his Father in glory, he seeth all thy wicked ways and cruelty done to his dear members, and he will not forget his holy ones, and his hands (O thou whorish drab) shalt thou never escape. Instead of my farewell to thee, now I say, Fie upon thee, fie upon thee, filthy drab, and all thy false prophets.

Yet (O London) I may not leave thee thus. Although thy episcopal see, now being joined in league with the seat of Satan, thus hath now both handled me and the saints of God, yet I do not doubt, but in that great city there be many private mourners, who do daily mourn for that mischief, who never did nor shall consent to that wickedness, but do detest and abhor it as the ways of Satan. But these privy mourners here I will pass by, and bid them farewell with their fellows hereafter, when place and occasion shall more conveniently require. Among the worshipful of the city, and especially which were in office of mayoralty, yea, and in other cities also (whom now to name is not necessary) in the time of my ministry, which was from the latter part of sir Rowland Hill's year, unto sir Georges Barnes's year, and a great part thereof, I do acknowledge that I found no small humanity and gentleness, as I thought: but to (say the truth) that I do esteem above all other for true christian kindness, which is shewed in God's cause, and done for his sake. Whereas, O Dobs, Dobs, alderman and knight, thou in thy year didst win my heart for evermore, for that honourable act, that most blessed work of God, of the erection and setting up of Christ's holy hospitals, and truly religious houses, which by thee and through thee were begun. For thou, like a man of God, when the matter was moved for the relief of Christ's poor silly members to be holpen from extreme misery, hunger, and famine, thy heart, I say, was moved with pity, and as Christ's high honourable officer in that cause, yea, and not only in thine own person thou didst set forth Christ's cause, but to further the matter, thou broughtest me into the council-chamber of the city before the aldermen alone, whom thou hadst assembled there together to hear me speak what I could say, as an advocate by office and duty, in the poor men's cause. The Lord wrought with thee, and gave thee the consent of thy brethren; whereby the matter was brought to the common council, and so to the whole body of the city; by whom, with an uniform consent, it was committed to be drawn, ordered, and devised by a certain number of the most witty citizens and politic, endued also with godliness, and with ready hearts to set forward such a noble act, as could be chose in all the whole city; and, like true and faithful ministers, both to their city, and their master Christ, so ordered, devised, and brought forth the matter, that thousands of poor silly members of Christ, which else for extreme hunger and misery should have famished and perished, shall be relieved, holpen, and brought up, and shall have cause to bless the aldermen of that time, the common-council, and the whole body of the city; but especially thee, O Dobs, and those chosen men, by whom this honourable work of God was begun and wrought, and that so long throughout all ages, as that godly work shall endure; which I pray Almighty God may be ever unto the world's end, Amen.

Another FAREWEL to the PRISONERS in the Cause of CHRIST'S GOSPEL, and to all them who for the same Cause are banished from their own COUNTRY, chusing rather to leave all worldly GOODS than their MASTER CHRIST.

FAREWEL, my dearly beloved brethren in Christ, both you my fellow-prisoners, and you also that be exiled and banished out of your countries, because you will rather forsake all worldly advantages, than the gospel of Christ.

Farewel all you together in Christ; farewell and be merry, for you know that the trial of your faith bringeth forth patience, and patience shall make us perfect, whole, and sound on every side, and such, after trial (ye know) shall receive the crown of life, according to the promise of the Lord made to his dearly beloved; let us therefore be patient unto the coming of the Lord. As the husbandman abideth patiently the former and latter rain for the increase of his crop, so let us be patient, and pluck up our hearts, for the coming of the Lord approacheth apace. Let us, my dear brethren, take example of patience in tribulation of the prophets, who likewise spake God's word truly in his name. Let Job be to us an example of patience, and the end which the Lord suffered, which is full of mercy and pity. We know, my brethren, by God's word, that our faith is much more precious than any corruptible gold, and yet that is tried by the fire: even so our faith is therefore tried likewise in tribulations, that it may be found, when the Lord shall appear, laudable, glorious, and honourable. For if we for Christ's cause do suffer, that is grateful before God; for thereunto are we called, that is our state and vocation, wherewith let us be content. Christ, we know, suffered for us afflictions, leaving us an example that we should follow his foot-steps; for he committed no sin, nor was there any guile found in his mouth: when he was railed upon, and all to be reviled, he railed not again: when he was evil intreated, he did not threaten, but committed the punishment thereof to him that judgeth aright.

Let us ever have in fresh remembrance those wonderful comfortable sentences spoken by the mouth of our Saviour Christ; blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness' sake, for their's is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, persecute you, and speak evil against you for my sake: rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for so did they persecute the prophets that were before you. Christ our master hath told us beforehand, that the brother should put the brother to death, and the father the son, and the children should rise against their parents and kill them, and that Christ's true apostles should be hated of all men for his name's sake; but he that shall abide patiently unto the end, shall be saved.

Let us then endure in all troubles patiently, after the example of our master Christ, and be contented therewith, for he suffered, being our Master and Lord: how doth it then become us to suffer? For the disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord. It may suffice the disciple to be as his master, and the servant to be as his lord. If they have called the Father of the family, the Master of the household, Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them so of his household? Fear them not (saith our Saviour) for all hidden things shall be made plain; there is now nothing secret, but it shall be shewed in light. Of Christ's words let us neither be ashamed nor afraid to speak them; for so Christ commandeth us, saying, What I tell you privily, speak openly abroad, and what I tell you in your ear, preach upon the house top. And fear not them which kill the body, for the soul they cannot kill; but fear him which can cast both body and soul into hell-fire.

Know ye that our heavenly Father hath ever a gracious eye and respect toward you, and a fatherly providence for you, so that without his knowledge and permission mission nothing can do you harm. Let us therefore cast all our care upon him, he shall provide that which shall be best for us. For if two small sparrows, which both are sold for a mite, one of them lighteth not on the ground without your Father, and all the hairs of our head are numbered, fear not them (saith our master Christ) for you are more worthy than many small sparrows. And let us not stick to confess our master Christ for fear of danger, whatsoever it shall be, remembering the promise that Christ maketh, saying, Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall I confess before my Father which is in heaven: but whosoever shall deny me, him shall I likewise deny before my Father which is in heaven. Christ came not to give us here a carnal amity, and a worldly peace, or to knit his unto the world in ease and peace, but rather to separate and divide from the world, and to join them unto himself: in whose cause we must, if we will be his, forsake father and mother, and stick unto him. If we forsake him or shrink from him for trouble or death sake, which he calleth his cross; he will none of us, we cannot be his. If for his cause we shall lose our temporal lives here, we shall find them again, and enjoy them for evermore: but if, in this cause, we will not be contented to leave nor lose them here, then shall we lose them so, that we shall never find them again, but in everlasting death. What though our troubles here are painful for the time, and the sting of death bitter and unpleasant; yet we know that they shall not last, in comparison of eternity, no not the twinkling of an eye, and that they patiently taken in Christ's cause, shall procure and get us unmeasurable heaps of heavenly glory, unto which these temporal pains of death and troubles compared, are not to be esteemed, but to be rejoiced upon. If ye suffer rebukes in Christ's name, happy are ye, for the glory and Spirit of God resteth upon you. Of them God is reviled and dishonoured, but of you he is glorified.

Let no man be ashamed of that which he suffereth as a christian, and in Christ's cause; for now is the time that judgment and correction must begin at the house of God: and if it begin first at us, what shall be the end of those, think ye, which believe not the gospel? And if the righteous shall be hardly saved, the wicked and the sinner, where shall he appear? Wherefore they which are afflicted according to the will of God, let them lay down and commit their souls unto him by well doing, as to a trusty and faithful master. This, as I said, may not seem strange to us, for we know that all the whole fraternity of Christ's congregation in this world is served with the like, and by the same is made perfect. For the fervent love that the apostles had unto their master Christ, and for the great advantages and increase of all godliness which they felt by their faith to insue of afflictions in Christ's cause, and also for the heaps of heavenly joys which the same do get unto the godly, which shall endure in heaven for evermore; for these causes (I say) the apostles did joy of their afflictions, and rejoiced in that they were had and accounted worthy to suffer contumelies and rebukes for Christ's name. And St. Paul, as he glorieth in the grace and favour of God, whereunto he was brought and stood in by faith; so he rejoiced in his afflictions for the heavenly and spiritual profits which he numbered to rise upon them: yea, he was so far in love with what the carnal man loatheth so much, that is, with Christ's cross, that he judged himself to know nothing else but Christ crucified: he will glory, he saith, in nothing else but in Christ's cross, yea, and he blesteth all those as the only true Israelites, and elect people of God, with peace and mercy, which walk after that rule, and after no other.

Therefore seeing we have so much occasion to suffer, and to take afflictions for Christ's name's sake patiently, so many advantages thereby, so weighty causes, so many good examples, so great necessity, so pure promises of eternal life and heavenly joys of him that cannot lie: let us throw away whatever might hinder us, all burden of sin, and all kind of carnality, and patiently and constantly let us run for the best game in this race that is set before us, ever having our eyes upon Jesus Christ, the captain and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, not minding the shame and ignominy thereof, and is set now at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider this, that he suffered such strife of sinners against himself, that ye should not give over nor faint in your minds. As yet, brethren, we have not withstood unto death fighting against sin. Let us never forget, dear brethren, for Christ's sake, that fatherly exhortation of the wise man that speaketh unto us, as unto his children, the godly wisdom of God, saying thus; My son, despise not the correction of the Lord, nor fall from him when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth, him doth he correct, and scourgeth every child whom he receiveth. What child is he whom the father doth not chasten? If ye be free from chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and no children. Seeing then, when as we have had carnal parents which chastened us, we revered them, shall not we much more be subject unto our spiritual Father that we might live? And they for a little time have taught us after their own mind, but this Father teacheth us to our advantage, to give unto us his holiness. All chastisement for the present time appeareth not pleasant but painful; but afterwards it rendereth the fruit of righteousness on them which are exercised in it. Wherefore let us be of good cheer, good brethren, and let us pluck up our feeble members that were fallen or begun to faint, heart, hands, knees, and all the rest, and let us walk upright and straight, that no limping nor halting bring us out of the way. Let us not look upon the things that be present, but with the eyes of our faith let us stedfastly behold the things that be everlasting in heaven, and so chuse rather in respect of that which is to come, with the chosen members of Christ to bear Christ's cross, than for his short life-time to enjoy all the riches, honours, and pleasures of the broad world. Why should we Christians fear death? Can death deprive us of Christ which is all our comfort, our joy and our life? Nay forsooth. But contrary, death shall deliver us from this mortal body, which loadeth and beareth down the spirit, that it cannot so well perceive heavenly things; in which so long as we dwell, we are absent from God.

BISHOP RIDLEY's Lamentation for the Change of RELIGION in ENGLAND; also a Comparison between the Doctrine of the GOSPEL, and Romish Religion, with wholesome Instructions to all CHRISTIANS; how to behave themselves in Time of Trial.

ALAS, what misery is thy church brought unto, O Lord, at this day! Where of late the word of the Lord was truly preached, was read and heard in every town, in every village, yea, and almost in every honest man's house, alas, now it is exiled and banished out of the whole realm. Of late who was not taken for a lover of God's word, for a reader, for a ready hearer, and for a learner of the same! And now, alas, who dare bear any open countenance towards it, but such as are content in Christ's cause, and for his word's sake to stand to the danger and loss of all they have!

Of late there were to be found, of every age, of every degree and kind of people, some that gave their diligence to learn (as they could) out of God's word, the articles of the christian faith, the commandments of God, and the Lord's prayer. The babes and young children were taught these things by their parents, their masters, and weekly by their curates in every church: and the aged folk, which had been brought up in blindness, and in ignorance of those things which every christian is bound to know, when otherwise they could not, yet they learned the same by often hearing their children and servants repeat the same: but now (alas and alas again) the false prophets of Antichrist, which are past all shame, do openly preach in pulpits unto the people of God, that the catechism is to be accounted heresy; whereby their old blindness is brought home again: for the aged are afraid of the higher powers, and the youth are abashed and ashamed, even of that which they have learned, even though it be God's word, and dare no more meddle.

Of late in every congregation throughout all England, prayer and petition was made unto God to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities, from all false doctrine and heresy; and now alas, Satan hath persuaded England by his falshood and craft, to revoke her old godly prayer, to recant the same, and draw down the fearful wrath and indignation of God upon her own pate.

Of late by strict laws and ordinances, with the consent of the nobles and commonalty, and full agreement and counsel of the prelates and clergy, the beast of Babylon was banished hence, with laws, I say, and with oaths, and all means that then could be devised for so godly a purpose: but now, (alas) all these laws are trodden under foot; the nobles, the commonalty, the prelates and clergy are quite changed, and all those oaths, though they were made in judgment, justice, and truth, and the matter ever so good, do no more hold than a bond of rushes, or a barley straw, and a public perjury no more terrifieth them, than a shadow upon a wall.

Of late it was agreed in England of all hands, according to St. Paul's doctrine, and Christ's commandment, that nothing ought to be done in the church, in the public congregation, but in that tongue which the congregation could understand, that all might be edified thereby, whether it were common-prayer, administration of the sacraments, or any other thing belonging to the public ministry of God's holy and wholesome word: but, alas, all is turned upside down, Paul's doctrine is put apart, Christ's commandment is not regarded. For nothing is heard commonly in the church but a strange tongue, that the people do not understand.

Of late all men and women were taught after Christ's doctrine, to pray in that tongue which they could understand, that they might pray with heart that which they should speak with their tongue: now, alas, the unlearned people are brought into that blindness again, to think that they pray, when they speak with their tongue they cannot tell what, nor whereof their hearts are nothing mindful at all, for that it cannot understand a whit thereof.

Of late the Lord's supper was duly administered, and taught to be made common to all that are true christians with thanksgiving and setting forth of the Lord's death and passion until his returning again, to judge both quick and dead: but, now alas, the Lord's table is quite overthrown, and that which ought to be common to all godly, is made private to few ungodly, without any kind of thanksgiving, or any setting forth of the Lord's death at all, that the people are able to understand.

Of late all that were endued with the light and grace of understanding God's holy mysteries, did bless God, who had brought them out of that horrible blindness and ignorance, whereby in times past being seduced by Satan's subtilities, they believed that the sacrament was not the sacrament, but the thing itself whereof it is a sacrament, that the creature was the Creator, and that the thing which had neither life nor sense, (alas, such was the horrible blindness) was the Lord himself, which made the eye to see, and hath given all senses and understanding unto man: but now, alas, England is returned again like a dog to her own vomit and spewing, and is in worse case than ever she was: for it had been better never to have known the truth, than to forsake the truth once received and known: and not only that light is turned into darkness, and God's grace is received in vain, but also laws of death are made by the high court of parliament, masterfully to maintain by sword, fire, and all kind of violence, that heinous idolatry, wherein that adoration is given unto the lifeless and dumb creature, which is only due unto the everliving God: yea, they say they can, and do make of bread both man and God, by their transubstantiation. O wicked men, and Satan's own brood!

Of late was the Lord's cup at his table distributed according to his own commandment, by his express words in the gospel, as well to the laity as to the clergy, which order Christ's church observed so many hundred years after, as all the ancient ecclesiastical writers do testify, without contradiction of any one of them, that can be shewed unto this day: but now, alas, not only the Lord's commandment is broken, his cup denied to his servants, to whom he commandeth it should be distributed, but also with the same is set up a new blasphemous kind of sacrifice to satisfy and pay the price of sins both of the quick and the dead, to the great and intolerable reproach of Christ our Saviour's death and passion, which was and is the one only sufficient and everlasting available sacrifice, satisfactory for all the elect of God, from Adam the first, to the last that shall be born in the world.

Of late the commandment of God, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor any similitude nor likeness of any thing in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the water under the earth, thou shalt not bow down to them nor worship them:" this commandment of God, I say, was graven almost every where in churches, was learned by every body both old and young; whereupon images that provoked the simple and ignorant people unto idolatry, as the wise man saith, were taken out of the churches, and strictly forbidden that none should any where either bow down to them, or worship them: but now, alas, God's holy word is blotted and razed out of churches, and stocks and stones are set up in the place thereof. God commanded his word so to be ordered, that it might be had in continual remembrance at all times, and in every place: and on the other side, he forbid images and idols so to be either made or set in any place, where any should bow or worship them: but now (alas) that which God commanded is not minded, and that which he forbiddeth, is powerfully maintained by falshood and craft, and wickedly upheld.

Of late all ministers that were admitted to the public office and ministry of God's holy word, in their admission made a solemn profession before the congregation, that they should teach the people nothing as doctrine necessary to eternal salvation, but that which is God's own holy word, or may be thereon grounded without any doubt; whereby vanished and melted away of themselves many vain, yea, wicked traditions of man, as wax before the fire: but now at one brunt they are revived, and are in full hope also to return again in as great strength as ever they have been. And now can any man look for any other thing, but when you have received the head, you must also receive the whole body, or else how can the head abide? The head, under Satan, of all mischief, is Antichrist and his brood, the same is he which is the Babylonical beast. The beast is he, whereupon the whore sitteth. The whore is that city, saith John in plain words, which hath empire over the kings of the earth. This whore hath a golden cup of abominations in her hand, whereof she maketh to drink the kings of the earth, and of the wine of this harlot have all nations drank, yea and kings of the earth have lain by this whore, and merchants of the earth, by virtue of her pleasant merchandize, have been made rich.

Alas, England, alas, that this heavy plague of God should fall upon thee. Alas, my dearly beloved country, what thing is it now that may do thee good? Undoubtedly thy plague is so great, that it is utterly incurable, but by the bottomless mercy and infinite power of Almighty God. Alas, my dear country, what hast thou done that thou hast provoked the wrath of God, and caused him to pour out his vengeance upon thee for thine own deserts? Canst thou be content to hear thy faults told thee? Alas, thou hast heard oft, and would never amend. England, thy faults of all degrees, and sorts of men, of magistrates, of the ministers, and of the common people, were never more plainly told since thou bore that name, then thou didst hear them of late, even before the magistrates in king Edward's days; but thou heardest them only, and didst amend never a whit. For even of thy greatest magistrates some (the king's highness then, that innocent, that godly-hearted and peerless young christian prince excepted) evermore unkindly and ungently, against those that went about most busily and most wholesomely to cure their sore backs, spurned privily, and would not spare to speak evil of them, even unto the prince himself, and yet would they towards the same preachers outwardly bear a jolly countenance and a fair face:

I have heard that Cranmer, and another whom I will not name, were both in high displeasure, the one for shewing his conscience secretly, but plainly and fully in the duke of Somerset's cause, and both of late, but especially Cranmer, for repugning as they might, against the late spoil of the church goods, taken away only by commandment of the higher powers, without any law or order of justice, and without any request or consent of them to which they did belong. As for Latimer, Lever, Bradford, and Knox, their tongues were so sharp, they ripped in so deep in their galled backs, to have purged them (no doubt) of that filthy matter that was festered in their hearts, of insatiable covetousness, of filthy carnality, and voluptuousness, of intolerable ambition and pride, of ungodly loathsomeness to hear poor men's causes, and to hear God's word, that these men of all others these magistrates could never abide. Others that were very godly men, and well learned, that went about by the wholesome plaisters of God's word, howbeit after a more soft manner of handling the matter, but alas all speed alike. For all that could be done of all hands, their disease did not diminish, but daily did increase, which, no doubt, is no small occasion in that state of the heavy plague of God that is poured upon England at this day. As for the common lawyers, it may be truly said of them, as of the most part of the clergy, of curates, vicars, parsons, prebendaries, doctors of the law, archdeacons, deans, yea, and I may say of bishops also, I fear, for the most part, (although I doubt not but God had, and hath ever, whom he in every state knew and knoweth to be his) but for the most part, I say, they were never persuaded in their hearts, but from the teeth forward, and for the king's sake, in the truth of God's word, and yet all these did dissemble, and bear a copy of a countenance, as if they had been found within.

Hypocrisy and dissimulation St. Jerome doth well call a double wickedness: for neither it loveth the truth (which is one great evil) and also falsely it pretendeth to deceive the simple for another thing. This hypocrisy and dissimulation with God, in matters of religion, no doubt, hath wholly also provoked the anger of God. And as for the common people, although there were many good, where they well and diligently taught; yet (God knoweth) a great number received God's true word and high benefits with unthankful hearts. For it was great pity and a lamentable thing to have seen in many places the people so loathsomely and irreligiously to come to the holy communion, and to receive it accordingly, and to the common prayers, and other divine service, which were according to the true vein of God's holy word, and in all points so godly and wholesomely set forth, in comparison of that blind zeal, and undiscerned devotion which they had aforesaid to those things, whereof they understood never one whit, nor could be edified by them any thing at all.

And again, as for our alms-deeds, which are taught in God's word, whereby we are certain that God is pleased with them, and doth and will require such at our hands, which are a part of true religion, as St. James saith, and such as he saith himself he setteth more by than by sacrifice; to provide for the fatherless, infants and orphans, for the lame, aged, and impotent poor needy folk, and to make public provision that the poor that might labour, should have wherewith to labour upon, and so be kept from shameful beggary and stealing in these works: I say, how wayward were many, in comparison (I mean) of that great prodigality whereby in times past they spared not to spend upon flattering friars, false pardoners, painting and gilding of stocks and stones, to be set up and honoured in churches, plainly against God's word? And yet because no place is to be defrauded of their just commendation, London, I must confess, for such godly works in Sir Richard Dobs, knight, then lord mayor, his year being marvellous well: the Lord grant the same may so likewise persevere, continue, yea and increase, to the comfort and relief of the needy and helpless, that was so godly begun, Amen.

All these things do administer more matter of mourning and bewailing the miserable state that now is: for by this it may be perceived, how England hath deserved this just plague of God. And also it is greatly to be feared, that those good things, whatsoever they were that had their beginning in the time when God's word was so freely preached, now with the exile and banishment of the same, will depart again.

But to return again to the consideration of this miserable state of Christ's church in England, and to leave farther and more exquisite searching of the causes thereof unto God's secret and unsearchable judgments, let us see what is best now to be done for Christ's little flock. This is one maxim and principle in Christ's law; He that denieth Christ before men, him shall Christ deny before his Father and all his angels in heaven. And therefore every one that looketh to have by Christ our Saviour everlasting life, let him prepare himself so, that he deny not his master Christ, or else he is but a cast-away, and a wretch, howsoever he be counted or taken here in the world.

Now then seeing the doctrine of Antichrist is returned again into this realm, and the higher powers (alas) are so deceived and bewitched, that they are persuaded it is the truth, and Christ's true doctrine to be error and heresy, and the old laws of Antichrist are allowed to return with the power of their father again: what can be hereafter looked for, by reason, to the man of God, and true christian, abiding in this realm, but extreme violence of death, or else to deny his Master? I grant the hearts of princes are in God's hands, and whithersoever he will he can make them bow; and also that christian kings in old times used a more gentle kind of punishment, even to them which were heretics indeed; as degradation, and deposition out of their rooms and offices, exile and banishment out of their dominions and countries; and also (as it is read) the true bishops of Christ's church were sometime intercessors for the heretics unto princes, that they would not kill them, as is read of St. Augustine. But as yet Antichrist's kingdom was not so erected at that time, nor is now accustomed so to order them that will not fall down and worship the beast and his image (but even as all the world knoweth (after the same manner that both John and Daniel hath prophesied before, that is, by violence of death; and Daniel declareth farther, that the kind of death accustomed should be by sword, fire, and imprisonment.

Therefore, if thou, O man of God, dost purpose to abide in this realm, prepare and arm thyself to die; for both by Antichrist's accustomed laws, and these prophecies, there is no appearance or likelihood of any other thing, except thou wilt deny thy master Christ, which is the loss at the last both of body and soul unto everlasting death. Therefore my good brother or sister in Christ, whatsoever thou be, to thee that canst and mayst so do, that counsel that I think is the best safeguard for thee, both for thy body, and most surely for thy soul's health, is that which I shall shew thee hereafter. But first I warn thee to understand me to speak to him or her, which be not in captivity, or called already to confess Christ, but are at liberty abroad.

My counsel, I say, therefore is this, to fly from the plague, and get thee hence. I consider not only the subtilities of Satan, and how he is able to deceive by his false persuasions (if it were possible) even the chosen of God, and also the great frailty, which is oftentimes more in a man than he doth know in himself, which in the time of temptation then will utter itself: I do not only consider these things, I say, but that our master Christ, whose life was and is a perfect rule of the christian man's life, that he himself avoided oftentimes the fury and madness of the Jews, by departing from the country or place.

Paul likewise, when he was sought in Damascus, and the gates of the city was laid in wait for him, he was conveyed by night, being let down in a basket out at a window over the wall: and Elias the prophet fled the persecution of wicked Jezabel: and Christ our Saviour saith in the gospel, "When they persecute you in one city, flee unto another:" and so did many good, great, learned, and virtuous men of God, who were great and stout champions nevertheless, and stout counsellors and maintainers of Christ and his truth, in due time and place. Of such was the great clerk Athanasius. But this is so plain to be lawful by God's word, and examples of holy men, that I need not to stand in it.

Having this for my ground, I say to thee, O man of God, this seemeth to me to be the most sure way for thy safeguard, to depart and flee far from the plague, and that swiftly also: for truly before God, I think, that the abomination that Daniel prophesied of so long before, is now set up in the holy place. For all the doctrine of Antichrist, his laws, rites, and religion contrary to Christ, and so to the true serving and worshipping of God, I understand to be that abomination: therefore now is the time in England for those words of Christ, "Then they that be in Judea, let them flee into the mountains." Then (saith he) mark this Christ's (Then) for truly I am persuaded, and I trust, by the Spirit of God, that this (Then) is commanded: "Then (saith Christ) they that be in Jewry, let them fly unto the mountains, and he that is on the house top, let him not come down to take away any thing out of his house, and he that is abroad in the field, let him not return to take his cloaths. Woe be to the great-bellied women, and to them that give suck; but pray (saith Christ) that your flight be not in winter, or on the sabbath-day."

These words of Christ are mystical, and therefore had need of interpretation. I understand all those to be in Jewry spiritually, which truly confess one true living God, and the whole truth of his word, after the doctrine of the gospel of Christ. Such as they whom Christ here biddeth, in the time of the reign of Antichrist's abominations, to fly unto the mountains; which signifieth places of safeguard, and all such things which are able to defend from the plague. That he biddeth him that is on the house top, not to come down, and him that is in the field, not to return to take with him his cloaths; he meaneth that they should speed them to get them away betime, lest in their tarrying and trifling about working provision, they may be trapped in the snare ere ever they be aware, and caught by the back, and for gain of small worldly things, endanger and cast themselves into great perils of more weighty matters. And where he saith, Woe be to the great-bellied women, and to them that give suck; women great with child, and nigh to their lying down, and to be brought to bed, and not able to travel; and also those women which are brought to bed, and now give their babes suck: by these therefore Christ spiritually understandeth all such to be in extreme danger, which this word (Woe) signifieth: all such, I say, as are so hindered by any manner of means that they no ways be able to fly from the plague. And where Christ saith, Pray you that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath day: in winter, the common course of the year teacheth us, that the ways be foul, and therefore it is a hard thing then to take a far journey, for many incommodities and dangers of the ways in that time of the year; and on the sabbath-day it was not lawful to journey, but a little way. Now Christ therefore meaning that we should have need, both to speed our journey quickly, which cannot be done in the winter, for the badness of the ways, and also to go far, which cannot be done on the sabbath-day: he biddeth us therefore pray that our flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath-day; that is, to pray that we fly in time, and also far enough from the danger of the plague. Now, the causes why we should fly, follow in the same of St. Matthew's gospel, which I now pass over; thou mayst read them there.

And in the eighteenth chapter of the Revelation, the angel is said to have cried mightily with a loud voice, "Flee, my people out of Babylon, lest you be infected with her faults, and so be made partners of her plagues: for her offences and sins are grown so great, that they swell, and are come unto the heavens." Certainly the time doth approach, and the Lord's day is at hand. Hear, I beseech you, also holy Paul, that blessed apostle, he plainly forbiddeth us, "To join or couple ourselves with the unfaithful: for what fellowship can there be, saith he, of righteousness with unrighteousness, what company hath light with darkness, or what agreement hath Christ with Belial? or what part can the faithful have with the unfaithful? or how doth the temple of God agree with images or idols? For you are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will talk and dwell in them, I will be their God, and they shall be my people: wherefore depart from amongst them, and get you from them, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: and I will receive you, and be to you in the stead of your father, and you shall be unto me as my sons and daughters, saith the Almighty God.

This counsel to depart the realm, I do not marvel it doth seem to divers (even of them, I mean, that bear favour to Godward) diversly. Many (I trust) that be learned shall think the counsel good. Others there be peradventure, that will think it rather a thing to be more tolerable, and that it may be indeed by God's word lawfully done, rather than to be counselled to be done, for they will peradventure say, we should counsel a man always to do that which is best of all, and of most perfection: but boldly in Christ's cause to spend a man's life, is best of all, and of most perfection, and to fly it may seem to smell of cowardice. In many things, that which is best for one at sometimes, is not best for all at all times, and it is not most perfection, nor meet for a child to covet to run before he can go. I will not here make a discourse in this matter, what might be here objected, and what might be answered again; I leave that to the witty and eloquent men of the world.

This is my mind, which I would thou shouldest know, O man of God, as I would wish, and I do pray to Almighty God it may be, that every true christian, either brother or sister (after they be called, and brought into the wrestling place, to strive in Christ's cause for the best game, that is, to confess the truth of the gospel, and of the christian faith, in hope of everlasting life) should not shrink nor relent one inch, nor give back, whatsoever shall befall, but to stand to their tackle, and stick by it even unto death, as they will Christ shall stick by them at the latter day: so likewise I dare not with nor counsel any, either brother or sister, of their own accord, to start up into the stage, or to cast themselves, either before, and farther in danger than time and need shall require: for undoubtedly when God seeth his time, and his pleasure is, that his glory shall be set forth, and his church edified by thy death and confession, means shall be found by his fatherly universal providence, that thou, without thine own presumptuous provocation, shalt be lawfully called, to do thy feat, and to play thy part. The miserable end that one Quintus came unto, may be a warning, and a fearful example for all men to beware of presumption and rashness in such things (as Eusebius writeth in his ecclesiastical history, lib. 4. cap. 15) forever.

But a third sort of men there be, who also will be counted favourers of God's word, and are (I fear) in number far more, and worse to be persuaded to that which is the godly mean. I mean of such as will peradventure say or think, that my former counsel, which was to fly the infection of the antichristian doctrine by departing out of the realm, is more than needeth, and other ways and means may be found, both to abide, and also to be clear out of danger of the aforesaid plague. If that could be found, both to abide, and also to be clear out of danger of the aforesaid plague, truly agreeable to God's word, I would be as glad to hear it, God is my witness as any other man. Yes, peradventure, will some say, thus it may be: thou mayst keep thyself, thy faith, and thy religion close to thyself, and inwardly and privily worship God in spirit and truth, and outwardly see thou be no open meddler, nor talker, nor transgressor of common order: so mayst thou be suffered in the commonwealth, and yet use thy religion without offence of thy conscience. In other countries somewhere this peradventure might be used, but in England what shall be, God knoweth: but it was never yet, so far as ever I have known or heard. And also how can it be, but either thou must transgress the common order, and the Romish laws and customs, which have been used in England, in times past of popery, and now (it is certain) they return again: I say, thou must either be a breaker of these rites, laws, and customs, and so bewray thyself, or else, if thou be indeed a man of God, thou shalt offend thy conscience; for in observing of them thou shalt be compelled to break God's law, which is the rule of conscience to the man of God. For how canst thou resort every holy-day to the church, and bear a face to worship the creature instead of the Creator, as thou must do, and peradventure confess it too with thy mouth, and to sprinkle thyself with the conjured water.

Thou must be contributor also to the charges of all their popery, as of books of Antichrist's service, of lights of the rood-loft, of the sepulchre, for setting up and painting images (nay, indeed of idols), and thou must bear a face to worship them also, or else thou must be had by the back. Thou must serve the turn, to give the holy loaves as they call them, which is nothing else but a very mockery of the Lord's holy table. Thou must be contributor to the charges of all the disguised apparel, that the popish sacrificing priest, like unto Aaron, must play his part in. Yea, when the pardoner goeth about, or the flattering friar to beg for the maintenance of superstition, except thou do as thy neighbours do, look not long to live at rest. If any of thy family die, if thou wilt not pay money for ringing and singing, for requiem, masses, dirige, and commendations, and such like trumpery of the antichristian religion, thinkest thou that thou shalt be reckoned for a catholic man, or for Cæsar's friend? An hundred things more may be reckoned, and many of more weight, and of more evident superstition and idolatry, than some of these which I have now rehearsed, which, God knoweth, be ill enough: but these are enough to declare, and to set before thine eyes, the thing that I intend, that is, if thou abide and wilt dwell in England, thou must either do these, and many other more contrary to God's word, which forbiddeth not only the thing which is evil, but also faith, Abstain from all things that have any appearance of evil: or else if thou wilt not do them, how thou canst live in England in rest, safe from the stake, truly I cannot tell.

But peradventure (as man is ready to find, and invent some colour to cloak his conscience, to do that thing that his heart desireth) thou wilt say, though at any time I shall be forced to do any of these things, and such-like, yet I will have no confidence in them, but outwardly with my body; I will keep my heart unto God, and will not do that of my own mind willingly neither, but to avoid another inconvenience: I trust therefore God will hold me excused, for he shall have my heart: what can I do more?

O my friend, beware for God's sake, and know that the subtilties of Satan are very deep. He that is not able by God's word to perceive them is heavily laden. Pray therefore with David; Lord, let me not have a mind to invent excuses to cloak my sin: examine, my dear friend, these wily ways with the word of God, and if they do agree, thou mayest use them: if not, know, though they may seem ever so fine and goodly, yet indeed they be of Satan's brood. God's wrath is certain, that forbiddeth to worship the creature for the Creator, for that is heinous idolatry, and against the first commandment of God; and it is also against the second commandment of the first table to bow down, or to worship unto any images of God, or of any other thing; and God's word requireth not only the belief of the heart, but also the confession of the mouth: and to bear part of the charges, to the maintenance of things ungodly; what is that, but in thy so doing, a consent to the thing done? Now consenters and the doers, God's word accounteth to be guilty both. And it is not lawful, by St. Paul's doctrine, which was inspired by the Spirit of God, to do ill, that thereof the thing which is good may come.

Thy heart, thou sayest, God shall have, and yet wilt suffer thy body to do the thing that God doth abhor. Beware, O man, take heed what thou sayest; man may be deceived, but no man may deceive God, for he is called, and is truly, the searcher of the heart. Now to give God thy heart, is to give him thy whole heart, to love him, to dread him, and to trust in him above all other things. "He that hath my commandments, saith Christ, and observeth and keepeth them, it is he that loveth me:" and to dread God above all others, is rather willingly to incur the danger and peril of all fearful things, than wittingly to do that thing which is contrary to his blessed will and commandment: and to trust in him above all things, is assuredly to trust to his promise of his reward, and of his tuition, and of his goodness and mercy, and to prefer that above all things in the world, seem they ever so strong, so wise, or so good. Now, how canst thou say truly, that God hath thy heart after this manner of sort, when thy deeds do declare far another thing? Thy body, O man, is God's, and all the parts thereof, even as thy soul is: he made them both, and Christ with his blood redeemed them both, for he hath bought them both dearly: and darest thou suffer any part of either of them to do service to Satan? Surely in so doing thou committest sacrilege, and dost rob God; thou defilest the living temple of the living God, if thou suffer thy body to do Satan service. "Do you not know, saith St. Paul, that your body is a lively temple of God?" And may a man then take and use any part thereof but in the service of God? No, surely, it is not lawful so to do for the man of God, neither with hand, tongue, nor feet, nor any part of the whole body.

Doth not Paul command that to the Romans, which pertaineth to every christian soul? "As you have in times past, saith he, given your members to do service unto uncleanness and wickedness, from one wickedness to another; so now give your members to do service unto righteousness, that you may be sanctified." And I pray thee, good brother, what dost thou think it is to bear the mark of the beast in the forehead, and in the hand, that St. John speaketh of? I know we ought warily to speak of God's mysteries, which he shewed by the spirit of prophesying to his servant John, yet to read them with reverence; and to pray for the same so much as God knoweth is necessary for our time to know, I think it necessary and good. Wherefore what I suppose is to bear the beast's mark, I will tell thee and commit the judgment of mine interpretation, as in all other things, to the spiritual man. I suppose he beareth the beast of Babylon's mark in his forehead, which is not ashamed of the beast's ways, but will profess them openly to set forth his master the beast of Abaddon. And likewise he beareth his mark in his hand, that will and doth practise the works of the beast with his power and hand. And likewise I will not forbear to tell thee, what I think to be signed in the forehead for the servant of God is, whereof John also speaketh, reckoning up many thousands so to have been signed of every tribe. I suppose he is signed in the forehead for the servant of God, whom God hath appointed of his infinite goodness, and hath given him grace and strength stoutly to confess him, and his truth before the world. And to have grace and strength to confess Christ, and the doctrine of the cross, and to lament and mourn for the abomination of Antichrist, I suppose is to be signed with TAU, whereof Ezekiel the prophet doth speak. Thus, I suppose, these prophecies are spiritually to be understood: and to look for other corporal marks, to be seen in men's foreheads, or in their hands, is nothing else but to look that there should come some brute beast out of Babylon, or some elephant, leopard, lion, or camel, or some other such monstrous beast with ten horns, that should do all the wonderful things spoken in John: and yet of a beast speaketh John, but I understand him so to be called, not for that he shall be any such brute beast, but for that he is and shall be the child of perdition, which for his cruelty and beastly manners is well called a beast.

The carnal Jews knew there was a promise made, that Elias should come before Christ the Messiah, the anointed of God, to prepare his ways: they knew also there was a promise of Messiah, that he should come, and be a king, and reign in the house of David for evermore: but they understood all so grossly, and so carnally, that they neither knew Elias, nor Messiah, when they came; for they looked for Elias to come down from heaven in his own person, and for Messiah to come and reign in worldly pomp, power, riches, and glory, whereas the prophecies of both were spiritually to have been understood:

of Elias, that he should not come in person, but in spirit; that is, one that should be endowed with the spirit and gifts of grace of Elias, which was indeed John Baptist, as Christ himself did declare to his apostles: and of Messiah's reign, all the prophets were to be understood of the reign of his spiritual kingdom over the house of Jacob, and the true Israelites for evermore. And so by that their gross and carnal understanding, they mistook both Elias and the true Messiah, and when they came, knew neither of them. So likewise, I fear, nay, it is certain, the world that wanteth the light of the Spirit of God (for the world is not able to receive him, saith John) neither doth, nor shall know the beast, nor his marks, though he rage cruelly, and live ever so beastly, and though his marked men be in number like the sand of the sea. The Lord therefore vouchsafe to open the eyes of the blind with the light of grace, that they may see and perceive, and understand the words of God, after the mind of his Spirit. Amen.

Here remain two questions, which may seem weighty, and which may peradventure move many not to follow the former counsel. The former reason is, A man will say, O sir, it is no small matter you speak of, to depart from a man's own native country into a strange realm. Many men have so great hindrances, as how is it possible that they can, or may do so? Some have lands and possessions, which they cannot carry with them: some have, father, mother, wife, children, and kinsfolk, from whom to depart is as hard a thing (and all one almost) as to suffer death, and to go to a strange country that thou knowest not, neither the manner of the people, nor how thou mayst away either with the people, or with the country: or what a hard thing it is to live among a strange people, whose language thou dost not understand, &c.

I grant here thou mayst heap a number of worldly disadvantages, which are surely very likely to ensue the departure out of a man's native country, I mean out of the whole realm, into a strange land: but what of all these, and a thousand more of the like sort? I will set unto them one saying of our Saviour Christ, which unto the faithful child of God, and to the true christian, is able to countervail all these, yea, and to weigh them down. Christ our Saviour saith in Luke, "If any come to me, and do not hate his father and mother, [he meaneth, and will not in his cause forsake his father and mother] his wife, children, and brethren, yea and his life too, he cannot be my disciple: and whosoever doth not bear my cross, and come after me, he cannot be my disciple." And, in the same place, he declareth by the two parables, one of a builder, and the other of a king that is a warrior, that every man that will not, in Christ's cause, forsake all that ever he hath, he cannot be his disciple. Look the places who will; the matter is so plainly set forth, that no glosses, nor cloaking of conscience to the man of God, can serve to the contrary. Many places there be for the same purpose for the embracing of Christ's cross, when Christ and his cause layeth it upon our back; but this is so plain, that I need here rehearse no more.

This latter reason and objection, whereof I spake before, is of more force, and includeth a necessity, which, after the common saying, hath no law, and therefore it is more hard to shape for it a good answer. This may be objected of some; Alas, sir, I grant all these things do grieve me, and because I understand they do not agree with God's word, which is the rule of my conscience, I loath either to look on them, or to hear them. But, sir, alas, I am an impotent man, an aged man, a sick man, a lame man; or I have so many small infants, and a lame wife, who all live by my labour, and by my provision: if I leave them, they will starve, and I am not able to carry them with me, such is my state. Alas, sir, what shall I do? And these causes may chance to some men of God, whereby either it shall be for them utterly impossible to depart the country, or else in departing they shall be enforced to forsake such in extreme necessity, of whom both God and nature have committed unto them the care.

Alas! what counsel is here to be given? O lamentable state! O sorrowful heart! that neither can depart, and without extreme danger and peril is not able to tarry still. And these are they whom our Saviour Christ saw before should be, and called them in his prophecy of the latter time, great bellied, or travailing women, and women that give, after they be brought to bed, suck to their babes. Of the state of such as are not able to fly the infection of the pestiferous plague of Antichrist's abominations, Christ lamenting, and not cursing, saith, "Woe be to the great bellied and travailing women, and women that give suck in those days." For these, alas, my heart mourneth the more, the less I am able to give any comfortable counsel, but this; that always, as they look for everlasting life, they abide still in the confession of his truth, whatsoever shall befall, and for the rest, to put their trust now wholly in God, who is able to save them against all appearance; and commonly in extremities, when all worldly comfort faileth, and the danger is at highest, then unto him he is wont, after his accustomed mercy, to be most ready to put to his helping hand. God suffered Daniel to be cast into the den of lions, and the three children into the hot burning furnace, and yet he saved them all. Paul was plucked out of the mouth of the lion (as he saith of himself), and in Asia he was brought into such trouble, that he looked for nothing less than present death, and yet he that raised the dead to life again, brought him out of all his troubles and taught him and all others that be in trouble for Christ's cause, not to trust to themselves, but in Almighty God.

Of God's gracious aid in extreme perils towards them that put their trust in him, all scripture is full both of old and new. What dangers were the patriarchs oftentimes brought into, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but of all others Joseph, and how mercifully were they delivered again? In what perils was Moses when he was fain to fly for the safeguard of his life? And when he was sent again to deliver the Israelites from their servile bondage? Not before they were brought into extreme misery. And when did the Lord mightily deliver his people from the sword of Pharaoh? Not before they were brought into such straits, that they were so encompassed on every side, the main sea on one side, and the main host on the other, that they could look for none other, (yea, what did they indeed else look for?) but either to have been drowned in the sea, or else to have fallen on the edge of Pharaoh's sword. Those judges which wrought most wonderful things in the delivery of the people, were given when the people was brought to most misery before, as Othniel, Ehud, Samgar, Gideon, Jephtha, Samson. And so was Saul endued with strength and boldness from above, against the Ammonites, Philistines, and Amalekites, for the defence of the people of God. David likewise felt God's help most sensibly ever in his extremest persecutions. What shall I speak of the prophets of God, whom God suffered so oft to be brought into extreme perils, and so mightily delivered them again; as Elias, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Jonah, and many others, whom it were too long to rehearse and set out at large? And did the Lord use his servants otherwise in the new law after Christ's incarnation? Read the Acts of the apostles, and you shall say no. Were not the apostles cast into prison, and brought out by the mighty hand of God? Did not the angel deliver Peter out of the strong prison, and bring him out by the iron gates of the city, and set him free? And when, I pray you? Even the same night before Herod appointed to have brought him to judgment to have slain him, as he had a little before killed James the brother of John. Paul and Silas, after they had been fore scourged, and were put into the inner prison, and there laid fast in the stocks. I pray you, what appearance was there that the magistrates should be glad to come the next day themselves to them, to desire them to be content, and to depart in peace? Who provided for Paul, that he should be safely conducted out of all danger, and brought to Felix the emperor's deputy, when as both the high-priest, the pharisees, and rulers of the Jews conspired to inquire judgment of death against him, he being fast in prison, and also more than forty men men had sworn each one to another, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul? A thing wonderful, that no reason could have invented, or man could have looked for: God provided Paul his own sister's son, a young man that disappointed that conspiracy, and all their former conjuration. The manner how the thing came to pass, thou mayst read in Acts xxiii. I will not be tedious unto thee with the rehearſal thereof.

Now to deſcend from the apoſtles to the martyrs that followed next in Chriſt's church, and in them likewise to declare how gracious our good God ever hath been to work wonderfully with them who in his cauſe have been in extreme perils, it were matter enough to write a long book. I will here name but one man and one woman, that is, Athanaſius the great clerk and godly man, ſtoutly ſtanding in Chriſt's cauſe againſt the Ari-ans, and that holy woman Blandina, ſtanding ſo conſtantly in all extreme pains, in the ſimple confeſſion of Chriſt. If thou wilt have examples of more, look and thou ſhalt have theſe and an hundred more, in Eusebius's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and in Tripartita Hiſtoria.

To die in Chriſt's cauſe is an high honour, to which no man certainly ſhall or can aſpire, but to whom God vouchſafeth that dignity: for no man is allowed to preſume to take upon himſelf any office of honour, but he who is thereunto called of God. Therefore John ſaith well, ſpeaking of them who have obtained the victory by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of his teſtimony, that they loved not their lives, even unto death.

The Lord grant us therefore of his heavenly grace and ſtrength, that here we may ſo confeſs him in this world amoungſt this adulterous and ſinful generation, that he may confeſs us again at the latter day before his father which is in heaven, to our glory and everlaſting comfort, joy, and ſalvation.

To our heavenly Father, to our Saviour and Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, and to the Holy Ghoſt, be all honour now and for ever. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

The HISTORY of STEPHEN GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER.

THE next month after the burning of Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, which was the month of November, Stephen Gardiner, biſhop, and chancellor, a man hated of God and all good men, ended his wretched life. This viper's bird crept out of the town of Bury, in Suffolk, was brought up moſt part of his youth in Cambridge: his wit, capacity, memory, and other endowments of nature, were not to be complained of, if he had well uſed, and rightly applied the ſame; wherein there was no great want of God's part in him, if he had not rather himſelf wanted to the goodneſs of his gifts.

In the beginning of queen Anne Bullen's time, who was ſo forward or ſo buſy in the matter of the king's divorce as Stephen Gardiner, who was firſt ſent to Rome, and then to the emperor with Edward Fox, as chief agent in the behalf of the lady Anne? By whom alſo he was preferred to the biſhopric of Wincheſter, and Edward Bonner was preferred to the biſhopric of London. Again, at the abolishing of the pope, who ſo ready to ſwear, or ſo vehement to write againſt the pope as he, not only by his ſermons, but alſo by his book De Obedientia may appear? In which book, left any ſhould think him drawn thereunto otherwiſe than by his own conſent, he plainly declareth, how not raſhly nor on a ſudden, but upon a long deliberation and advertiſement in himſelf about the matter, he at length uttered his judgment: and moreover, ſo he uttered his judgment in writing againſt the uſurped ſupremacy of the pope, that coming to Louvain afterward, he was there accounted a perſon excommunicate and a ſchiſmatic, inſomuch that he was not permitted in their church to ſay maſs; and moreover, in their public ſermons they openly cried out againſt him.

And thus long continued he firm and forward, ſo that who but Wincheſter during all the reign of queen Anne? After her deceaſe, that time by little and little carried him away, till at length the emulation of the lord Cromwell's eſtate, and eſpecially (as it ſeemeth) for his ſo much favouring of Bonner (whom Wincheſter at that time in no caſe could abide) made him an utter enemy both againſt him, and alſo his religion: till again in king Edward's days, he began a little to rebate from certain points of popery, and ſomewhat to ſmell of the goſpel, as both by his ſermon before king Edward, as alſo by his ſubſcribing to certain articles, may appear; and this was an half turn of Stephen Gardiner from popery again to the goſpel, and (no doubt) he would have farther turned, had not the unlucky decay of the duke of Somerſet clean turned away from true divinity, to plain popery; wherein he continued a cruel perſecutor to his dying day.

And thus much concerning the trade and profeſſion of Stephen Gardiner's popiſh divinity. In which his popiſh trade, whether he followed more true judgment, or elſe time, or rather the ſpirit of ambition and vain-glory, it is doubtful to ſay, and ſo much the more doubtful, becauſe in his doings and writings a man may ſee him not only contrary to himſelf, but alſo in ſome points contrary to other popiſts. And furthermore, where he agreeth with them, he ſeemeth therein not ſo much to follow his own ſenſe, as the mind and meaning of Perſeus; out of whoſe book the greateſt part of Wincheſter's divinity ſeemeth to be borrowed. And therefore as in the true knowledge of God's holy word and ſcripture he appeareth nobody; ſo in his pen and ſtyle of writing no leſs far he is from commendation, than he is from all plainneſs and perſpicuity.

It pleaſed his majeſty king Henry the eighth, after his abolishing the biſhop of Rome's uſurped authority (amongſt other embaffages to foreign princes), to ſend the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſir Henry Knevet, knight, as joint ambaffadors to the emperor, being then at a diet or council at Ratiſbon, appointing alſo ſir Henry Barkely, ſir William Blunt, knights, and Andrew Bainton, eſquire, (their highneſſes ſervants) to give their attendance upon the ſaid ſir Henry Knevet, for the more honouring of his embaffage. It happened alſo at that time, that ſir Henry Knevet entertained in his ſervice (as ſteward of his houſehold) one William Wolfe, who had in the ſame capacity before ſerved ſir Thomas Wyat, knight, the king's former ambaffador there, and by that means had good acquaintance in thoſe parts, as well in the emperor's court, as elſewhere. This Wolfe, towards the latter end of the diet or council, happened to walk (as often as he did) towards the emperor's palace to hear ſome news, where he met with one Ludovico, an Italian merchant, one of his old acquaintance. Who, ſuppoſing the ſaid Wolfe to have attended upon the biſhop of Wincheſter, (not knowing of any other joint ambaffador) required Wolfe, for old acquaintance, to do him a pleaſure; whereunto he willingly granted. Whereupon Ludovico ſhewed him, that the pope's legate, or ambaffador to the emperor (which was cardinal Contarene) departing the day before towards Rome, and having no leiſure to end his buſineſs himſelf, had put the ſaid Ludovico in truſt for the accompliſhing of them: and amongſt all other things he had eſpecially charged him, that he ſhould repair to the ambaffador of England, and require of him an answer to the pope's letters, which the legate did of late ſend unto him, addreſſed to him from Rome, and that upon the receipt thereof he ſhould ſend them after with all ſpeed; and therefore if his lord ambaffador would write by that courier, he prayed Wolfe to tell him that it was time to write, for the courier went away within a day or two. At this tale Wolfe being abaſhed, and yet partly gueſſing which ambaffador he meant, thought it not meet to tell him whoſe ſervant he was, but by other ſoothing talk found that he meant the bishop of Winchester. And to the end that Ludovico should suspect nothing, he answered him, that he being not the ambassador's secretary, could say little therein; however he would not fail to put his secretary in remembrance of it: which thing Ludovico also desired him to do, for that he had no other acquaintance with the ambassador, and so for that time they departed. This matter seeming to Wolfe of some importance, he immediately revealed it to sir Henry Knevet, his master: who weighing also the greatness of the case, and what disadvantage it were upon one man's bare report to attempt aught, in a place and time whereby such a person was to be touched, charged Wolfe well to advise himself, that no hatred, displeasure, or other passion, did move him to disclose this, but truth only. Wolfe replied, That he weighed well the weightiness of the cause, meet, as to his own respect, to be passed over in silence, for avoiding of his private displeasure, if the duty of allegiance bound him not otherwise. But sir, (says he) if you think not my hearing thereof, one to one, to be sufficient; I warrant you to devise means that some other of your servants shall hear the like words from Ludovico's own mouth as well as I. Upon which sir Henry Knevet devised which of his servants he might use to that purpose, and at last rested upon Mr. Thomas Chalenor, his secretary, because he had the Italian tongue. Not making him privy to any matter, but desired Wolfe to take him abroad with him as of his own private motion, for they were very familiar friends. Whereupon the next morning, being Sunday, Wolfe came to Chalenor's chamber, and prayed him familiarly to take a walk with him abroad to the Piazza, or Market-stand, which he readily did, not knowing of any special cause why. When they came to the Piazza, overagainst the emperor's palace, (near whereunto also the pope's legate had lodged) and had there walked a while together, there came thither the said Ludovico, and espying Wolfe, saluted him very friendly, and entered into talk about the Exchange, and sundry other matters, Chalenor being still with them. At last upon an occasion, they entered into a little talk about the former letters that the ambassador of England had received from Rome by the pope's legate, of which Ludovico had in charge to receive an answer, affirming that the post departed the next day, and therefore prayed Wolfe to put the ambassador's secretary in remembrance of them. Whereunto Wolfe answered, That he would willingly do it; but he did not well know which ambassador he meant, for that there were two; one, the bishop of Winchester, and the other, a gentleman of the king's privy chamber. To whom Ludovico replied, That he meant not the gentleman of the privy chamber, but the bishop. By which talk, and much such like, (as upon the former day) Mr. Chalenor being moved, (and not knowing yet of his master's and Wolfe's purpose) after the departure of Ludovico from them, said unto Wolfe, that Ludovico had had but homely talk with him, not to be passed over lightly, and therefore he would tell his master of it. To whom Wolfe answered, Do as you will, if you think any matter therein. And therefore at his return home, he told sir Henry Knevet what speech he had heard at Ludovico's mouth.

Sir Henry Knevet being thus further ascertained of the matter, opened the whole to sir John Barkley, sir William Blunt, and to Mr. William Bainton, who all agreed yet to make a further trial thereof. And therefore devised that Wolfe should procure Ludovick to bring certain velvets, and other silks, unto sir Henry Knevet's lodging, as well for himself as for the other gentlemen, which that afternoon he did accomplish, and brought Ludovick unto sir Henry, where also were the other gentlemen. After they had a while viewed the silks, and had some talk about the price, Wolfe took occasion again to ask Ludovick, if sir Henry was the ambassador of whom he was to demand an answer of the letters sent by the pope's legate? To whom the merchant answered, No, it was not his feignery, but it was a bishop, terming him Reverendissimo, whereby they easily perceived whom he meant. Sir Henry Knevet hereupon somewhat dissembling the matter, entered into further talk about it, whereby Ludovick opened as much in effect to them, as he had done before to Wolfe; but yet at last perceiving that as well sir Henry, as also the other gentlemen, beheld him somewhat angrily, he broke off his talk. Wherewith sir Henry Knevet, making as though he had noted nothing, did lovingly dismiss him, praying him, that when he had received the bishop's letters, he would also repair to him for a packet to an English gentleman of his acquaintance at Milan; which he promised to do, and so departed again. When sir Henry had thus made sufficient trial of this matter, he forthwith wrote his letters unto the king's majesty, signifying unto him the whole at large, as he had learned. In the meanwhile Ludovick the next morning repaired to the bishop of Winchester's lodging, to demand an answer of those letters the legate had sent unto him; but how he used himself, or whether he uttered the discourse he had with sir Henry Knevet, and with Wolfe, whom he supposed at first to be the bishop's man, is not certainly known. But the bishop perceiving, that by mistaking one for another, (and in supposing Wolfe to be the bishop's servant) Ludovick had uttered all his message from the legate unto Wolfe, and that thereby his practices would come to light; in great haste and rage he caused Ludovick to be stayed in his own house, while in the mean time himself went to Gravela, one of the emperor's council, and so practised with him, that Ludovick was secretly committed to prison, in the custody of one of the emperor's marshals, and so as he could be no more talked with, all the time of their abode there. And then sending in great haste to sir Henry Knevet to come and speak with him, (which he did) he fell into very hot speech with him, saying, that he had poison in his dish, and that a knave was suborned to be his destruction; with many such like words. Sir Henry told him again how he understood it: and prayed him that Ludovick might be brought face to face, to be examined in both their presences. Which the bishop would in no case agree unto, affirming, that he had also declared the case to Gravela, being indifferent (as he thought) to them both, that he would not meddle with Ludovick, nor speak with him: but that the emperor's council should examine him, and try what he was for him. To whom sir Henry Knevet again very earnestly objected, That he marvelled that the bishop in matters touching the king's majesty, their master, would use the aid or means of Gravela, a foreign prince's minister, to make him privy of their question. But say and do what he could, he would never come to the speech of Ludovick any more ever after. Whereupon there arose great and long controversies between them, (both writing unto the king about that matter) until at last the king's majesty perceiving his affairs otherwise to slack thereby, wrote to them both, that they should lay all those things under foot, and join together in his service as before; which they did accordingly, and which was then presently done, and thereunto he set his hand.

Now, whether this was the matter that the king moved so often Mr. Secretary Paget (being after lord keeper) to keep safe as fore matter against the bishop, I know not; but yet it appears by some depositions of the nobility, and others, in the process had against him in king Edward's days, that the king's majesty, Henry VIII. had this matter ever in his mind: for in every general pardon that he granted by parliament after this practice, he did still except all treasons committed beyond the seas; meaning thereby, as it was supposed, that the bishop should not take any benefit by any general pardon, if at any time his majesty would call him to account: and therefore all things well weighed, he had small cause to vaunt of his great favour he had with king Henry, his master. Howbeit, it seemeth he was brought into this fool's paradise by lord Paget: who

(as he himself reporteth in his depositions) in his messages from the king to the said bishop, deluded him; telling him much otherwise than the king spoke, and concealing always the king's hard speeches against him, which thing puffed up this vain-glorious boaster not a little.

But whosoever he was, seeing he is now gone, I refer him to his judge, to whom he shall stand or fall. As concerning his death and manner thereof, I would they which were present thereat, would testify to us what they saw. This we have all to think, that his death happened so opportunely, that England hath a mighty cause to give thanks to the Lord for it: not so much for the great hurt he had done in times past in perverting his princes, in bringing in the six articles, in murdering God's saints, in defacing Christ's sincere religion, &c. but also and especially for that he had thought to have brought to pass in murdering also the lady Elizabeth. For whatsoever danger of death that she was in, it did (no doubt) proceed from the bloody bishop, who was the cause thereof. And if it be certain which we have heard, that her highness being in the Tower, a writ came down from certain of the council for her execution, it is not out of controversy that Winchester was the framer of that engine, who (no doubt) in that one day, had brought this whole realm into woeful ruin, had not the Lord's most gracious counsel, through Mr. Bridges then the lieutenant, coming in haste to the queen, certified her of the matter, and prevented his bloody devices.

The same day as bishops Ridley and Latimer suffered at Oxford, being about the 19th day of October, there came into the house of Stephen Gardiner the old duke of Norfolk, with Mr. Mundy, his secretary. The old aged duke, there waiting for his dinner, the bishop being not yet disposed to dine, deferred the time till three or four o'clock in the afternoon. At length about four o'clock cometh his servant posting from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the bishop what he had heard and seen: of whom the said bishop diligently inquiring the truth of the matter, and hearing by his man that fire most certainly was set unto them, cometh out rejoicing to the duke; Now, said he, let us go to dinner. Whereupon they being sat down, meat immediately was brought, and the bishop began merrily to eat. But what followed? The bloody tyrant had not eaten a few bits, but the sudden stroke of God's terrible hand fell upon him in such sort, as immediately he was taken from the table, and so brought to his bed, where he continued the space of fifteen days in such intolerable anguish and torments, that all that mean while during the fifteen days, he could not void by urine or otherwise, any thing that he received: whereby his body being miserably inflamed within, (who had inflamed so many good martyrs before) was brought to a wretched end. And therefore, no doubt, as most likely it is, came (as was reported) the thrusting out of his tongue from his mouth, so swollen and black, with the inflammation of his body. A spectacle worthy to be noted and beheld of all such bloody and burning persecutors.

When Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, came to him, and began to comfort him with words of God's promise, and with the free justification in the blood of Christ our Saviour, repeating the scriptures to him; Winchester hearing that, What, my lord, (quoth he) will you open the gap now? then farewell all together. To me, and such others in my case, you may speak it, but open this window to the people, then farewell altogether.

Here I could bring in the frivolous epitaph that was made on his death, devised by a papist for a popish bishop, but I omit it, and instead thereof I have here inserted certain things gathered out of his sermons, words, and writings, wherein may appear what an earnest and vehement enemy he was to the pope, if he would have been constant in himself: and how inconstant he varied from himself; and also how he, standing upon the singularity of his own wit, varied from other papists in certain points.

The Sum and Effect of Bp. GARDINER's SERMON, preached before KING EDWARD, Anno 1550.

When Jesus was come into the parts of Cesarea, a city that Philipus builded, he asked his disciples, and said, Whom do men say that the Son of Man is? They said, Some that thou art John the Baptist, some that thou art Elias, some that thou art Jeremiah. or some one of the prophets. He said to them, But whom do ye say that I am? Then answered Simon Peter, and said, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, &c. Matthew xvi. 13, 14, 15, 16.

I Cannot have time, I think, to speak of the gospel thoroughly, for other matters that I have here now to say, but I shall note unto you such things as I may; and first, of the diversity of opinions concerning Christ, which were among the people variable: but among this, that is, the disciples of Christ's school, there was no variety, they agreed all together in one truth, and among them there was no variety. For when Peter had, for all the rest, and in the name of all the rest, made his answer, that Christ was the Son of God, they all confessed with one consent, that he had spoken the truth. Yet these opinions of Christ that the people had of him, though they were sundry, yet they were honourable and not slanderous: for to say that Christ was Elias, and John the Baptist, was honourable: for some thought him so to be, because he did frankly, sharply, and openly rebuke vice. They that called him Jeremiah, had also an honourable opinion of him, and thought him so to be, because of his great learning which they perceived in him, and marvelled where he had it. And they that said he was one of the prophets, had an honourable opinion of him, and favoured him, and thought well of him.

The philosophers that were not of Christ's school erred every one in their vain opinions, and no one of them agreeth with the other.

Yea, men of simplicity, though they meant well, yet being out of Christ's school, they varied and agreed not in their opinions of Christ, though they thought well of him. Some said he was John, some Elias, some Jeremiah, but none made the right answer. He that answered here, was Simon the Son of Jonas, and he said, Thou art Christ the son of the living God.

Here ye may note the properties that were in Peter, He was called Simon, which is obedience, and Jonas is a dove; so that in him, that is of Christ's school, must be these two properties, obedience and simplicity. He must be humble and innocent as a dove, that will be of Christ's school. Pride is a hindrance of Christ's school; for as the wise man saith, God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble and meek.

But now concerning the answer of Peter, Matthew here, in this place, saith he, answered, "Thou art Christ the Son of the living God." And St. Luke saith, he answered, "Thou art the Christ of God." And St. Mark saith, he answered, "Thou art the Christ." But in all that is no variety; for to say, Christ the Son of the living God, and to say, The Christ of God, and to say, The Christ, is in effect all one, and no diversity in it, for Christ alone is the whole: and he that confesseth thoroughly Christ, is thoroughly a christian man, and doth therein confess him to be the Lord and Saviour of the world.

As he was our bishop then, so it is he that still keepeth us in favour with God: and like as his sacrifice then made was sufficient to deliver us from our sins, and to bring us in favour with God; so to continue us in the same favour of God, he ordained a perpetual remembrance of himself, he ordained himself for a memory of himself at his last supper, when he instituted the sacrament of the altar, not for another redemption as though the world needed a new redemption from sin, but that we might thoroughly remember his most holy passion, he instituted the sacrament by his most holy word, saying, "This is my body," which word is sufficient to prove the sacrament, and maketh sufficiently for the substance thereof.

And this it is that we must believe of Christ, and believe it thoroughly: and therefore by your patience, as Peter made his confession, so will I make confession.

As a sacrifice ordained to make us the more strong in the faith and remembrance of Christ's passion, and for commending unto God the souls of such as be dead in Christ, (for these two things are the special causes why the mass was instituted) the parliament very well ordained mass to be kept; and because we should be the more strong in the faith and devotion towards God, it was very well done of the parliament, for moving the people more and more to devotion, to ordain that the sacrament should be received in both kinds. Therefore I say, that the act of parliament for receiving the sacrament of the altar in both kinds, was well made.

I say also, that the proclamation which was made, That no man should irreverently speak of the sacrament, or otherwise speak of it than the scripture teacheth them, was well made. For this proclamation stoppeth the mouths of all such as will irreverently speak of the sacrament: for in scripture there is nothing to be found that maketh any thing against the sacrament, but all maketh with it. Wherefore if they were the children of obedience, they would not use any irreverent talk against the sacrament, nor blaspheme the holy sacrament. For no word of the scripture maketh any thing against it.

Now will I return to the text. When Simon had answered, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God: then Christ said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven; and I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Blessed art thou (saith he) for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee. For otherwise in John, Andrew told of Christ, and said, I have found the Messiah, which is Christ. But that is not enough. He that shall confess Christ must have an inward teaching, and must be spiritually taught by the Father of heaven; but the confession of Peter was above the reason of man: for Christ was there a very man, and Peter's eyes told him that he was a man and nothing else; but he was inwardly taught by the Father of heaven, and had a secret knowledge given him from heaven, not by flesh and blood, that is to say, by man's reason, but inwardly by the Father of heaven.

But Peter had another reason inwardly taught him, and because he understood his lesson, Christ gave him a new name: for Petra is a stone, a new name of a christian man, for upon this confession of thy faith, here I will build my church, that is, I will establish all those which I intend to gather unto thee, and the devils shall not prevail against it: for he that with a good heart and sure faith confesseth this, he is sure from all evil: this world nor Satan can do him no harm.

But now for a farther declaration, it is a marvellous thing, that upon these words the bishop of Rome should found his supremacy: for whether it be Super Petram, or Petrum, all is one matter, it maketh nothing at all for the purpose of a foundation of any such supremacy. For otherwise (when Peter spake carnally to Christ, as in the same chapter a little following) Satan was his name, where Christ said, Get behind me, Satan; so that the name of Peter is no foundation for the supremacy, but as it is said in scripture, Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, that is, by participation for godly participation giveth names of things), he might be called the head of the church, as the head of the river is called the head, because he was the first that made this confession of Christ, which is not an argument for dignity, but for the quality that was in the man. For the first man is not evermore the best. The head-man of a quest, is not always the best man in the quest, but is chosen to be the head-man for some other quality that is in him. Virtue may allure men, so that the inferior person in dignity may be the better in place, as the king sometimes chuseth a mean man to be of his council, of whom he hath a good opinion, yet is the king the king still. And in some case the king of England might send to Rome, and if the bishop of Rome were a man of such wisdom, virtue, and learning, that he were able in matters of controversy concerning religion, to set an unity in the church of England; the king might well enough send to him for his counsel and help, and yet should not in so doing give the bishop of Rome any superiority over the king.

But now to go forth declaring my mind; in my time had come many alterations. First, a great alteration it was to renounce the bishop of Rome's authority, and I was one that stood in it. A great alteration it was, that abbeyes were dissolved. A great alteration it was that images were pulled down: and to all these I condescended, and yet I have been accounted a maintainer of superstition, and have been called a master of the ceremonies, and of outward things; and I have been noted to take that religion which consisteth in outward things, as though he were a right christian that fulfilled the outward ceremonies, whereof I promised to declare my conscience, and so will I, and how I have esteemed ceremonies, and that I have never been of other opinion than I am concerning ceremonies, and my opinion I have gathered of Augustine and Jerome, ancient fathers and doctors of the church.

Ceremonies serve to move men to serve God, and as long as they be used for that purpose, they may be well used in the church: but when man maketh himself servant to them, and not them to serve him, then be our ceremonies brought to an abuse. If by overmuch familiarity of them men abuse them, they do evil.

We had many images whereto pilgrimages were done, and many tombs that men were used to visit, by reason whereof they fell into a fancy of idolatry and superstition, above the things that they might have been taken for; and because that they had not the use they were ordained for, they were left.

As touching ceremonies, I esteem them all as Paul esteemeth them, things indifferent, where he saith, That the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, &c. So of ceremonies. Nevertheless we have time, place, and number, as a certain number of psalms to be said at times, which may be done without superstition; but these things must serve us, and not we serve them. Yet if an order be set in them by such as have power, we must follow it, and we must obey the rulers that appoint such time, place, and number to be kept. You may not say, if the time will serve me, then I will come an hour after. No, sir, you must keep this time, and this hour, because it is so appointed by the rulers, not for the things, but for the order that is set. I have been ever of this opinion.

We had palms and candles taken away, which things may indifferently have either of the two reformations abovesaid. When they were in place, they should have put men in remembrance of their duty and devotion towards God, but because they were abused, they were and might be taken away. But the religion of Christ is not in these exercises, and therefore in taking away of them the religion of Christ is nothing touched nor hindered. But men must in such things be conformable, not for the ceremony, but for obedience sake. St. Paul saith, that we should rebuke every brother that walketh inordinately. I have told you mine opinion, and my conscience telleth me that I have spoken plainly, that you may know what I am, and that you may not be deceived in me, nor be slandered in me, nor make any further search to know my heart.

I mislike those preachers who preach by the king's license, and those readers which by the king's permission and sufferance do read open lectures, do openly and blasphemously talk against the mass, and against the sacrament. And to whom may I liken such readers and preachers? I may liken them unto posts, for the proverb saith, That posts do bear truth in their letters, and lies in their mouths: and so do they, and to speak so against the sacrament, it is the most marvellous matter that ever I saw or heard of. I would wish therefore that that there were a stay and an order in this behalf, and that there might be but one order and rule. And let no man out of his own head begin matters, nor go before the king. They call it going before the king, and such make themselves kings.

Now, reader, compare these writings, preachings, and sayings of this bishop in the days of king Henry and king Edward, with his doing in queen Mary's time, and thou shalt see how variable he was, how inconstant and contrary to himself, how perjured and false, and far differing from that which he was reported to be, in a certain English book set out in queen Mary's time, which saith that there were three only in England, whose conscience had never been stained in religion: of whom he falsely saith, the aforesaid bishop of Winchester was one.

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN WEBB, GENTLEMAN, GEORGE ROPER, and GREGORY PARKE, at CANTERBURY.

JOHN WEBB was brought before the bishop of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, or some other deputed in their room, on the 16th of September, and there had propounded unto him such articles as were commonly administered by Bonner to those of his jurisdiction: and being willed for that present to depart, and to deliberate with himself upon the matter, against the next time of his appearance; he made answer, that he would no otherwise say (by God's grace) than he had already said, which was this: As touching the sacrament of Christ's body, said he, I do believe it to be left unto his church, (with thanksgiving) in commemoration of his death and passion, until his coming again. So that it is left in remembrance of his body, and not by words of consecration to be made wholly his body, really, substantially, and the same body that was born of the virgin Mary: I utterly deny that.

After this (besides fundry other times) the third day of October, the said John Webb, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, were all brought together before the said judges; who there and then agreeing, and stedfastly allowing the former answer made before by Mr. Webb, were by the bloody prelates adjudged heretics; and therefore about the end of the same month they were brought out of prison together to the place of martyrdom; saying certain psalms mournfully as they were going to the stake.

And being thus brought (as I said) to the stake, and there encompassed about with a chain, were burnt all together in one fire at Canterbury, most patiently enduring their torments, and accounting themselves happy and blessed of the Lord that they were made worthy to suffer for Christ's gospel sake.

A short Account of WILLIAM WISEMAN.

THE 13th of December, William Wiseman, a cloth-worker of London, died in Lollards' Tower, where he was in prison and bonds for the gospel of Christ: some thought, that either through famine, or ill handling of some murdering papists, he was made away. By reason whereof the coroner, named John Gibbes, gentleman, with an inquest of twelve men, sat upon him, who, although to outward appearance were said to find nothing in him else but only God's visitation, yet what other privy causes there might be of his death, the Lord knoweth, I have not to say.

After the said William Wiseman was departed (as is said) in the Tower, the papists cast him out into the fields, commanding that no man should bury him; according as their devout manner is to do with all such as die in like sort, whom they account as profane, and worthy of no burial, but to be cast to dogs and birds. And yet notwithstanding this their merciless commandment, some good Tobits there were who buried him in the evening, as commonly they did all the rest thrown out in like manner; whom they were wont privily by night to cover, and many times the archers in the fields standing by, and singing psalms together at their burial.

In the same month of December, James Gore also died in prison at Colchester, laid there in bonds for the truth of God's word.

The History of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, who was examined, condemned, and martyred for the Defence of the GOSPEL of CHRIST.

THE troubles of Mr. Philpot have been partly related before, in the beginning of queen Mary's time, in prosecuting the disputation in the convocation-house. He came of a worshipful family, the son of a knight, born in Hampshire, brought up at New College in Oxford, where he studied the civil law about six or seven years, besides other liberal arts, especially languages, and particularly he wonderfully advanced in the Hebrew tongue.

From Oxford, desirous to see other countries, as occasion served thereunto, he went over into Italy and places thereabouts, where he coming upon a time from Venice to Padua, was in danger through a certain Franciscan friar accompanying him in his journey, who, coming to Padua, sought to accuse him of heresy. At length returning into England, as the time ministered more boldness unto him in the days of king Edward, he had divers conflicts with bishop Gardiner in the city of Winchester.

After that, having an advowson by the said bishop, he was made there archdeacon of Winchester, under Dr. Poinet, who then succeeded Gardiner in that bishopric. Thus he continued during the time of king Edward, to the great profit of those parts thereabouts. When that pious king was taken away, and Mary his sister came in place, whose study was wholly bent to alter the state of religion in the woeful realm of England: first she caused a convocation of the prelates and learned men to be assembled for the accomplishment of her desire.

In which convocation, Mr. Philpot being present, according to his room and degree, with a few others, sustained the cause of the gospel manfully against the contrary part (as has been already recited), for which cause, notwithstanding the liberty of the house promised before, he was called to account before bishop Gardiner the chancellor, then being his ordinary, by whom he was first examined, although that examination came not to our hands. From thence again he was removed to bishop Bonner, and other commissioners, with whom he had divers conflicts, as may appear by the following examinations.

The FIRST EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS, Mr. CHOLMLEY, Mr. ROPER, and Dr. STORY, and one of the SCRIBES of the ARCHES, at Newgate Sessions-Hall, October 2, 1555.

Roper. WE hear say that you are out of the catholic church, and have been a disturber of the same; out of which whoso is, he cannot be the child of salvation. Wherefore if you will come into the same, you shall be received and find favour.

Philpot. I am come before your worshipful master-ships at your appointment, understanding that you are magistrates authorized by the queen's majesty, whom I own and will do my due obedience unto the uttermost. Wherefore I desire to know what cause I have offended in, for which I am now called before you. And if I cannot be charged with any particular matter done contrary to the laws of this realm, I desire your master-ships, that I may have the benefit of a subject, and be delivered out of my wrongful imprisonment, where I have lain a year and a half, without any calling to answer before now, and my living taken from me without law.

Roper. Though we have no particular matter to charge you withal, yet we may by our commission and by the law, drive you to answer to the suspicion of a slander going on you: and besides this, we have statutes to charge you herein withal.

Philpot. If I have offended any statute, charge me therewithal, and if I have incurred the penalty thereof, punish me accordingly. And because you are magistrates and executors of the queen's majesty's laws, by force whereof you do now sit, I desire that if I be found no notorious transgressor of any of them, I may not be burdened with more than I have done.

Cholmley. If the justice do suspect a felon, he may examine him upon suspicion thereof, and commit him to prison though there be no fault done.

Story. I perceive whereabout this man goeth: he is plain in Cardmaker's case, for he made the same allegations. But they will not serve thee; for thou art an heretic, and holdest against the blessed mass: how sayest thou to that?

Philpot. I am no heretic.

Story. I will prove thee an heretic. Whatsoever hath held against the blessed mass is an heretic: but thou hast held against the same, therefore thou art an heretic.

Philpot. That which I spake, and which you are able to charge me withal, was in the convocation, where, by the queen's majesty's will and her whole council, liberty was given to every man of the house to utter his conscience, and to speak his mind freely of such questions in religion, as there were propounded by the prolocutor; for which now I thought not to be molested and imprisoned as I have been, neither now be compelled by you to answer for the same.

Story. Thou shalt go to Lollards' Tower, and be handled there like an heretic as thou art, and answer to the same that thou there didst speak, and be judged by the bishop of London.

Philpot. I have already been convented of this matter before the lord chancellor, mine ordinary, who this long time hath kept me in prison: therefore, if his lordship will take my life away, as he hath done my liberty and living, he may; which I think he cannot do of his conscience, and therefore hath let me lie thus long in prison: wherefore I am content to abide the end of him herein, that is mine ordinary, and do refuse the auditory of the bishop of London, because he is an incompetent judge for me, and not mine ordinary.

Story. But, sir, thou spakest words in the convocation-house, which is in the bishop of London's diocese, and therefore thou shalt be carried to Lollards' Tower, to be judged by him for the words thou spakest in his diocese against the blessed mass.

Philpot. Sir, you know it is against all equity, that I should be twice vexed for one cause, and that by such as by the law have nothing to do with me.

Roper. You cannot deny, but that you spoke against the mass in the convocation-house.

Story. Dost thou deny that which thou spakest there, or no?

Philpot. I cannot deny that I have spoken there, and if by the law you may put me to death for it, I am here ready to suffer whatsoever I shall be judged unto.

Story. Marshal, take him home with you again, and see that you bring him again on Thursday, and then we shall rid your fingers of him, and afterwards of your other heretics.

The SECOND EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS, Mr. CHOLMLEY, Mr. ROPER, Dr. STORY, Dr. COOK, and the SCRIBE, Oct. 24, 1555, at Newgate Sessions-Hall.

AT my coming, a man of Aldgate, of mine acquaintance, said unto me, God have mercy on you, for you are already condemned in this world; for Dr. Story said, that my lord chancellor had commanded to do you away. After a little conversation had between them, Mr. Cholmley called me unto him, saying:

Cholmley. Mr. Philpot, shew yourself a wise man, and be not stubborn in your own opinion, but be conformable to the queen's proceedings, and live, and you shall be well assured of great favour and reputation.

Philpot. I shall do as it becometh a christian man to do.

Story. This man is the rankest heretic that hath been in all my lord chancellor's diocese, and hath done more hurt than any man else there: and therefore his pleasure is, that he should have the law to proceed against him, and then to recant or else burn.

Cook. This man hath most stoutly maintained heresies since the queen's coming in, above any that I have heard of; therefore it is most meet that he should be adjudged by the bishop of London, for the heresies he hath maintained.

Philpot. I have maintained no heresies.

Cook. No, have you not? Did you not openly speak against the sacrament of the altar in the convocation-house? Call you that no heresy? wilt thou recant that or not?

Philpot. It was the queen's majesty's pleasure that we should reason thereof, not by my seeking, but by other men's procuring, in the hearing of the council.

Cook. Did the queen give you leave to be an heretic? you may be sure her grace will not do so. Well, we will not dispute that matter with you; my lord of London shall proceed by inquisition upon thee, and if thou wilt not recant, thou shalt be burned.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary in this behalf, and I have already answered unto mine ordinary in this matter: and therefore, (as I have said before) you shall do me great wrong, to vex me twice for one matter, since I have sustained this long imprisonment, besides the loss of my living.

Roper. You were a very unmeet man to be an archdeacon.

Philpot. I know I was as meet a man as he that hath it now.

Cook. A meet man, quoth he? He troubled Mr. Roper and the whole country.

Philpot. There never was poor archdeacon so handled at your hands as I am, and that without any just cause you be able to lay unto me.

Cook. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. I am archdeacon still, although another be in possession of my living; for I was never deprived by any law.

Cook. No, sir, that needeth not: for a notorious heretic should have no ordinary proceeding about his deprivation; but the bishop may, upon knowledge thereof, proceed to deprivation.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you know that the common law is otherwise: and besides this, the statutes of this realm be otherwise, which gave this benefit to every person, though he be an heretic, to enjoy his living until he be put to death for the same.

Cholmley. No, there thou art deceived.

Philpot. Upon the living I mind nor. But the unjust dealing grieveth me, that I should be thus troubled for my conscience, contrary to all law.

Cholmley. Why, will not you agree that the queen's majesty may cause you to be examined of your faith?

Philpot. Ask you Mr. Doctor Cook, and he will tell you that the temporal magistrates have nothing to do with faith, for determination thereof. And St. Ambrose saith, that the things of God are not subject to the power and authority of princes.

Cook. No, may not the temporal power commit you to be examined of your faith to the bishop?

Philpot. Yea, sir. I deny not that; but you will grant that the same may examine any of their own authority.

Cook. Let him be had away.

Philpot. Your mastership promised me the last time

The Martyrdom of the Rev<sup>d</sup> M<sup>R</sup> JOHN PHILPOT, Arch-Deacon of Winchester.

I was before you, I should see your commission by what authority you do call me, and whether I by the same be bound to answer to so much as you demand.

Roper. Let him see the commission.

The scribe then exhibited it to Mr. Roper, and was about to open the same.

Cook. Fo, what will you do? he shall not see it.

Philpot. Then you do me wrong to call me and vex me, not shewing your authority in this behalf.

Cook. If we do you wrong, complain of us: and in the mean time thou shalt lie in the Lollards' Tower.

Philpot. Sir, I am a poor gentleman; therefore I trust to your gentleness that you will not commit me to so vile and straight a place, being found no heinous trespasser.

Cook. Thou art no gentleman.

Philpot. Yes, that I am.

Cook. An heretic is no gentleman: for he is a gentleman that hath gentle conditions.

Philpot. The offence cannot take away the state of a gentleman as long as he liveth, although he were a traitor: but I mean not to boast of my gentleness, but will put it under my foot, since you do no more esteem it.

Story. What, will you suffer this heretic to prate all the day?

Cook. He saith he is a gentleman.

Story. A gentleman, said he? he is a vile heretic knave: for an heretic is no gentleman. Let the keeper of the Lollards' Tower come in, and have him away.

Keeper. Here sir.

Story. Take this man with you to the Lollards' Tower, or else to the bishop's coal-house.

Philpot. Sir, if I were a dog, you could not appoint me a worse nor a more vile place: but I must be content with whatsoever injury you do offer me. God give you a more merciful heart, you are very cruel upon one that hath never offended you. I pray you Mr. Cholmley, shew me some friendship that I may not be carried to so vile a place. And he then called me aside, and said:

Cholmley. I neither understand their doings nor their laws; I cannot tell what they mean. I would I could do you good.

Philpot. I am content to go whither you will have me. There never was a man more cruelly handled than I am at your hands, that without just cause known should thus be treated.

Story. Shall we suffer this heretic thus to reprove us? Have him hence.

Philpot. God forgive you, and give you more merciful hearts, and shew you more mercy in the time of need: "Do quickly that you have in hand."

Story. Do you not hear how he maketh us like Judas?

Philpot. This is after your own understanding.

After this, I with four others were brought to the keeper's house in Pater-noster-row, where we supped, and after supper I was called up to a chamber by the archdeacon of London's servant, and that in his master's name, who offered me a bed for that night. To whom I gave thanks, saying, That it would be a grief to me to lie one night well, and the next night worse: wherefore I will begin (said I) as I am like to continue to take such part as my fellows do. And with that we were brought through Pater-noster-row to my lord of London's coal-house; unto which is joined a little blind house, with a great pair of stocks, appointed both for hand and foot: but thanks be to God we have not played of those organs yet, although some before us have tried them; and there we found a minister of Essex, a married priest, a man of godly zeal, with one other poor man. And this minister at my coming desired to speak with me, and did greatly lament his own infirmity, for that through extremity of imprisonment he was constrained by writing to yield to the bishop of London: whereupon he was once set at liberty, and afterward felt such a hell in his conscience that he could scarce refrain from destroying himself, and never could be at quiet until he went to the bishop's register, desiring to see his bill again; which as soon as he had received, he tore it in pieces, and after he was as joyful as any man might be. Of which when my lord of London understood he sent for him, and fell upon him like a lion, and like a manly bishop buttered him well, so that he made his face black and blue, and plucked away a great piece of his beard: but now, thanks be to God, he is as joyful under the cross as any of us, and very sorry for his former infirmity. I write this, because I would all men to take heed, how they do contrary to their conscience; which is, to fall into the pains of hell.

The MANNER of my being called first before the BISHOP of LONDON, the second Night of mine Imprisonment in his COAL-HOUSE.

THE bishop sent Mr. Johnson his register to me with a mess of meat, and a good pot of drink and bread, saying, that my lord had no knowledge before of my being here, for which he was sorry: therefore he had sent me and my fellows that meat, not knowing whether I would receive the same.

I thanked God for my lord's charity, that it pleased him to remember poor prisoners, desiring Almighty God to increase the same in him, and in all others; and therefore I would not refuse his beneficence, and therewith took the same unto my brethren, praising God for his providence towards his afflicted flock, that he stirred our adversaries up to help the same in their necessity.

Johnson. My lord would know the cause of your being sent hither (for he knoweth nothing thereof), and wondereth that he should be troubled with prisoners that are not of his own diocese.

Philpot. I declared unto him the whole cause. After which he said, My lord's will was, that I should have any friendship I would desire, and so departed.

Within a while after, one of my lord's gentlemen came for me; and I was brought into his presence, where he sat at a table with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his register.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.

With that, because he so gently put forth his hand, I to render courtesy for courtesy, kissed my hand and gave him the same.

Bonner. I am right sorry for your trouble, and I promise you that till within these two hours, I knew not of your being here. I pray you tell me what was the cause of your being sent hither: for I promise you I know nothing thereof as yet, neither would I you should think that I was the cause thereof: and I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters; but I must be obedient to my betters, and I fear men speak otherwise of me than I deserve.

Philpot. I shewed him the sum of the matter; that it was for the disputation in the convocation-house, for which I was against all right molested.

Bonner. I marvel that you should be troubled for that, if there was none other cause but this. But peradventure you have maintained the same since, and some of your friends of late have asked, whether you do stand to the same, and you have said, yea; and for this you might be committed to prison.

Philpot. If it shall please your lordship I am burdened no otherwise than I have told you, by the commissioners who sent me hither, because I would not recant the same.

Bonner. A man may speak in the parliament-house, though it be a place of free speech, so as he may be imprisoned for it, as in case he speak words of high-treason against the king or queen; and so it might be that you spake otherwise than it became you of the church of Christ.

Philpot. I spake nothing which was out of the articles which were called in question, and agreed upon to be disputed by the whole house, and by permission of the queen and council.

Bonner. Why, may we dispute of our faith?

5 A

Philpot.

Philpot. That we may.

Bonner. Nay, I think not, by the law.

Philpot. Indeed by the civil law I know it is not lawful, but by God's law we may reason thereof. For St. Peter saith, "Be ye ready to render account unto all men of the hope which is in you, that demand of you the same."

Bonner. Indeed, St. Peter saith so. Why, then I ask of you what your judgment is of the sacrament of the altar.

Philpot. My lord, St. Ambrose saith, that the disputation of faith ought to be in the congregation, in the hearing of the people, and that I am not bound to render account thereof to every man privately, unless it be to edify. But now I cannot shew you my mind, but I must run upon the pikes in danger of my life for it. Wherefore as the said doctor said unto Valentinian the emperor, so say I to your lordship; Take away the law, and I shall reason with you. And yet if I come in open judgment, where I am bound by the law to answer, I trust I shall utter my conscience as freely as any that hath come before you.

Bonner. I perceive you are learned, I would have such as you be about me. But you must come and be of the church, for there is but one church.

Philpot. God forbid I should be out of the church, I am sure I am within the same: for I know as I am taught by the scripture, that there is but one catholic church, one dove, one spouse, one beloved congregation, out of which there is no salvation.

Bonner. How chanceth it then, that you go out of the same, and walk not with us?

Philpot. My lord, I am sure I am within the bounds of the church whereupon she is built, which is the word of God.

Bonner. What age are you of?

Philpot. I am four and forty.

Bonner. You are not now of the same faith your godfather and godmothers promised for you, in which you were baptized.

Philpot. Yes, I thank God I am: for I was baptized into the faith of Christ which I now hold.

Bonner. How can that be? there is but one faith.

Philpot. I am assured of that by St. Paul, saying, "That there is but one God, one faith, and one baptism," of which I am.

Bonner. You were twenty years ago of another faith than you are now.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, to tell you plain, I was then of no faith, a neuter, a wicked liver, neither hot nor cold.

Bonner. Why, do you not think that we have now the true faith?

Philpot. I desire your lordship to hold me excused for answering at this time. I am sure that God's word was thoroughly with the primitive church, and all the ancient fathers do agree with this faith I am of.

Bonner. Well, I promise you I mean you no more hurt than to mine own person: I will not therefore burthen you with your conscience now; I marvel that you are so merry in prison as you are, singing and rejoicing, as the prophet saith, Rejoicing in your naughtiness. Methinks you do not well herein; you should rather lament and be sorry.

Philpot. My lord, the mirth that we make is but in singing certain psalms, according as we are commanded by St. Paul, willing us to be merry in the Lord, singing together in hymns and psalms: and I trust your lordship cannot be displeased with that.

Bonner. We may say unto you as Christ said in the gospel, "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced——"

Here my lord stumbled, and could not bring forth the text, and required his chaplains to help, and to put him in remembrance of the text better; but they were mum: and I recited out the text unto him, which made nothing to his purpose, unless he would have us to mourn, because they, if they laugh, sing still sorrowful things unto us, threatening faggots and fire.

Philpot. We are, my lord, in a dark comfortable place, and therefore it behoveth us to be merry, lest, as Solomon saith, sorrowfulness eat up our heart. Therefore I trust your lordship will not be angry for our singing of psalms, since St. Paul saith, "If any man be of an upright mind, let him sing." And we therefore, to testify that we are of an upright mind to God, (though we be in misery) do sing.

Bonner. I will trouble you no farther as now. If I can do you any good, I shall be glad to do it for you. God be with you, good Mr. Philpot, and give you a good night. Have him to the cellar, and let him drink a cup of wine.

Thus I departed and by my lord's register I was brought to his cellar door, where I drank a good cup of wine. And my lord's chaplain, Mr. Cousin, followed me, making acquaintance, saying, that I was welcome, and wished that I would not be singular.

Philpot. I am well taught the contrary by Solomon, saying, Woe be to him that is alone. After that I was carried to my lord's coal-house again, where I with my six companions do house together in straw as cheerfully (we thank God) as others do in their beds of down. Thus for the third fit.

The FOURTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, in the ARCHDEACON of LONDON's House, in the Month of OCTOBER, before the BISHOPS of LONDON, BATH, WORCESTER, and GLOUCESTER.

BONNER. Mr. Philpot, it hath pleased my lords to take pains here to-day, to dine with my poor archdeacon, and in the dinner-time it chanced us to have communication of you, and you were pitied here by many that knew you at New College, in Oxford. And I also do pity your case, because you seem unto me by the talk I had with you the other night, to be learned: and therefore now I have sent for you to come before them, that it might not be said hereafter, that I had so many learned bishops at my house, and yet would not vouchsafe them to talk with you, and at my request (I thank them) they are content so to do. Now therefore utter your mind freely, and you shall with all favour be satisfied. I am sorry to see you lie in so evil a case as you do, and would fain you should do better, as you may if you please.

Bath. My lords here have not sent for you to fawn upon you, but for charity sake to exhort you to come into the right catholic church.

Worcester. Before he beginneth to speak, it is best that he call upon God for grace, and to pray that it might please God to open his heart, that he may conceive the truth.

Philpot. With that I fell down upon my knees before them, and made my prayer on this manner:

"Almighty God, which art the giver of all wisdom and understanding, I beseech thee of thine infinite goodness and mercy in Jesus Christ, to give me (most vile sinner in thy sight) the spirit of wisdom to speak and make answer in thy cause, that it may be to the satisfaction of the hearers, before whom I stand, and also to my better understanding if I be deceived in any thing."

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Worcester, you did not well to exhort him to make any prayer. For this is the thing they have a singular pride in, that they can often make their vain prayers, in which they glory much. For in this point they are much like to certain arrant heretics, of whom Pliny maketh mention, that did daily sing praise unto God before dawning of the day.

Philpot. My lord, God make me and all you here present such heretics as those were that sung those morning hymns: for they were right christians, with whom the tyrants of the world were offended with their well doing.

Bath. Proceed to what he hath to say. He hath prayed I cannot tell for what.

Bonner. Say on, Mr. Philpot; my lords will gladly hear you.

Philpot.

Philpot. I have, my lords, been these twelve months and a half in prison without any just cause that I know, and my living taken from me without any lawful order, and now I am brought (contrary to right) from my own territory and ordinary, into another man's jurisdiction, I know not why. Wherefore, if your lordships can burden me with any evil done, I stand here before you to purge me of the same. And if no such thing may be justly laid to my charge, I desire to be released of this wrongful trouble.

Bonner. There is none here that goeth about to trouble you, but to do you good, if we can. For I promise you, you were sent hither to me, without my knowledge. Therefore speak your conscience without any fear.

Philpot. My lord, I have learned to answer in matters of religion in the congregation, being thereto lawfully called: but now I am not lawfully called, neither is here a just congregation where I ought to answer.

Bonner. Indeed this man told me the last time I spake with him, that he was a lawyer, and would not utter his conscience in matters of faith, unless it were in the hearing of the people, where he might speak to vain-glory.

Philpot. My lord, I said that I was not a lawyer, neither did I arrogate to myself that name, although I was once a novice in the same, where I learned something for mine own defence, when I am called in judgment to answer to any cause, and whereby I have been taught not to put myself further in danger than I need, and so far am I a lawyer, and no farther.

Bath. If you will not answer to my lord's request, you seem to be a wilful man in your opinion.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary before whom I am bound to answer in this behalf, as Mr. D. Cole (who is a lawyer) can well tell you by the law. And I have not offended my lord of London wherefore he should call me.

Bonner. Yes, I have to lay to your charge, that you have offended in my diocese, by speaking against the blessed sacrament of the altar: and therefore I may call you, and proceed against you to punish you by the law.

Philpot. I have not offended in your diocese. For that which I spake in the sacrament was in Paul's church in the convocation-house, which (as I understand) is a peculiar jurisdiction belonging to the dean thereof, and therefore is counted of your lordship's diocese, but not in your diocese.

Bonner. Is not Paul's church in my diocese? Well, I think it costeth me a good deal of money in the year, the leading thereof.

Philpot. That may be, and yet be exempted from your lordship's jurisdiction. And if I had so offended in your diocese, yet I ought by the law to be sent to my ordinary, if I require it, and not to be punished by you that are not my ordinary. And already (as I have told you) I have been convented of mine ordinary for this cause, which you go about to enquire of me.

Bonner. How say you, Mr. D. Cole, may not I proceed against him by the law, for what he hath done in my diocese?

Cole. I think Mr. Philpot needeth not to stand so much with your lordship in that point as he doth, since you seek not to hinder him, but to further him: therefore I think it best that he go to the matter that is laid against him of the convocation, and make no longer delay.

Philpot. I would willingly shew my mind of the matter, but I am sure it will be laid against me to my prejudice when I come to judgment.

Cole. Why then you may speak by protestation.

Philpot. But what shall my protestation avail in a cause of heresy (as you call it), if I speak otherwise than you will have me; since that which I spake in the convocation-house, being a place privileged, cannot now help me?

Bonner. But, Mr. D. Cole, may not I proceed against him for that offence he hath done in my diocese?

Cole. You may call him before you, my lord, if he be found in your diocese.

Philpot. But I have by force been brought out of my own diocese to my lord's, and required to be judged by my own ordinary: and therefore I know Mr. Doctor will not say of his own knowledge, that your lordship ought to proceed against me. And here Mr. Doctor would say nothing.

Worcester. Do you not think to find before my lord here, as good equity in your cause, as before your own ordinary?

Philpot. I cannot blame my lord of London's equity, with whom (I thank his lordship) I have found more gentleness since I came, than of mine own ordinary (I speak it for no flattery) this year and half before, who never would call me to answer, as his lordship hath done now twice. No man is forbid to use his own right due unto him; but I ought not to be forestalled of my right, and therefore I challenge the same for divers other considerations.

Bonner. Now you cannot say hereafter but that you have been gently communed with by my lords here, and yet you will be wilful and obstinate in your error, and in your own opinions, and will not shew any cause why you will not come into the unity of the church with us.

Philpot. My lords, in that I do not declare my mind according to your expectations, is (as I have said) because I cannot speak without present danger of my life. But rather than you should report me by this either obstinate or self-willed without any just ground whereupon I stand; I will open unto you somewhat of my mind, or rather the whole, desiring your lordships, which seem to be the pillars of the church of England, to satisfy me in the same: and I will refer all other causes in which I dissent from you, unto one or two articles, or rather to one, which includeth them both; in which if I can by the scriptures be satisfied at your mouths, I shall as willingly agree to you as to any other, in all points.

Bonner. These heretics come always with their ifs, as this man doth now, saying, if he can be satisfied by the scriptures: so that he will always have this exception, I am not satisfied, although the matter be ever so plainly proved against him. But will you promise to be satisfied, if my lords take some pains about you?

Philpot. I say, my lord, I will be satisfied by the scriptures in that wherein I stand. And I protest here before God and his eternal Son Jesus Christ my Saviour, and the Holy Ghost, and his angels, and you here present who be judges of what I speak, that I do not stand in any opinion of wilfulness or singularity, but only upon my conscience, certainly informed by God's word, from which I dare not go for fear of damnation: and this is the cause of mine earnestness in this behalf.

Bonner. I will trouble my lords no longer, seeing that you will not declare your mind.

Philpot. I am about so to do, if it please your lordship to hear me speak.

Bath. Give me leave, my lord, to hear what he hath to say.

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that the chief cause why you do count me, and such as I am, for heretics, is because we be not at unity with your church. You say, that whosoever is out of your church is damned: and we think verily on the other side, that if we depart from the true church, whereon we are grafted in God's word, we should stand in the state of damnation. Wherefore if your lordships can bring any better authority for your church than we can do for our's, and prove by the scriptures that the church of Rome now (of which you are) is the true catholic church, as in all sermons, writings and arguments you do uphold, and that all christian persons ought to be ruled by the same, under pain of damnation, (as you say) and that the same church (as you pretend) hath authority to interpret the scriptures as it seemeth her good, and that all men are bound to follow such interpretations only; I shall be as conformable to the same church as you may desire me, which otherwise I dare not: therefore I require you for God's sake to satisfy me in this.

Cole. If you stand upon this point only, you may soon be satisfied if you please.

Philpot. It is the thing that I require, and to this I will stand, and refer all other controversies wherein I now stand against you, and will put my hand thereto, if you mistrust my word.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Philpot, what faith were you of twenty years ago? This man will have every year a new faith.

Philpot. My lord, to tell you plain, I think I was of no faith; for I was then a wicked liver, and knew not God then as I ought to do, God forgive me.

Bonner. No faith? that is not so. I am sure you were of some faith.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared to you on my conscience what I then was, and judge of myself. And what is that to the purpose of the thing I desire to be satisfied of you?

Bonner. Mr. Doctor Cole, I pray you speak your mind to him.

Cole. What will you say, if I can prove it was decreed by an universal council in Athanasius's time, that all the christian church should follow the determination of the church of Rome? but I do not now remember where.

Philpot. If you, Mr. Doctor, can shew me the same granted to the see of Rome by the authority of the scripture, I will gladly hearken thereto. But I think you be not able to shew any such thing: for Athanasius was president of the Nicene council, and there was no such thing decreed I am sure.

Cole. Though it were not then, it might be at another time.

Philpot. I desire to see the proof thereof.

And upon this Mr. Harpsfield, the chancellor to the bishop of London, brought in a book of Ireneus, with certain leaves turned in, and laid it before the bishops to help them in their perplexity, if it might be: which after the bishops of Bath and Gloucester had read together, the bishop of Gloucester gave me the book, and said:

Take the book, Mr. Philpot, and look upon that place, and there you may see how the church of Rome is to be followed of all men.

Philpot. I took the book and read the place, which after I had read, I said it made nothing against me, but against Arians and other heretics, against whom Ireneus wrote, proving that they were not to be credited, because they did teach and follow after strange doctrine in Europe, and that the chief church of the same, was founded by Peter and Paul, and had to this time continued by faithful succession of the faithful bishops in preaching the true gospel, as they had received of the apostles, and nothing like to these late sprung heretics, &c. Whereby he concludeth against them, that they were not to be heard, neither to be credited, which thing, if you, my lords, be able to prove of the church of Rome, then had you as good authority against me in my cause now, as Ireneus had against those heretics. But the church of Rome hath swerved from the truth and simplicity of the gospel which it maintained in Ireneus's time, and was uncorrupted from that which it is now, wherefore your lordships cannot justly apply the authority of Ireneus to the church of Rome now, which is so manifestly corrupted from the primitive church.

Bonner. So will you say still it maketh nothing to the purpose, whatsoever authority we bring, and will never be satisfied.

Philpot. My lord, when I do by just reason prove, that the authorities which are brought against me do not make to the purpose, as I have already proved, I trust you will receive mine answer.

Worcester. It is to be proved most manifestly by all ancient writers, that the see of Rome hath always followed the truth, and never was deceived, until of late certain heretics had defaced the same.

Philpot. Let that be proved, and I have done.

Worcester. Nay, you are of such arrogancy, singularity, and vain-glory, that you will never see it, be it ever so well proved.

Philpot. Ha, my lords, is it now time, think you, for me to follow singularity or vain-glory, since it is now upon danger of my life and death, not only presently, but also before God to come? And I know if I die not in the true faith, I shall die everlastingly: and again I know, if I do not as you would have me, you will kill me, and a great many more: yet I had rather to perish at your hands, than to perish eternally. And at this time I have lost all my commodities of this world, and lay in a coal-house, where a man would not lay a dog, with which I am well contented.

Cole. Where are you able to prove that the church of Rome hath erred at any time? and by what history? Certain it is by Eusebius, that the church was established at Rome by Peter and Paul, and that Peter was bishop twenty-five years at Rome.

Philpot. I know well that Eusebius so writeth: but if we compare that which St. Paul writeth to the Galatians, chap. 1. the contrary will manifestly appear, that he was not half so long there. He lived not past thirty-five years after he was called to be an apostle: and St. Paul maketh mention of his abiding at Jerusalem after Christ's death more than thirteen years.

Cole. What did Peter write to the Galatians?

Philpot. No, I say Paul maketh mention of Peter, writing to the Galatians, and of his abiding at Jerusalem. And further, I am able to prove, both by Eusebius and other historiographers, that the church of Rome hath manifestly erred, and at this present doth err, because she agreeth not with that which they wrote. The primitive church did use according to the gospel, and there needeth none other proof, but to compare the one with the other.

Bonner. I may compare this man to a certain man I read of, who fell into a desperation, and went into a wood to hang himself, and when he came there, he went viewing of every tree, and could find none on which he might vouchsafe to hang himself. But I will not apply this as I might. I pray you (Mr. Doctor) go forth with him.

Cole. My lord, there be on every side of me, some who are better able to answer him, and I love not to fall into disputation: for we now-a-days sustain shame and obloquy thereby of the people. I had rather shew my mind in writing.

Philpot. And I had rather you should do so than otherwise, for then a man may better judge of your words, than by argument, and I beseech you so to do. But if I were a rich man, I durst wager an hundred pounds that you shall not be able to shew that you have said, to be decreed by a general council in Athanasius's time. For this I am sure of, that it was concluded by a general council in Africa, many years after, that none of Africa (under pain of excommunication) should appeal to Rome: which decree I am sure they would not have made, if by the scriptures and by an universal council it had been decreed, that all men should abide and follow the determination of the church of Rome.

Cole. But I can shew that they revoked that error again.

Philpot. So you say, Mr. Doctor, but I pray you shew me where. I have hitherto heard nothing from you to my satisfaction, but bare words without any authority.

Bonner. What, I pray you, ought we to dispute with you of our faith? Justinian in the law hath a title, De fide Catholica, to the contrary.

Philpot. I am certain the civil law hath such a constitution: but our friend must not depend upon the civil law. For as St. Ambrose saith, Not the law, but the gospel hath gathered the church together.

Worcester. Mr. Philpot, you have the spirit of pride wherewith you be led, which will not let you yield to the truth: leave it off for shame.

Philpot. Sir, I am sure I have the spirit of faith, by which which I speak at this present; neither am I ashamed to stand to my faith.

Gloucester. What? do you think yourself better learned than so many notable learned men as be here?

Philpot. Elias alone had the truth, when there were four hundred priests against him.

Worcester. Oh, you would be counted now for Elias.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, my lords will trouble you no farther at this time, but you shall go from whence you came, and have such favour as in the mean while I can shew you: and upon Wednesday next you shall be called upon again to be heard what you can say for the maintenance of your error.

Then the bishops rose up, and consulted together, and caused a writing to be made, in which I think my blood by them was bought and sold, and thereto they put their hands; and after this I was carried to my coal-house again.

The FIFTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the BISHOPS of LONDON, ROCHESTER, St. ASAPH, &c. and others, in the GALLERY of my LORD of LONDON'S PALACE.

AFTER much prefatory discourse commenced by Bishop Bonner, the bishop of St. Asaph thus began.

What say you now? Is there not in the blessed sacrament of the altar (and with that they all put off their caps for reverence of the idol) the presence of our Saviour Christ, really and substantially after the words of consecration?

Philpot. I do believe in the sacrament of Christ's body, duly ministered, to be such manner of presence, as the word teacheth me to believe.

St. Asaph. I pray you, how is that?

Philpot. As for that I will declare another time, when I shall be lawfully called to dispute my mind of this matter, but I am not yet driven to that point. And the scripture saith, "All things ought to be done after an order."

Another Bishop. This is a froward and vain-glorious man.

Bonner. It is not lawful for a man by the civil laws to dispute of his faith openly, as it appeareth in the title, De summa Trinitate & fide Catholica.

Philpot. My lord, I have answered you to this question before.

Bonner. Why, I never asked thee of this before now.

Philpot. Yes, and moreover I answered your lordship by St. Ambrose, that the church is congregated by the word, and not by man's law. Wherefore I now add further of this saying, "That he which refuseth the word, and objecteth the law, is an unjust man, because the just shall live by faith." And moreover, my lord, the title which your lordship alledgeth out of the law, maketh it unlawful to dispute of all the articles of the faith, but of the Trinity.

Bonner. Thou liest, it is not so: and I will shew you by the book how ignorant he is.

And with that he went with all haste to his study, and brought his book, and openly read the text and title of the law, and charged me with such words as seemed to make for his purpose, saying, How sayest thou to this?

Philpot. My lord, I say as I said before, that the law meaneth of the catholic faith, determined in the council of Chalcedon, where the articles of the creed were only concluded upon.

Bonner. Thou art the veriest beast that ever I heard, I must needs speak it, thou compellest me thereunto.

Philpot. Your lordship may speak your pleasure of me.

Bonner. I must needs proceed against thee tomorrow.

Philpot. If your lordship so do, I will have Exceptionem fori: for you are not my competent judge.

Bonner. By what law canst thou refuse me to be thy judge?

Philpot. By the civil law, De competente judice.

Bonner. There is no such title in the law. In what book is it, as cunning a lawyer as you are?

Philpot. My lord, I take upon me no great cunning in the law: but you drive me to my shifts for my defence, and I am sure if I had the books of the law, I am able to shew what I say.

Bonner. What, De competente judice? I will go bring thee my books. There is a title indeed, De officiis judicis ordinarii.

Philpot. Verily, that is the same De competente judice, which I have alledged. With that he ran to his study, and brought the whole course of the law.

Bonner. There are the books: find it now if thou canst, and I will promise to release thee out of prison.

Philpot. My lord, I stand not here to reason matters of the civil law, although I am not altogether ignorant of the same; for that I have been a student in the law six or seven years; but to answer to the articles of faith with which you may lawfully burden me. And whereas you go about unlawfully to proceed, I challenge, according to my knowledge, the benefit of the law in my defence.

Bonner. Why, thou wilt answer directly to nothing thou art charged with: therefore say not hereafter but you might have been satisfied here by learned men, if you would have declared your mind.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared my mind unto you and to other of the bishops at my last being with you, desiring you to be satisfied but of one thing, whereunto I have referred all other controversies: which if your lordships now, or other learned men can simply resolve me of, I am as contented to be conformable in all things, as you shall require; which is to prove that the church of Rome is the catholic church.

St. Asaph. It is most evident that St. Peter did build the catholic church at Rome. And Christ said, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church." Moreover the succession of bishops in the see of Rome can be proved from time to time, as it can be of none other place so well, which is a manifest probation of the catholic church, as divers doctors do write.

Philpot. That you would have to be undoubted, is most uncertain, and that by the authority which you alledge of Christ, saying unto Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," unless you can prove that rock to signify Rome, as you would make me falsely believe. And although you can prove the succession of bishops from Peter, yet this is not sufficient to prove Rome the catholic church, unless you can prove the profession of Peter's faith, whereupon the catholic church is built, to have continued in his successors at Rome, and at this present to remain.

Coventry. I pray you, can you tell what this word catholic doth signify? shew if you can.

Philpot. Yes, that I can, I thank God. The catholic faith, or the catholic church, is not as now-a-days the people are taught, to be that which is most universal, or by most part of men received, whereby you do infer our faith to hang upon the multitude, which is not so: but I esteem the catholic church to be as St. Austin defineth the same: "We judge, saith he, the catholic faith, of that which hath been, is, and shall be." So that if you can be able to prove, that your faith and church hath been from the beginning taught, and is, and shall be; then you may count yourselves catholic, otherwise not. And catholic is a Greek word compounded of KATA, which signifieth, after, or according, and HOLON, a sum, or principle, or whole. So that catholic church, or catholic faith, is as much as to say, the first, whole, sound, or chief faith.

Bonner. Do you think that the catholic church (until within these few years, in which a few upon singularity have swerved from the same) hath erred?

Philpot. I do not think that the catholic church can err in doctrine: but I require you to prove this church of Rome to be the catholic church.

Curtop. I can prove that Ireneus (which was within an hundred years after Christ) came to Victor, then bishop of Rome, to ask his advice about the excommunication of certain heretics, which (by all likelihood) he would not have done, if he had not taken him to be supreme head.

Coventry. Mark well this argument. How are you able to answer the same? Answer if you can.

Philpot. It is soon answered, my lord, for that is of no force; neither doth this fact of Ireneus make any more for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, than mine hath done, who have been at Rome as well as he, and might have spoken with the pope if I had list; and yet I would none in England did favour his supremacy more than I. I am able to shew seven general councils after Ireneus's time, wherein he never took him for supreme head.

The other bishop. This man will never be satisfied, say what we can. It is but folly to reason any more with him.

Philpot. O, my lords, would you have me satisfied with nothing? Judge, I pray you, who hath better authority, he which bringeth the example of one man going to Rome, or I that by these many general councils am able to prove, that he was never so taken in many hundred years after Christ, as by Nicene, Ephesine, the first and second Chalcedon, Constantinopolitan, Carthaginense, Aquilense.

Coventry. Why will you not admit the church of Rome to be the catholic church?

Philpot. Because it followeth not the primitive catholic church, neither agreeth with the same, no more than an apple is like a nut.

Coventry. Wherein doth it dissent?

Philpot. It were too long to recite all, but two things I will name, the supremacy and transubstantiation.

Curtop. As for transubstantiation, albeit it was set forth and decreed for an article of faith not much above three hundred years ago, yet it was always believed in the church.

Bonner. Yes, that it was. Very well said of you, Mr. Curtop.

Philpot. You have said right, that transubstantiation is but a late plantation of the bishop of Rome, and you are not able to shew any ancient writer, that believed any such thing; and with this Curtop shrunk away. And immediately after the ambassador of Spain came in, to whom my Lord of London went, leaving the others with me. To whom I said, My Lords, if you can shew me that this church of Rome (whereof you are members) is the true catholic church, I shall be content to be one thereof, and as conformable to the same as you can require me in all things; for I know there is no salvation but within the church.

Coventry. Can you disprove that the church of Rome is the catholic church?

Philpot. Yes, that I am able, but I desire rather to hear of you the proof thereof. And seeing I cannot have my request at your hands, neither be satisfied with any probable authority, I will shew you good proof why it is not. For if the primitive church were catholic, as it was indeed, and ought to be the form and school-mistress unto the world's end; then is not the church of Rome now the catholic church, which dissenteth so far from the same both in doctrine and use of the sacraments.

Coventry. How prove you that the church of Rome now dissenteth in doctrine and use of the sacraments from the primitive church?

Philpot. Compare the one with the other, and it shall soon appear; as you may see both in Eusebius and other ecclesiastical and ancient writers.

Coventry. What have you to say more, why it is not the catholic church?

Philpot. Because it is not [by your interpretation of catholic] universal, neither ever was, albeit you falsely persuade the people it is so. For the world being divided into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europe, two parts thereof, Asia and Africa, professing Christ as well as we, did never consent to the church of Rome, which is of Europe; which is a sufficient testimony that your faith was never universal.

Yea, and besides all this, most part of Europe doth not agree, neither allow the church of Rome; as Germany, the kingdom of Denmark, the kingdom of Poland, a great part of France, England, and Zealand, which is a manifest probation that your church is not universal.

After this the bishop of London called away the other bishops, and left with me divers gentlemen, with certain of his chaplains, as Dr. Saverfon, an Englishman, who began with me in this manner.

Dr. Saverfon. I have heard your arguments hitherto, and think that a great many of the old ancient writers be against you, in that you do not allow the church of Rome, neither the supremacy; for St. Cyprian (which is an ancient writer) doth allow the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the church.

Philpot. That I am sure he doth not. For he, writing to Cornelius, then bishop of Rome, calleth him but his companion and his fellow bishop, neither attributed to him the name either of pope, or of any other usurped terms, which now be ascribed to the bishop of Rome, to the setting forth of his dignity.

Dr. Saverfon. You cannot be able to shew that St. Cyprian calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop.

Philpot. I will wager you with what I am able to make, that I can shew it you in St. Cyprian, as I have said.

Dr. Saverfon. I will lay no other wager with you than book for book; that it is not so.

Philpot. I agree thereto, and I pray you one of my lord's chaplains to fetch us Cyprian hither for the trial hereof. And with that one of them went to my lord's study, and he brought forth Cyprian, and by and by he turned to the first book of his epistles, the third epistle, and there he would have seemed to gather a strong argument for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, because he saith, "It goeth not well with the church when the high-priest is not obeyed, which supplieth the stead of Christ, after God's word, and the consent of his fellow-bishops and the agreement of the people."

Dr. Saverfon. How can you avoid this place which maketh so plainly for the bishop of Rome's supremacy?

Philpot. It maketh not so plain, Mr. Doctor, on your side, as you gather, as by and by I will give you to understand. But first I challenge the wager which we made, that your book is mine. For here you may see that he calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop, as he doth also in other places. And for the understanding of that place, you do misconstrue it, to take the high-priest only for the bishop of Rome, and otherwise than it was in his time. For there were by the Nicene council four patriarchs appointed, the patriarch of Jerusalem, the patriarch of Constantinople, the patriarch of Alexandria, and the patriarch of Rome, of which four, the patriarch of Rome was placed lowest in the council, and so continued many years, for the time of seven or eight general councils, as I can shew.

Therefore St. Cyprian writing to Cornelius, patriarch of Rome, (whom he calleth his fellow-bishop) findeth himself offended that certain heretics, being justly excommunicated by him. (as the Novatians were) did flee from his diocese, which was their chief bishop, (refusing to be obedient to him and to be reformed) to the bishop of Rome, and the patriarch of Constantinople, and there were received in communion of the congregation, in derogation of good order and discipline in the church, and to the maintaining of heresies and schisms: and that heresies did spring up, and schisms daily rise hereof, that obedience was not given to the priest of God, nor was it once considered him to be in the church for the time the priest, and for the time the judge in Christ's stead, (as in the decree of the Nicene council was appointed) not the bishop of Rome only, but every patriarch in his precinct; who had every one of them a college or cathedral church of learned priests, in hearing of whom by a convocation of his fellow-bishops, with the consent of the people, all heresies were determined by the word of God: and this is the meaning of St. Cyprian.

A Chaplain. Did not Christ build his church upon Peter? St. Cyprian saith so.

Philpot. St. Cyprian, De simplicitate Prælatorum, declareth clareth in what respect he so said: "God gave in the person of one man, the keys to all, that he might signify the unity of all men." And St. Augustine in the tenth treatise of St. John, "If in Peter had not been the mystery of the church, the Lord had not said unto him, I will give unto thee the keys. But if the church have them, when Peter received them, he signified the whole church." And St. Hierom, a priest of Rome, writing to Nepotian, saith, "That all churches do lean to their own pastors, where he speaketh of the ecclesiastical hierarchy or regiment," but maketh no mention of the bishop of Rome. And to Evagrius, he saith, "That wheresoever a bishop be, whether at Rome, or Evagi, or Rhegium, he is of one power and jurisdiction."

Dr. Saverfon. St. Hierom De celesti Hierarchia? It was Dionysius you mean.

Philpot. I say not that Hierom wrote any such book, but, that in the epistle by me alledged, he maketh mention of it.

Dr. Saverfon. I wonder at such perseverance in error.

Philpot. We are in no error, but of the truth. When you cannot answer men by learning, it is your practice to answer them with blasphemies and false reports.

And after this Dr. Story came in. To whom I said, Mr. Doctor, you have done me great injury, and without law have used me more like a dog than a man. Neither have you kept your promise with me, that I should be judged the day after.

Story. I am come now to keep promise with thee. Was there ever such a fantastical man? but these heretics are worse than brute beasts.

Philpot. I am content to abide your railing judgment of me now, say what you will; but neither you nor any other shall be able to prove that I hold one jot against the word of God.

Story. The word of God, forsooth? It is a folly to reason with these heretics; yet I may reason with thee. Whom wilt thou appoint to judge of the word?

Philpot. Verily the word itself.

Story. What wise authority canst thou bring in?

Philpot. The word of Christ in St. John, "The word which I have spoken, shall judge in the last day." How much more, then, ought it to judge of our doings now; and I am sure I have my judge on my side, who will absolve and justify me in another world.

Story. What? you purpose to sit in judgment with Christ, to judge the twelve tribes of Israel?

Philpot. Yea, sir, if I die for righteousness sake, which you have begun to persecute in me.

Story. When the judge in Westminster-hall giveth sentence, doth the word give sentence, or the judge? Tell me.

Philpot. Civil matters are subject to civil men; but the word of God is not subject to man's judgment.

Story. Wilt thou not allow the interpretation of the church upon the scriptures?

Philpot. If it be according to the word of the true church, I will be as ready to yield to it, so long as it can be so proved, as you may desire.

Story. He will believe nothing but what he knoweth himself! Have not our forefathers these many hundred years taken this church for the catholic church? And prescription of time maketh a good title in law.

Philpot. This indeed is all you have to shew for yourselves; but prescription hath no place in these matters.

Story. Well, sir, you are like to go after your father Latimer the sophister, and Ridley, who could only alledge that he learned his heresy of Cranmer. But I dispatched them; and there never yet hath been one burnt, but I have been a cause of his dispatch.

Philpot. You have the more to answer for, Mr. Doctor, as you shall feel in another world.

Story. I cannot now tarry to speak with my lord, but I pray one of you to tell him, that he must out of hand put this heretic out of the way.

Philpot. I thank you with all my heart.

Then they departed all one after another. And afterwards going with my keeper to the coal-house, I met with my lord of London, who spoke unto me very gently, saying,

Bonner. Philpot, can I shew thee any pleasure in my house? speak, and thou shalt have it.

Philpot. My lord, the pleasure I require, is to dispatch me out of this miserable world unto my eternal rest. And for all this fair speech, for a fortnight's space, I have had neither fire, candle, or good lodging. God hath humbled me, and given me grace with gladness to be content. Let all who love the truth say, Amen.

The SIXTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the Right Honourable, the Lord Chamberlain, the Viscount HEREFORD, commonly called Lord FERRAS, the Lords RICH, ST. JOHN, WINDSOR, SHANDOIS, Sir JOHN BRIDGES, Lieutenant of the Tower, and two others, the Bishop of LONDON, and Dr. CHEDSEY, November 6, 1555.

THE lords being seated, and every person present in his place, the bishop of London thus spoke:

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I have both privately and openly caused you to be conversed with, to reform you of your errors, but have not yet found you so tractable as I could wish. I have now desired those honourable lords to hear what you can say, and be judges whether I have sought all means to do you good: and if you are conformable to the queen's majesty's proceedings, you shall find as much favour as you can wish.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God that I have such an honourable audience to declare my mind before. And I commend your lordship's equity in this behalf, so agreeable to the order of the primitive church, that when any one had been suspected of heresy, he should be called first before the archbishop or bishop of the diocese; secondly, in the presence of others his fellow bishops and learned elders; and thirdly, in hearing of the laity: I have found two points already, and now have the third sort of men, at whose hands I trust to find more righteousness than I have found with my lords of the clergy.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, tell my lords whether you were by me or by my procurement committed to prison or not, and whether I have shewed you any cruelty since you have been committed to my prison.

Philpot. If your lordship will give me leave to declare my matter, I will touch that afterward.

Rich. Answer first to my lord's questions, and then proceed to the matter. Were you imprisoned by my lord? Can you find any fault since with his using of you?

Philpot. I cannot charge him as the cause of my imprisonment, or that he hath used me cruelly; but I have found more gentleness at his hands, than at my own ordinary's.

Rich. Well, now go to your matter.

Philpot. I am imprisoned for disputations in the convocation-house against the sacrament of the altar; which matter was moved by the prolocutor, with consent of the queen's majesty and the whole house, and that house, being a member of the parliament-house, ought to be a place of free speech for all men of the house.

Windfor. The convocation-house is called by one writ of summon of parliament by old custom; but that is no part of the parliament-house.

Philpot. My lords, I must submit to your judgments.

Rich. We have told you the truth. And yet we would not you should be troubled for any thing there spoken, if you are sorry for what you have said.

Bonner. My lords, he hath spoken there manifest heresy, and maintained the same against the blessed sacrament of the altar, not allowing the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the same: yet, my lords, God forbid that I should shew him extremity for so doing; in case he will repent and revoke his wicked sayings, with your lordships consent, he shall be released; if not, he shall have the extremity of the law.

Rich. Will you acknowledge the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the mass?

Philpot. My lord, I do acknowledge in it such a presence as the word of God doth allow and teach me; for in the Lord's supper there are in due respects both the sign and the thing signified, when it is duly administered after the institution of Christ.

Rich. Shew us what manner of presence you allow in the sacrament.

Philpot. If it please my lord of London to give me leave to declare myself without interruption, I will thoroughly speak my mind; for if I have not plainly declared my judgment, it is because I cannot speak without danger.

Rich. There is none of us here that means to take any advantage of that thou shalt speak.

Philpot. I mistrust not your honourable lordships of the temporality; but here is one that will lay it to my charge even to death. Yet I am not ashamed of the presence of Christ, neither do I maintain any opinion without authority of scripture; and will shew you frankly my mind, if my lord of London will not hinder me to utter it.

Rich. My lord, permit him to say what he can.

Bonner. Let him say what he can, then I will hear him.

Philpot. What I do intend to speak unto you, my lord, I protest here before God and his angels, I speak not of vain-glory, singularity, or wilful stubbornness, but upon a good conscience, grounded on God's word; against which I dare not go for fear of damnation, which will follow what is done contrary to knowledge. I love the queen from the bottom of my heart; but I ought to love and fear God in his word more than man in his laws.

In two things principally, the clergy at this day deceive the realm; in the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the name of the catholic church. Their sacrament, which they term of the altar, is not the sacrament of Christ, neither in the same is there any manner of Christ's presence. Wherefore they deceive the queen's majesty, and the nobility of the realm, in maintaining that to be a sacrament which is none, and causing you to commit manifest idolatry in worshipping that for God, which is no God. And in testimony of this, I will yield my life; which to do, if it were not upon sure ground, it were to my utter damnation.

Neither are they the catholic church, who call you from the true religion as revealed and taught in king Edward's time, unto vain superstition. But if they can prove this, I will not be against their doings, but revoke all I have said. And I shall desire you, my lords, to be a means for me to the queen's majesty, that I may be brought to a just trial, I will not refuse to stand against ten of the best of them in this realm. And if they be able to prove otherwise, I will recant all I have said, and consent to them in all points.

And in declaring these things more largely, the bishop of London would have interrupted me, but the lords procured me liberty to speak, to the great grief of his lordship.

Bonner. I have heard that you love to make a long tale; but how will you join these two scriptures together, "The Father is greater than I: and I and the Father are one." Now shew your cunning, and join these by the word.

Philpot. We must, then, understand that in Christ there be two natures, the divinity and humanity; and in respect of his humanity, it is spoken of Christ, "The Father is greater than I." But in respect of his Deity he said, "The Father and I be one."

Bonner. But what scripture have you?

Philpot. I have sufficient for the proof of this. For the first, it is written of Christ in the Psalms, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels."

Bonner. But how couple you the second by the word to the other?

Philpot. The text declareth, that though Christ did abase himself in our human nature, he is still one in Deity with the Father. And this St. Paul to the Hebrews doth at large set forth. And I am able to do the like in all other articles of faith which we ought to believe, and by the same means expound them.

Bonner. How can that be, seeing St. Paul saith, "That the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life?"

Philpot. St. Paul meaneth not that the word of God in itself killeth, but that it killeth him that is void of the Spirit of God, although he be the wisest man of the world; and therefore St. Paul said, "That the gospel to some was a favour of life unto life, and to others a favour of death unto death." An example is met with in the sixth of John, "The flesh profiteth nothing, it is the Spirit that quickeneth."

Bonner. Do you understand that of St. Paul and of St. John so?

Philpot. It is agreeable to the word in other places: and the ancient fathers so interpret it. And to the Corinthians, "The natural man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, but the spiritual man, who is endued with the Spirit, judgeth all things."

Bonner. You see my lords, this man will have his own mind; and wilfully cast himself away.

Philpot. The words are those of the gospel. And if you can bring better authority for your faith, I will gladly hear it.

Rich. Are you of the Philpots of Hampshire?

Philpot. I am sir P. Philpot's son of Hampshire.

Rich. As my near kinsman I am more sorry for you.

Philpot. I thank your lordship for challenging kindred with a poor prisoner.

Rich. I would go an hundred miles to do you good.

St. John. Mr. Philpot, you are my countryman, and I would be glad you should do well.

Rich. You said even now, that you would desire to maintain your belief before ten of the best in the realm.

Philpot. I did not mean to challenge ten of the best nobility in this realm, but the best learned.

Rich. Well; what if means be made to the queen's majesty that you shall have your request?

Philpot. A man should not be judged by his adversaries.

Rich. By whom then would you be judged?

Philpot. By your honours that shall be hearers of us.

Rich. I dare be bold to procure that you shall have ten learned men to reason with you, and twenty or forty nobility to hear, if you will abide their judgment.

Philpot. I will be contented to be judged by them, if they would judge according to the word of God. I am also willing to be judged by others, if the order of judgment be kept that was in the primitive church; first, that God's will by his word was sought, whereunto both the spirituality and temporality were gathered, and gave their judgment.

Bonner. My lords, there was never any such manner of judgment in the primitive church, as he now talketh of.

Philpot. It is mentioned in Cyprian's epistles.

(Here bishop Bonner called for Cyprian; but his chaplain, Dr. Chedsey, whispered in his ear, and the book was not brought.)

Well, my lord, Mr. Doctor knoweth it is so, or else he would have brought the book ere this.

Rich. You admit no other judge, then, but the word.

Philpot. If there were a controversy between your lordship and another upon the words of a statute, must not the words of the statute determine it?

Bonner. He hath brought as good an example against himself as can be.

And here the bishop thought he had a good argument against me, and therefore enlarged it with many words to the judgment of the church.

Philpot. And I will ask, although a judge may discern the meaning of a statute agreeable to the words, if he may judge a meaning contrary to the words?

Rich.

Rich. He cannot so do.

Philpot. Even so say I, that no man bught to judge the word of God to have a meaning contrary to the expresse words thereof, as this false church of Rome doth in many things: and with this the lords seemed to be satisfied, and made no further reply herein.

Rich. I marvel then why you do deny the expresse words of Christ in the sacrament, saying, "This is my body:" and yet you will not stick to say it is not his body. Is not God omnipotent? And is not he able as well by his omnipotency to make it his body, as he was to make man flesh of a piece of clay? Did not he say, "This is my body which shall be betrayed for you?" And was not his very body betrayed for us? Therefore it must needs be his body.

Bonner. My lord Rich, you have said wonderful well and learnedly. But you might have begun with him before also, in the sixth of John, where Christ promised to give his body in the sacrament of the altar, saying, "The bread which I will give is my flesh." How can you answer to that?

Philpot. My lord of London may be soon answered: that saying of St. John is, that the humanity of Christ, which he took upon him for the redemption of man, is the bread of life whereby our souls and bodies are sustained to eternal life, of which the sacramental bread is a lively representation, and an effectual coaptation to all such as believe on his passion. And as Christ saith in the same sixth of John, "I am the bread that came down from heaven;" but yet he is not material, neither natural bread: likewise the bread is his flesh, not natural or substantial, but by signification, and by grace in the sacrament.

And now to my lord Rich's argument. I do not deny the expresse words of Christ in the sacrament, "This is my body:" but I deny that they are naturally and corporally to be taken: they must be taken sacramentally and spiritually, according to the expresse declaration of Christ, saying, that the words of the sacrament which the Capernaïtes took carnally, as the Papists now do, ought to be taken spiritually and not carnally, as they falsely imagine, not weighing what interpretation Christ hath made in this behalf, neither following the institution of Christ, neither the use of the apostles and of the primitive church, who never taught, neither declared any such carnal manner of presence as is now exacted of us violently without any ground of scripture or antiquity, who used to put out of the church all such as did not receive the sacrament with the rest, and also to burn that which was left after the receiving, as by the canon of the apostles, and by the decree of the council of Antioch may appear.

Bonner. No, that is not so; they were only Catechumens, which went out of the church at the celebration of the communion, and none other.

Philpot. It was not only of such as were novices in faith, but all others that did not receive.

Dr. Chedsey now began to dispute, and bishop Bonner retired.

Chedsey. Mr. Philpot findeth fault with the convocation-house before your lordships, that he hath lain thus long in prison, and that he hath there a dozen arguments, whereof he would not be suffered to prosecute one thoroughly, which is not so; for he had leave to say what he could, and was answered to as much as he was able to bring: and when he had nothing else to say, he fell to weeping. I was there present and can testify thereof, although there is a book abroad of the report of the disputation to the contrary, in which there is never a true word. And whereas you require to be satisfied of the sacrament; I will shew you the truth thereof, both by the scriptures, and by the doctors.

Philpot. It is a shrewd likelihood that you will not conclude with any truth, since you have begun with so many untruths, as to say that I was answered while I had any thing to say; and that I wept for lack of matter to say, and that the book of the report of the disputation, is not true.

Chedsey. You have of scriptures the four evangelists for the probation of Christ's real presence to be in the sacrament after the words of consecration, with St. Paul to the Corinthians; which all say, "This is my body." They say not, as you would have me believe, this is not the body. But especially the 6th of John proveth this most manifestly; where Christ promised to give his body, which he performed in his last supper; as it appeareth by these words, "The bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." You must note, that there is twice Dabo in this saying of St. John, and the first is referred to the sacrament of the altar; and the second to the sacrifice upon the cross: and besides these manifest scriptures, there are many ancient doctors proving the same.

Philpot. My lord, the chief ground whereon he with the rest of his side do ground themselves against us, are these words, "This is my body;" with a false pretence of the omnipotency of God. And before I will come to the particular answers of all that he hath alledged, for that your lordships may the better understand me, what I mean, and whereupon I stand, I will first require Mr. Doctor to answer me one question; whether these words only, "This is my body," spoken by a priest over the bread and wine, may make the body and blood of Christ, as you suppose, or no?

Chedsey studying what he might say, at last answered, That these words alone, pronounced by the priest, are sufficient to make the bread and the wine the very body and blood of Christ really.

Philpot. That is blasphemy to say, and against all the scriptures and doctors, who affirm that the form and substance in consecration must be observed which Christ used and did institute, as St. Cyprian saith, "In the sacrifice which is Christ, only Christ is to be followed." And by the law it is forbidden to add or to take away from God's word. And St. Peter saith, "If any man speak, let him speak as the word of God." Wherefore whosoever saith that these words only, "This is my body," do make a presence of Christ, without "Bless, Take, and Eat," which be three as substantial points of the sacrament, as, "This is my body," he is highly deceived.

Therefore St. Augustine saith, "Let the word be joined to the element, and it becometh a sacrament:" So that if the intire words of Christ's institutions be not observed in the ministration of a sacrament, it is no sacrament; as the sacrifices which the ten tribes did offer at Bethel to God, were not acceptable, because they were not in all points done according to God's word. Wherefore except blessing be made after the word, (which is a due thanksgiving for our redemption in Christ) and also a shewing forth of the Lord's death in such wise as the congregation may be edified; and moreover a taking and eating after Christ's commandment; except (I say) these three parts be first performed, (which is not done in the mass) these words, "This is my body," which are last placed in the institution of the Lord's supper, cannot be verified. For Christ commanded as well, "Take ye, Eat ye," as "This is my body."

Chedsey. Christ said, "Take, Eat, this is my body," and not Take ye, Eat ye.

Philpot. Did he not, Mr. Doctor? be not these the words of Christ, Accipite, Manducate? and do not these words in the plural number signify, "Take ye, Eat ye," and not Take thou, Eat thou; as you would suppose?

Chedsey. I grant it is as you say.

Philpot. Likewise of consequence, you (Mr. Doctor) must needs deny what you have said, that these words, "This is my body," being only spoken, be sufficient to make the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, as you have untruly said.

Then the bishop came in again and said, What is it that you would have Mr. Doctor deny?

Philpot. My lord, Mr. Doctor hath affirmed that these words, "This is my body," spoken by the priest only, do make the sacrament.

Bonner. Indeed if Mr. Bridges should speak these words over the bread and wine, they would be of none effect: but if a priest speak them after a due manner, they are effectual, and make a real body.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor hath said otherwise.

Bonner. I think you mistake him; for he meaneth of the words duly pronounced.

Philpot. Let him revoke that he hath granted, and then will I begin again with that which before was said; that, "This is my body," hath no place, except Bless, Take, and Eat, duly go before. And therefore because the same words do not go before, "This is my body," but preposterously follow in your sacrament of the mass, it is not the sacrament of Christ, neither hath Christ in it presence.

Chedsey. If "This is my body" only do not make the sacrament, no more do "Bless, take, and eat."

Philpot. I grant that the one without the other cannot make the sacrament. And it can be no sacrament unless the whole action of Christ doth concur together according to the first institution.

Chedsey. Why, then you would not have it to be the body of Christ, unless it be received?

Philpot. No verily, it is not the very body of Christ to any other, but such as condignly receive the same after his institution.

Lord Chamberlain. I pray you, my lord, let me ask him one question. What kind of presence in the sacrament (duly administered according to Christ's ordinance) do you allow?

Philpot. If any come worthily to receive, then do I confess the presence of Christ wholly to be with all the fruits of his passion, unto the said worthy receiver, by the Spirit of God, and that Christ is thereby joined to him, and he to Christ.

Bonner. My lords, I am sorry I have troubled you so long with this obstinate man, with whom we can do no good; I will trouble you no longer now. And with that ended the sixth examination.

The SEVENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, NOVEMBER the 19th. before the BISHOPS of LONDON and ROCHESTER, the CHANCELLOR of LITCHFIELD and Dr. CHEDSEY.

Chancellor. CAST not yourself wilfully away, Mr. Philpot. Be content to be ruled by my lord here, and by other learned men of this realm, and you may do well enough.

Philpot. My conscience beareth me record that I seek to please God, and that the love and fear of God causeth me to do as I do: and I were of all other creatures most miserable, if for mine own will only I do lose all the conveniencies I might have in this life, and afterwards be cast into damnation.

Bonner. Well, since thou wilt not be conformable by fair means, I will proceed against thee Ex Officio, and therefore hearken to such articles as I have here written, and make answer to them. And with that he read a libel which he had in his hand of divers articles, and when he had done he bade me answer.

Philpot. Your libel, my lord, containeth in sum two special points: The first pretendeth, that I should be of your diocese, and therefore your lordship upon divers suspicions and infamies of heresy going upon me, is moved to proceed against me by your ordinary office; which first is not true, for that I am not of your lordship's diocese, as the libel doth pretend. And the second is, that I being baptized in the catholic church, and in the catholic faith, am gone from them, which is not so, for I am of that catholic faith and church which I was baptized into.

Bonner. What? art thou not of my diocese? where are you now, I pray you?

Philpot. I cannot deny but I am in your coal-house, which is your diocese: yet I am not of your diocese.

Bonner. You were sent hither unto me by the queen's majesty's commissioners, and thou art now in my diocese: wherefore I will proceed against thee as thy ordinary.

Philpot. I was brought hither through violence, and therefore my present being now in your diocese is not enough to abridge me of mine own ordinary's jurisdiction, neither make it me willingly subject to your jurisdiction, since it cometh by force, and by such men as had no just authority so to do; no more than a sanctuary man, being by force brought forth of his place of privilege, doth thereby lose his privilege, but always may challenge the same wheresoever he be brought.

Chedsey. Hath not the queen's majesty authority, by her commissioners, to remove your body whither she will? and ought you not to obey herein?

Philpot. I grant that the queen's majesty (of her just power) may transpose my body, whither it shall please her grace to command the same. But yet by your laws, spiritual causes are not subject to the temporal power.

Bonner. What sayest thou then to the second article, and to the other?

Philpot. I am of the same catholic faith, and of the same catholic church, which is of Christ, the pillar and establishment of truth.

Bonner. Your godfathers and godmothers were of another faith than you are now.

Philpot. I was not baptized either into my godfathers faith or my godmothers, but into the faith and into the church of Christ.

Bonner. How long hath your church stood, I pray you?

Philpot. Even from the beginning, from Christ and from his apostles, and from their immediate successors.

Bonner. Hath not the bishop of Rome always been supreme head of the church, and Christ's vicar on earth even from Peter?

Philpot. No, that he was not. For by the word of God he hath no more authority, than the bishop of London hath.

Bonner. Was not Peter head of the church, and hath not the bishop of Rome, who is his successor, the same authority?

Philpot. I grant that the bishop of Rome, as he is the successor of Peter, hath the same authority as Peter had: but Peter had no more authority than every one of the apostles had.

Chancellor. Yes, that St. Peter had; for Christ said specially unto him, "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven;" which he spake to none other of his disciples singularly, but to him.

Philpot. St. Augustine answereth otherwise to the objection, and faith, "That if in Peter there had not been the figure of the church, the Lord had not said to him, To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Which if Peter received not, the church hath them not; if the church hath them, then Peter hath them not."

Bonner. What if I can prove and shew you out of the civil law, that all christendom ought to follow the holy catholic church of Rome, as there is a special title thereof, De catholica fide & sancta Romana ecclesia?

Philpot. That is nothing material, seeing the things of God be not subject to man's laws; and the divine matters must be ordered by the word of God, and not of man.

A Doctor. St. Cyprian hath these words, That upon Peter was built the church, as upon the first beginning of unity.

Philpot. He declareth that in an example, that unity must be in the church; he grounded on Peter his church alone, and not upon men. Which he doth more manifestly declare in the book De simplicitate Prælatorum, saying, in the person of one man God gave the keys to all, that he in signification thereby might declare the unity of all men.

Bonner. I will desire you (Mr. Chancellor) to take some pains with Dr. Chedsey, about his examination, for I must go to the parliament house. And I desire you will dine with me.

Then the doctor again took his former authority in hand for want of another, and would have made a further circumstance, digressing from his purpose.

A Doctor.

A Doctor. Yea, then I have done with you, and so went away.

Philpot. You are too young in divinity to teach me in the matters of my faith. Though you may be more learned in other things than I, yet in divinity I have been longer practised than you, for any thing I can hear of you; therefore be not too hasty to judge what you do not perfectly know.

Chancellor. Peter and his successors from the beginning have been allowed for the supreme head of the church, and that by the scriptures, for Christ said unto him in St. John thrice, "Feed my sheep."

Philpot. That is no otherwise to be taken, than, "Go ye and preach," which was spoken to all the apostles as well as unto Peter. And that Christ said thrice, "Feed my sheep," it signifieth nothing else but the earnest study that the ministers of God ought to have in preaching the word. God grant that you of the clergy would weigh your duty in this behalf more than you do. Is this a just interpretation of the scripture, to take "Feed my sheep," for to be lord of the whole world?

In the mean while a bachelor of divinity came in, which is a reader of Greek in Oxford, belonging to the bishop, and he took upon him to help Mr. Chancellor.

Scholar. What will you say if I can shew you a Greek author called Theophylact, to interpret it so? Will you believe his interpretation?

Philpot. Theophylact is a late writer, and one that was a favourer of the bishop of Rome, and therefore not to be credited, since his interpretation is contrary to the determination of many general councils.

Scholar. In what general council was it otherwise, that the bishop of Rome was not supreme head over all?

Philpot. In the council of Nice I am sure it was otherwise; for Athanasius was there the chief bishop and president of the council, and not the bishop of Rome.

Scholar. Nay, that is not so.

Philpot. Then I perceive you are better seen in words than in knowledge of things: and I will lay with you what you will it is so, as you may see in the Epitome of the councils.

Scholar. I will fetch Eusebius and shew the contrary, and the book of General-Councils. He went into my lord's closet, and brought Eusebius, but the General Councils he brought not, saying (for saving of his honesty) that he could not come by them, and there he would have defended that it was otherwise in Eusebius, but he was not able to shew the same, and so shrunk away confounded.

Chancellor. The church of Rome hath been always taken for the catholic church: therefore I would advise you to come into the same with us. You see all the men of this realm do condemn you. And why will you be so singular?

Philpot. I have said, and still do say, that if you can be able to prove it unto me, that I will be of the same. But I am sure that the church, which you make so much of, is a false church, and a synagogue of Satan. And you with the learned men of the realm do persecute the true church, and condemn such as are more righteous than you.

Chancellor. Do you hear, Mr. Doctor, what he saith, that the church of Rome is the devil?

Chedsey. I wish you did think more reverently of the church of Rome. What will you say if I can shew you out of St. Austin, in his epistle written unto pope Innocent, that the whole general council of Carthage did allow the church of Rome to be the chief over all others?

Philpot. I am sure you can shew no such thing. And with that he fetched me the book of St. Austin, and turned to the epistle, but he could not prove his allegation manifestly, but by conjectures in this wise.

Chedsey. Here you may see, that the council of Carthage writing to Innocent, the bishop calleth the see of Rome the apostolic see. And besides this, they write to him, certifying him of things done in the council for the condemnation of the Donatists, requiring his approbation in the same; which they would not have done if they had not taken the church of Rome for the supreme head of others. And moreover you may see how St. Austin doth prove the church of Rome to be the catholic church, by continual succession of the bishops until his time, which succession we can prove until our days: therefore by the same reason of St. Austin we say now, that the church of Rome is the catholic church.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I have considered how you do weigh St. Austin; and contrary to his meaning and words, you would infer your false conclusion. As concerning that it was called by him the apostolical see, that is not material to prove the church of Rome now to be the catholic church. I will grant indeed that it is the apostolic see, in respect that Paul and Peter did there once preach the gospel, and abode there for a certain season. I wish you could prove it to be the apostolical see of the true religion and sincerity as the apostle left it, and did teach the same; which if you could do, you might boast of Rome as of the apostolic see; otherwise it is now of no more force, than if the Turks at Antioch and at Jerusalem should boast of the apostolic sees, because the apostles did there once abide, and founded the church of Christ.

And whereas the whole council of Carthage did write unto pope Innocent, certifying him of what was done in the general council, and willing him to set his helping hand to the suppressing of the Donatists, as they had done; that fact of the council doth not prove the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, no more than if the whole convocation-house now gathered together, and agreeing upon certain articles, might send the same to some bishop that upon certain impediments is not present, desiring him to agree thereto, and to set them forth in his diocese. Which fact doth not make any such bishop of greater authority than the rest, because his consent is brotherly required.

And touching the succession of the bishops of Rome, brought in by St. Augustine, it maketh nothing now thereby to prove the same catholic church, unless you can conclude with the same reason as St. Augustine doth. And the rehearsal of the succession of the bishops doth tend to this only, to prove the Donatists to be heretics, because they began, as well at Rome as in Africa, to found another church of their own setting up, than was grounded by Peter and Paul, and by their successors, whom he reciteth until his time, which all taught no such doctrine, neither such church as the Donatists. And if presently you be able to prove by the bishops of Rome (whereof you do glory) that such doctrine hath not been taught by any of the successors of Peter's see, as is now taught and believed by us, you have good reason against us; otherwise it is of no force, as I am able to declare.

Chancellor. Well Mr. Doctor, you see we can do no good in persuading of him: let us administer the articles which my lord hath left us, unto him. How say you, Mr. Philpot, to these articles? Mr. Johnson, I pray you write his answers.

Philpot. Mr. Chancellor, you have no authority to inquire of me my belief in such articles as you go about, for I am not of my lord of London's diocese; and to be brief with you, I will make no further answer herein than I have already to the bishop.

Chancellor. Why then let us go our ways, and let his keeper take him away.

This examination concluded with as much passion as it began; for, at the commencement, the bishop of London called me to an account for tarrying so long, saying, that Mr. Chancellor and himself were half an hour before mass, and half an hour even at mass, looking for my coming. I replied, I was a prisoner, the doors were shut upon me, and I could not come when I pleased; but when the doors of my prison were open, I immediately came. Then the bishop asked, if the doors had been opened sooner would I have come to mass?

mas?—If, said I, you can prove mas to be the true service of God, whereunto a christian ought to come, I will afterwards come with a good will.

Then said Bonner, angrily, the king and queen, and all the nobility, come to mas, and yet you will not—by my faith, you are too well handled.

If, I said, your lordship calls lying in a blind coal-house, without either fire or candle, good handling, I am then well handled.

You are a fool, replied Bonner, you think because my Lord Chancellor is gone, that we will burn no more, but unless you recant, I will dispatch you shortly, I warrant. This and such like discourse, rendered my enemies more bitter; after which some private conferences took place between the bishop and me, in the Coal-house.

The EIGHTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the Bishops of LONDON and St. DAVID's, Mr. MORDANT, and others.

THE next day after, my keeper came in the morning before day to call me down, and so I was brought down into his wardrobe, where with a keeper I was left, and there continued all the day. But after dinner I was called down into the chapel, before the bishops of London and St. David's, Mr. Mordant, one of the queen's council, Mr. Archdeacon of London, and before a great many other Baalamites. And the bishop spake to me in this wise.

Bonner. Sir, I here object, and lay unto you, in the presence of my lord of St. David's, and of Mr. Mordant, and of these worshipful men, these articles here in this libel contained: and openly he read them.

To whom when I would particularly have answered to some of his blasphemies, he would not permit me; but said, I should have leisure to say what I would, when he had spoken.

And unto these here I add another schedule. Also, I require thee to answer to the catechism set forth in the schismatical time of king Edward. Also I will thee to answer to certain conclusions agreed upon in Oxford and Cambridge. And I here do bring forth these witnesses against thee in thine own presence, namely, my lord of St. David's, Mr. Mordant, and Mr. Harpsfield, with as many as were present at the disputation you made in the convocation-house; willing you to testify, of your oaths taken upon a book, his stubborn and irreverent behaviour he did there use against the blessed sacrament of the altar. Give me a book, and receiving one, he opened the same, saying, I will teach him here one trick in our law, which he knoweth not; that is, my lord of St. David's, because you are a bishop, you have this privilege, that you may swear by looking on the gospel book without touching the same. And so he opened the book in his sight, and shut it again, and caused the others to put their hands on the book, and take their oath, and desired them to resort to his register to make their depositions when they might be best at leisure. And afterwards he turned to me and said, Now, sir, you shall answer but two words, whether you will answer to these articles which I have laid unto you, directly, yea, or nay?

Philpot. My lord, you have told a long tale against me, containing many lying blasphemies, which cannot be answered in two words: besides this, you promised me at the beginning, that I should say what I could for my defence, and now you will not give me leave to speak. What law is this?

Bonner. Speak yea, or nay, for you shall say no more at this time.

[The cause was, as I guess, that he saw so many there gathered to hear.]

Philpot. Then my two words you would have me speak, shall be, that I have appealed from you, and take you not for my sufficient judge.

Bonner. Indeed, Mr. Mordant, he hath appealed to the king and to the queen: but I will be so bold with her majesty, to stay that appeal in mine own hands.

Philpot. You will do what you please, my lord, you have the law in your hands.

Bonner. Wilt thou answer, or no?

Philpot. I will not answer otherwise than I have said.

Bonner. Register, note his answer that he maketh.

Philpot. Knock me on the head with an hatchet, or set up a stake and burn me out of hand, without further law; you may as well do so, as what you do, for all is without order of law. And whilst I spake this, the bishop went away in haste.

St. David's. Mr. Philpot, I pray you be quiet, and have patience with you.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God, I have patience to bear and abide all your cruel intents against me: notwithstanding I speak this earnestly, being justly moved thereto, to notify your unjust and cruel dealing with men in corners, without all due order of law.

After this, at night I was conducted again by three or four into the coal-house.

The NINTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT before Bishop BONNER and others.

THE next day, betimes in the morning I was called down by my keeper, and brought again into the wardrobe, where I remained till the bishop had heard his mass, and afterwards he sent up for me into his inward parlour, and there he called for a chair to sit down, and brought his infamous libel of his forged articles in his hand, and sat down, willing me to draw near unto him, and said:

Bonner. I am this day appointed to tarry at home from the parliament-house to examine you and your fellows upon these articles, and you stand dallying with me, and will neither answer to nor fro. I know all your exceptions will not serve you. Will it not be a fair honesty for you, think you, that when thou comest before the lord mayor and the sheriffs, and other worshipful audience, when I shall say before them all, that I have had thee many times before me, and before so many learned men, and then thou couldst say nothing for that thou standest in, for all thy great brags of learning, neither wouldst thou answer directly to any thing?

Philpot. My lord, I have told you my mind plain enough; but yet I do not intend to lose that privilege the law giveth me, which is free choice to answer where I am not bound, and this privilege will I cleave unto, until I be compelled otherwise.

Bonner. Well, I perceive thou wilt play the obstinate fool. Lay thine appellation when thou comest to judgment, and answer in the mean while to these articles.

Philpot. No, my lord, by your leave I will not answer to them, until my lawful appeal be tried.

Bonner. Well, thou shalt hear them, and with that he began to read them.

Philpot. I shrunk back into the window, and looked on a book, and after he had read them over he said unto me:

Bonner. I have read them over, although it hath not pleased you to hear me. I marvel, in good faith, what thou meanest by being so wilful and stubborn, seeing thou mayest do well enough if thou likest. It is but a singularity; dost thou not see all the realm against thee?

Philpot. My lord, I speak unto you in the witness of God, before whom I stand, that I am neither wedded to mine own will, neither stand upon my stubbornness or singularity, but upon my conscience instructed by God's word: and if your lordship can shew better evidence than I have for a good faith, I will follow the same.

Bonner. What, thou wilt not, lo, for all that! Well, all that is past shall be forgotten, if thou wilt be conformable unto us.

Then I perceiving that he fawned so much upon me, thought it good to give him some hope of my relenting, to the intent I might give him and his hypocritical generation generation openly a further foil, perceiving that they dare reason openly with none but such as are unlearned, and for lack of knowledge not able to answer, or else with such as they have a hope that for fear or love of the world will recant: I said, my lord, it is not unknown to you, that I have openly maintained these opinions, and I would it might openly appear to the world that I am won by learning; And if I hear any kind of learning openly shewed, I shall be as conformable as you may require me.

Bonner. Yea marry, now you speak somewhat like a reasonable man. What is that you would openly by learning be somewhat satisfied in?

Philpot. My lord, I have openly said, that your sacrifice of the mass is no sacrament.

Bonner. What, do you deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament?

Philpot. No, I deny not the presence of Christ in the sacrament, but I have denied the sacrament of the altar, as it is used to be the true sacrament.

Bonner. I pray you, what is a sacrament? Is it not a sign of a holy thing, as St. Austin doth define it?

Philpot. Yes, verily that it is.

Then Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield, Mr. Cofins, and others, were called in, when they thus proceeded.

Bonner. Mr. Cofins, I pray you examine him upon these articles, and write the answer he maketh to every one of them. I will go examine his fellows, and send you St. Augustine by and by. I find this man more conformable than he was before.

Cofins. I trust, my lord, you shall find him at length a good catholic man. Marry, here be a fight of heresies; I dare say you will hold none of them, nor stand in any of them. How say you to the first?

Philpot. Mr. Cofins, I have told my lord already, that I will answer to none of these articles he hath objected against me; but if you will with learning answer to that which is in question between us, I will gladly hear you.

Cofins. Will you not? Why, what is that then that is in question between my lord and you?

Philpot. Whether your mass be a sacrament or no.

Cofins. What, the mass to be a sacrament? Who ever doubted thereof?

Philpot. If it be an undoubted truth, you may the sooner prove it; for I doubt much thereof.

Cofins. Why, I will prove it. It is the sign of a holy thing; therefore, it is a sacrament.

Philpot. I deny your antecedent.

Cofins. Then there is no reasoning with you.

Thus Mr. Cofins gave over in the plain field for want of further proof. And then the morrow-mass chaplain began to speak for his occupation: and with that Mr. Harpsfield came out from my lord with St. Augustine's epistles, saying:

Harpsfield. My lord hath sent you here St. Augustine to look upon, and I pray you look what he saith in a certain epistle which he writeth; I will read over the whole. Here you may hear the celebration of the mass, and how it reproveth them that went a hawking and hunting before the celebration of the same, on the sabbath and holidays.

Philpot. I perceive nothing here against me, neither any thing that maketh for the proof of your sacrament.

Harpsfield. No, doth he not make mention of the mass, and the celebration thereof?

Philpot. St. Austin meaneth of the celebration of the communion, and of the true use of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and not of your private mass, for this word Mass hath been an old term, attributed to the communion even from the primitive church. And I pray you tell me what Missa doth signify? I think not many that say mass can well tell.

Harpsfield. You think it cometh of the Hebrew word Massah, as though none were versed in the Hebrew but yourself.

Philpot. I have not gone so long to school, to derive the signification of the word Missa, which is a Latin word, out of Hebrew: but I have learned to interpret Greek words by Greek, and Latin by Latin, and Hebrew by Hebrew; I take the communion to be called Missa, a mittendo, of such things as at the celebration of the communion were sent by such as were of ability, to the relief of the poor, where the rich brought according to their devotion and ability, and required the minister in the celebration of the communion to pray unto God for them, and to accept their common alms, which they at such times did send for the relief of their poor brethren and sisters; and for this it was called Missa, as learned men do witness. At which celebration all that were present did communicate under both kinds, as they did in St. Augustine's time. But unless you can shew that your mass is used as it then was, you shall never prove your private mass to be a sacrament, unless you can prove the same now to be in your masses as was then, which is clean contrary.

Harpsfield. What, deny you the mass to be a sacrament? For shame speak it not.

Philpot. I will not be ashamed to deny it, if you cannot prove it.

Harpsfield. Why, it is a sacrifice, which is more than a sacrament.

Philpot. You may make of it as much as you like: but you shall never make it a sacrifice, as you may imagine thereof, but first it must be a sacrament, for of the sacrament you deduce your sacrifice.

Harpsfield. Why, doth not Christ say, "This is my body?" and doth not the priest pronounce the same that Christ did?

Philpot. The pronouncement only is not enough; unless the words be therewithal applied to the use, as Christ spake them to. For though you speak the words of baptism over water ever so many times, yet there is no baptism unless there be a christian person to be baptized.

Harpsfield. Nay, that is not alike; for, he that said, Hoc est corpus pui meum, that is, "This is my body," said also, Accipite, manducate, that is, Take ye, eat ye. And except the former part of the institution of Christ's sacrament be accomplished according to the communion; the latter, "This is my body," can have no verification, take it which way you will, and how you will.

Morrow-mass Chaplain. Why then you will make the sacrament to stand in the receiving, and that receiving maketh it a sacrament.

Philpot. I do not say, that the receiving only maketh it a sacrament, but I say, that a common receiving must needs be concurrent with the true sacrament, as a necessary member, without which it cannot be a sacrament, because Christ hath made this a principal part of the sacrament, "Take ye, eat ye," which you do not in your mass according to Christ's institution; wherefore, it can be no sacrament, for that it wanteth Christ's institution.

Cofins. We do forbid none to come to it, but as many as like may be partakers with us at the mass if they require it.

Philpot. Nay, that they shall not, though they require it, you will minister but one kind unto them, which is not after Christ's institution. Besides that you ought, before you go to mass, to exhort all that be present to make a sacrifice of thanksgiving, for Christ's passion with you, and exhort them to be partakers with you, according to Christ's commandment, saying unto all that be present, "Take ye, eat ye:" and likewise by preaching shew forth the Lord's death, which you do not.

Cofins. What if all things be done, even as you would have it, and whilst the minister is about to administer the sacrament, before any have received it there arise a sudden hurly burly, that the communicants be compelled to go away; is it not a sacrament for all that none hath communicated besides the priest?

Philpot. In this case, where all things are appointed to be done according to God's word, if incident necessity had not hindered, I cannot say but it is a sacrament, and that he who hath received, hath received the true sacrament. After this, the morrow-mass priest made this apish reason.

Morrow-mass Priest. If the sacrament of the mass be no sacrament, unless all do receive it, because Christ said, "Take ye, eat ye," then the sacrament of baptism is no sacrament where there is but one baptized, because Christ said to his apostles, "Go preach the gospel to all creatures, baptizing all nations in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

Philpot. In that saying of Christ, "Baptizing all nations," is a commandment to the apostles, to baptize all sorts of men, and to exclude none that believe, be he Gentile or Jew, not meaning all at once, for that were impossible. And there are many examples that baptism may be singularly ministered to one person, as we have example of Christ baptized of John, and in the Eunuch baptized of Philip, with many more such like: but so have you not of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, but contrariwise by the express words of St. Paul you are commanded to use it in a communion and participation of many together; 1 Cor. xi. "As oft as ye come together to eat (meaning the Lord's supper) tarry one for another." And also the minister in the celebration of the sacrament speaketh unto all that be present in Christ's behalf, to communicate with him, saying, "Take ye, and eat ye." Wherefore, as many as are present and do not communicate, break God's commandment in not receiving the same, and the minister is no just minister that doth not distribute the sacrament as Christ did, to all that are present; and where God's word is transgressed, there is not Christ present, and consequently it is no sacrament.

Harpsfield. What, would you have it no sacrament without it be a communion?

Philpot. I make it not so, but God's express word teacheth me so, yea, also all the ancient writers: as Chrysostom writing upon the epistle to the Ephesians, faith, That the oblation is in vain, where none doth communicate with the priest. If by his judgment the action of the priest alone is in vain, where is no communion, how can that be a sacrament, which he calleth a vain oblation, and a vain standing at the altar?

Cosins. Such a fellow I have never heard, you will not have the mass to be a sacrament; you are no man for me to reason with. Come, let us go, pointing to the morrow-mass chaplain: we will leave you (Mr. Archdeacon) and him together; and so they went away. Afterwards the archdeacon fell into earnest persuasions with me, saying:

Harpsfield. Mr. Philpot, you and I have been acquainted these many years; we were school-fellows both in Winchester and in Oxford. Wherefore I must wish you as well to do as myself, and I pray you so think of me.

Philpot. I thank you for your good will towards me. But if you be deceived (as I am sure you are), I shall desire you not to wish me deceived with you.

Harpsfield. I perceive you are now still that man you were in Oxford.

Philpot. I trust you can report no notorious evil that ever you knew by me there.

Harpsfield. Well, I will talk with you no more as now, but pray God to open your heart.

Philpot. I pray God open both our hearts, to do more his will than we have done in times past.

Harpsfield. Ho, keeper, take him away with you.

The ninth examination was concluded, in recurring to the meaning of the pronoun Hoc (this) in the proposition, "This is my body;" wherein he shewed, that they differed from their schoolmen, and were driven to a new shift, in saying that the substance of bread, after the words spoken by the priest, was evacuated by the omnipotency of God, whereas God's omnipotence will do nothing contrary to his word and his honour.

The tenth examination took place on the following day before bishop Bonner, his register, Dr. Chedsey, and others. But this related to an excommunication, without cause, and without order of law, a year and a half before; that the lord chancellor had refused him absolution, because he was an heretic and accursed; that now the chancellor had nothing to do with him, not being his ordinary; and, after some farther conversation on interpreting St. Paul, the parties separated. This was resumed on the following day, when bishop Bonner brought in another person to be witness against him, on certain articles produced; against which proceedings he protested, and appealed to the lieutenant of the archbishop of Canterbury, as ignorant who was at that time the bishop.

The ELEVENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, on St. ANDREW'S DAY, before the Bishops of DURHAM, CHICHESTER, BATH, and LONDON, Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, Dr. CHEDSEY, Mr. MORGAN of Oxford, Dr. WESTON, Dr. HARPSFIELD, Archdeacon, Mr. COSINS, and Mr. JOHNSON, Register to the Bishop of LONDON, in his Palace.

BEING sent for with my keeper, the bishop of London met me at his hall-door, and full mannerly he played the gentleman-usher to bring me before the lords, saying,

Bonner. My lords, I shall desire you to take some pains with this man, he is a gentleman, and I would he should do well, but he will wilfully cast away himself.

Durham. Come hither, sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is Philpot.

Durham. I have heard of that name to be a worshipful stock, and since you are a gentleman, do as you may live worshipfully among other gentleman. What is the cause of your trouble now?

I told him the cause, as in my former examinations is expressed.

Durham. Well, all causes set apart, will you now be a conformable man to the catholic faith, and leave all new-fangled opinions and heresies? I was in Germany with Luther at the beginning of these opinions, and can tell how they began. Leave them and follow the catholic church throughout the whole world, as the whole realm now doth.

Philpot. My lord, I am in the catholic faith, and desire to live and die in the same: but it is not unknown to your lordship, that I, with others, these twenty years have been taught another manner of faith than you now go about to compel us unto; wherefore it is requisite that we have time to weigh the same, and to hear how it agreeth with God's word.

Chichester. And if you will give me leave, my lord, I will shew him how he taketh the saying of St. Paul amiss, as many others now-a-days do, alledging the same, that they ought not to be compelled to believe, whereas St. Paul meaneth of infidels, and not of the faithful; and so St. Austin, writing against the Donatists, faith, That the faithful may be compelled to believe.

Philpot. St. Bernard (if it please your lordship) doth take that sense of St. Paul as I do, saying, that faith must be persuaded to a man, and not enjoined. And St. Augustine speaketh of such as were first thoroughly persuaded by manifest scriptures, and yet would resist of stubborn wilfulness.

Chichester. St. Austin faith, That infants are baptized in the faith of their godfathers.

Philpot. St. Augustine, in so saying, meaneth of the faith of Christ, which the godfathers do, or ought to believe, and not otherwise.

Durham. How say you, will you believe as we do, and all the learned of the realm, or no? and be of one church with us?

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that there have been always two churches. I know there is but one true church; but always from the beginning there hath been joined to the same true church, a false church, adversary to the true: and in the New Testament mention is made of two churches, as it appeareth in the Revelations, and also as St. Paul to the Thessalonians maketh mention, that Antichrist, with his false generation, shall sit in the temple of God. To which Chichester replied not.

Durham. The church in the scripture is likened to a great fisher's net, which contained in it both good fish and bad fish. I trust you will be of the better sort, and lean to the truth.

Philpot. My lord, it is my whole desire now to follow that which is good, whatsoever I have done in times past, and to cleave to God's truth.

Durham Do you so, and then you shall do well: it is almost night, my lord of London, I must needs be gone.

Bonner Nay, my lord of Durham, I must desire your lordship, and my lord of Chichester, to tarry a little while. And before he had so said, the bishop of Bath went his way without saying a word. What, my lord of Bath, will you be gone? I pray you tarry. My lords, I have earnest matters to charge this man withal, whereof I would your lordships to be made privy, and I have them here written in a libel, I pray you sit down again, or else I will. First, I lay to him here, that he hath written in a bible, which I took from him, this erroneous saying, that "The Holy Ghost is Christ's vicar on earth." Wilt thou abide by this saying of thine, that the Spirit is Christ's vicar on earth?

Philpot My lord it is not my saying, it is a more learned man's than mine: for I use not to write mine own sayings, but the notable sayings of other ancient writers, as all others be where you find the same written. And as I remember, it is even the saying of St. Bernard, and a saying that I need not be ashamed of, neither you to be offended at, as my lord of Durham, and my lord of Chichester, by their learning can discern, and will not reckon it ill said.

Bonner Will they not? Why take away the first syllable, and it foundeth Arius.

Philpot That is far fetched indeed; if your lordship will scan men's sayings in such wise, you may find out what you list.

Bonner But to help this, I find moreover with his own hand, in another book, "In me, John Philpot, where sin did abound, grace hath super-abounded." I pray you what super-abundant grace have you more than other men? So said Arius, That he had abundance of grace above all others.

Philpot My lord, you need not be offended with that saying more than the other, for it is the saying of St. Paul himself, and I did apply it to myself for my comfort, knowing that though my sins be huge and great in the sight of God, yet is his mercy and grace above them all. And concerning Arius and his adherents, I defy them, and it is well known that I have written against them.

Bonner Also I lay to thy charge that thou killedst thy father, and was accursed of thy mother on her death-bed, as I can bring witness thereof.

Philpot O my lord, what blasphemy is this? Hath your lordship nothing of truth to charge me withal, but (as I may speak it with your honour) such blasphemous lies? If any of these can be proved, I will promise to recant at Paul's Cross what you will have me: I am so sure they are as great blasphemies as may be objected to any man. Ha, my lords, I pray you, consider how my lord of London hath hitherto proceeded against me: for indeed he hath none other but such pretended slanderous lies.

Chichester They be Parerga; that is, matter beside the purpose.

Durham My lord, I must needs bid you farewell.

Bonner Nay, my lord; here is a letter, which I shall desire you to hear ere you go. This man (being in my keeping) hath taken upon him to write letters out of prison, and to pervert a young gentleman, called Mr. Green, in my house, (call him hither) and hath made a false report of his examination, as you shall hear, not being content to be evil himself, but to make others as bad as himself. He tore the letter when he saw my man went about to search him, but yet I have pieced it again together, and caused a copy to be written thereof; and he read the torn letter, bidding Mr. Christopher and Morgan to mark the copy thereof.

The contents of the letter was the examination of Mr. Green, before the bishop of London, in the presence of Mr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, and of divers others, whose ready answers in the scriptures and in the doctors were wondered at by the dean himself, and many others, as Fecknam did report: and that he was committed to

Dr. Chedsey, and to have his meat from the bishop's own table. How say you, my lords, was this well done of him, being my prisoner, to write this? and yet he hath written a shameful lie, that he was in Dr. Chedsey's keeping. How say you, Mr. Dr. Chedsey, is it not a shameful lie?

Chedsey Yes, my lord, he was never in my keeping.

Bonner Art thou not ashamed to write such shameful letters? Come hither, Mr. Green, did I not shew you this letter?

Green Yea forsooth, my lord, you shewed it me.

Bonner How think you, my lords, is not this an honest man to belie me?

Philpot Your lordship doth mistake all things. This letter (as your lordship may perceive, and all others that have heard the same) was not written by me, but by a friend of mine, certifying me at my request, how Mr. Green fared at the bishop of London's hands: and there is nothing in the letter that either I, or he that wrote it, need to fear, but that might be written as my report.

Bonner Then tell me who wrote it, if you dare.

Philpot No, my lord, it is not my duty to accuse my friend: and especially seeing you will take all things at the worst: neither shall you ever know of me who wrote it. Your lordship may see in the end of the letter, that my friend did write unto me upon the occasion of my appeal which I have made to the whole parliament-house, about such matters as I am wrongfully troubled for.

Bonner I would see any so hardy to put up thine appeal.

Philpot My lord, I cannot tell what God will work, I have written it, speed it as it may.

Bonner My lords, I have used him with much gentleness since he came to me. How sayest thou, have I not?

Philpot If to lie in the vilest prison in this town, (being a gentleman and an archdeacon) and in a coal-house, for the space of five or six weeks already, without fire or candle, may be counted gentleness at your hands, I must needs say I have found gentleness. But there were never men so cruelly handled as we are in these days.

Bonner Lo, what a varlet is this. Besides this, my lords, even yesterday he procured his man to bring a bladder of black powder, I cannot tell for what purpose.

Philpot Your lordship needeth not to mistrust the matter: it is nothing but to make ink withal for lack of ink, as I had it before in the King's-Bench; when my keeper took away my ink-horn.

Bonner And why shouldst thou go about any such thing unknowing to me, being thy keeper? for I am thy keeper in this house, I tell thee.

Philpot My lord, because you have caused my pen-case and inkhorn to be taken from me, I would yet be glad my friends should know what I lack, not that I intend to write any thing that I would be afraid should come to your sight.

Bonner More than this, my lords, he caused a pig to be roasted, and made a knife to be put between the skin and the flesh, for what purpose judge you. How sayest thou, didst thou not so?

Philpot I cannot deny but there was half a pig sent me, and under the same a knife lying in the sauce, but for no ill purpose that I know; your lordship may judge what you will. It was not to kill myself nor any other as you would have men to believe; for I was never yet without a knife since I came to prison. Therefore all these are but false surmises, and not worth rehearsal.

Bonner I have here to lay to his charge (chiefest of all) his book of the report of the disputation in the convocation-house, which is the rankest heresy that can be against the blessed sacrament of the altar. How say you, Dr. Weston, did he maintain the same there stubbornly, or no?

Weston Yea, my lord, that he did, and would never never be answered. And it is pity that the same worshipful congregation should be slandered with such untrue reports.

Philpot. You answered me indeed, Mr. Doctor, (being then prolocutor) goodly, with, Hold thy peace and, Have him to prison, and, Put him out of the house. I have read the book, and I find the report of every man's argument to be true in all points. And if there be any fault, it is, because he setteth forth your doings too favourably, and nothing like to that you did use me, being an archdeacon, and not of the worst in the house.

Weston. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. Indeed Mr. Doctor, you have amongst you un-archdeaoned me now, (I thank God for it) and that without all order of law.

Bonner. I pray you my lords, hearken to what he writeth of himself, I read it over this morning, and made a note of it. He said that Dr. Weston called him a frantic and mad-man, and said, he should go to Bedlam.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, so it pleased Dr. Weston to taunt at me, and say his shameful pleasure, but yet I was not one whit the more so for all his sayings, than Christ was when the scribes and pharisees said likewise he was mad, and that he was possessed of a devil, most blasphemously.

Durham. My lord of London, I can tarry no longer, I must needs bid you farewell. Mr. Philpot, methinketh you have said well that you will abide in the catholic faith, and in the catholic church: I pray you so do, and you shall do right well. And so he departed with Dr. Weston and Mr. Hussy.

Philpot. I have purposed so to do, howsoever I speed, by God's grace.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord of Chichester, and Mr. Prolocutor, and Mr. Dr. Morgan, to commune with him while I go to my lord of Durham.

Christopherson. Mr. Philpot, I was acquainted with you at Rome, if you remember it, but you have forgotten me, and talked somewhat with you of these matters, and I find you now the same man that you were then, I wish it were otherwise. For God's sake be conformable to men that are better learned than you, and stand not in your own conceit.

Philpot. Whereas you call me in remembrance of acquaintance had at Rome, indeed it was so, though it were but very strange on your part to me-ward, being driven to necessity.

Christopherson. You know the world was dangerous at that time.

Philpot. Nothing so dangerous as it is now; but let that pass. Whereas you say, you find me to be the same man I was then, I praise God that you see me not like a reed wavering with every wind. And whereas you would have me follow better learned men than myself; indeed I acknowledge that you, with a great many others, are far better learned than I, whose books, in respect of learning, I am not worthy to carry after you: but faith and the wisdom of God consisteth not in learning only, and therefore St. Paul willeth that our faith be not grounded upon the wisdom of man. If you can shew by learning out of God's book, that I ought to be of another faith than I am, I will hear you, and any other man whatsoever he be.

Christopherson. I marvel why you should dissent from the catholic church, since it hath thus long been universally received, except within these five or six years here in England.

Philpot. I do not dissent from the true catholic church, I do only dissent from the bishop of Rome, which if you can prove to be the catholic church of Christ, I will be of the same also with you.

Christopherson. Will you believe St. Cyprian, if I can shew out of him, that the church of Rome is such a one unto which misbelief cannot approach?

Philpot. I am sure you cannot shew any such saying out of St. Cyprian.

Christopherson. What will you lay thereon?

Philpot. I will lay as much as I am able to make.

Morgan. Will you promise to recant, if I shew his saying to be true?

Philpot. My faith shall not hang upon any doctor's saying, further than he shall be able to prove the same by God's word.

Christopherson. I will go fetch the book, and shew it him by and by; and therewithal he went into the bishop's study, and brought Cyprian, and pointed out these words in one of his epistles, Ad Romanos autem, quorum fides Apostolo predicante laudata est; non potest accedere perfidia; that is, "But unto the Romans, whose faith by the testimony of the apostle is praised, misbelief can have no access."

Philpot. These words of Cyprian do not prove your pretended assertion, which is, That to the church of Rome there could come no misbelief.

Christopherson. Good Lord, doth it not? What can be said more plainly?

Philpot. He speaketh not of the church of Rome absolutely.

Christopherson. By God, a child that can but say his grammar will not deny what you do, the words are so plain.

Philpot. Swear not, Mr. Doctor, but weigh Cyprian's words with me, and I shall make you to say as I have said.

Christopherson. I am no doctor, but I perceive it is but labour lost to reason with you.

And with that the bishop of London came in blowing again, and said, What is my lord of Chichester gone away also? (for he even a little before departed also without any other word, than that he must needs be gone.) What (says Bonner) is the matter you now stand upon?

Morgan. Mr. Christopherson hath shewed Mr. Philpot a notable place of the authority of the church of Rome, and he maketh nothing of it.

Bonner. Where is the place? Let me see. By my faith here is a place alone. Come hither, sir, what say you to this? Nay, tarry a while, I will help this place with St. Paul's own testimony, in the first chapter to the Romans, where he saith, That their faith is preached throughout the world: how can you be able to answer to this?
